WHEREAS the United States are waging war with the Confederate States, with the avowed purpose of compelling the latter to reunite with them under the same Constitution and Government; and whereas the waging of war with such an object is in direct opposition to the sound Republican maxim, that "all government rests upon the consent of the governed," and can only tend to consolidation in the general Government, and the consequent destruction of the rights of the States; and whereas, this result being attained, the two sections can only exist together in the relation of the oppressor and the oppressed, because of the great preponderance of power in the Northern section, coupled with dissimilarity of interests; and whereas we, the representatives of the people of the Confederate States, in Congress assembled, may be presumed to know the sentiments of the said people, having just been elected by them, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress do solemnly declare and publish to the world that it is the unalterable determination of the Confederate States (in humble reliance upon Almighty God) to suffer all the calamities of the most protracted war, but that they will never, on any terms, politically affiliate with a people who are guilty of an invasion of their soil and the butchery of their citizens.

BATTLE OF PEA RIDGE.

Far up in North Western Arkansas, there was fought, on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of March, one of the most obstinate battles recorded in history, the result of which, although highly creditable to our arms, can scarcely be claimed as a victory. General Earl Van Dorn, in command of the Trans-Mississippi Department, having succeeded in effecting a junction between the forces of General McCulloch and those of General Price, who had retreated from Missouri before overwhelming numbers, determined to give battle to the enemy, notwithstanding the great disparity in arms and equipment of the two forces. The numbers on the two sides did not vary materially, being near 30,000 each. But our troops were principally armed with short guns, squirrel rifles (as they are called by the country people), and in many instances not even with these, but only with such rude weapons as the men could hastily fashion for themselves. The first day's combat resulted in driving the enemy from their position by a desperate charge ending near dark; and our troops slept on the battle-field. But we lost precious lives. General McCulloch and his second in command, General McIntosh, both fell at the head of their columns, and Colonel Hebert, commanding the Louisiana troops, was wounded and made prisoner. The combat was renewed next day by a fresh attack from our army on the enemy, who had assumed a strong position some two or three miles beyond the battle-field of the first day. The result of this second attack was less favourable, owing to the discouragement produced in one wing of the army by the loss of their Generals; and the combat ended by the withdrawal of each party from the field. The enemy retreated into Missouri, and our Generals, after giving the needful repose to their troops, advanced eastward, with a view of co-operating for the defence of the Mississippi River with the armies of General Johnston and Beauregard. I subjoin the general order of the commanding General in relation to the battle:—

Head-quarters of the Trans.-Mississippi District,
Van Buren, Ark., March 16, 1862.

The Major-General commanding this district desires to express to the troops his admiration of their conduct during the recent expedition against the enemy. Since leaving camp in Boston Mountains they have been incessantly exposed to the hardships of a winter campaign, and have endured such privations as troops have rarely encountered. In the engagements of the 6th, 7th, and 8th instant, it was the fortune of the General commanding to be immediately with the Missouri division, and he can therefore hear personal testimony to their gallant bearing. From the noble veteran, who led them so long, to the gallant S. Churchill Clark, who fell while meeting the enemy's last charge, the Missourians proved themselves devoted patriots and staunch soldiers. They met the enemy on his chosen positions, and took them from him; they captured four of his cannon and many prisoners; they drove him from his field and slept upon it. The victorious advance of M'Culloch's division upon the strong position of the enemy's front was inevitably checked by the misfortunes which now sadden the hearts of our countrymen throughout the Confederacy. M'Culloch and McIntosh fell in the very front of the battle, and in the full tide of success. With them went down the confidence and hopes of their troops. No success can repair the loss of such leaders. It is only left to us to mourn their untimely fall, emulate their heroic courage, and avenge their death. You have inflicted upon the enemy a heavy blow; but we must prepare at once to march against him again. All officers and men must be diligent in perfecting themselves in knowledge of tactics and of camp discipline. The regulations of the army upon this subject must be rigidly enforced. Officers will recite daily in tactics, and all must drill as many times daily as other duties will permit. In every company the prescribed roll-calls will be made. The arms will be daily inspected, and a careful attention be given to neat police of the camp. Commanders of brigades will publish and strictly enforce these orders.

By order of Major-General Earl Van Dorn.

DABNEY H. MAURY, A.A.G.

BATTLE OF KERNESTOWN.

On March 23, Major-General Jackson, commanding in the valley of Virginia, made an attack of extraordinary vigour on a vastly superior force of the enemy. With a body of little more than 2500 men he impetuously assailed forces now known to have reached 18,000, kept them at bay for five hours, and when finally withdrawing towards night, had inflicted on them a loss fully equal to the whole number of his own forces, and with a loss to his own troops not exceeding 300 men. Among the enemy's wounded was General Shields, whose arm was so shattered that it is reported amputation has become necessary.

BATTLE OF VALVERDE.

Far away even in New Mexico the hostile forces are in collision. General Sibley, in command of our army, has advanced with a view to the capture of Fort Craig, and the liberation of the territory from the presence of the Federal forces. We have news of a combat on February 21, at Valverde, about ten miles from Fort Craig, in which the enemy were thoroughly routed, all their field artillery captured by a desperate charge of the Texans, bowie-knife in hand; and at the last account the defeated and disheartened enemy were shut up in Fort Craig, and our troops preparing to storm the works.

WASHINGTON, June 21.

Stonewall Jackson has proved himself the great man of the war. He has defeated the combined forces sent against him, and he has compelled them to fall back before his victorious army. Fremont was on Saturday last at Middletown, about sixteen miles from Winchester. Shields had been cut off from Fremont, with a river in his rear, and there seems to be no doubt that his command has either been captured or is in a fair way for it. The Government can give no account of him. A gentleman from Winchester, who left there on Sunday, says both Banks and Fremont had given up Shields as lost.

Banks and Sigel had commenced to entrench Winchester, to cover the retreat of Fremont, in case he is hard pressed. They have sent all the sick and wounded from there, and on Friday commenced sending off their stores. Banks says he cannot hold the valley against the Confederate forces.

3 P.M., June 17.

I have just learnt a piece of news, on which you can rely. Burnside has been compelled to withdraw his forces to reinforce M'Clellan. They have already arrived at Norfolk. At last accounts they were en route for M'Clellan's army. This movement has been brought about by the operations of Stonewall Jackson in the valley of the Shenandoah. Thus North Carolina is free again from Northern rule.

PARIS, July 1, 1862.

The obstinate refusal of the British Government to co-operate with France in the attempt to pacify America, has, it is said, but strengthened the determination of the Emperor to check the progress of the flames which threaten to destroy all the staples of the Confederate States. It is asserted, and generally credited in Paris, that the Emperor, annoyed at the unaccountable forbearance of England, has, at the last Cabinet Council held at Fontainebleau, expressed his opinion upon the policy of Lord John Russell with somewhat embittered feelings.

So far as regards the public feeling of France, it has been exasperated by the last order of Butler, confirming his infamous proclamation respecting the ladies of New Orleans, and especially by the approval of that proclamation by the official organ of Washington. The result of these outrages is, that it is difficult this day to meet with a man in Paris who does not declare that the laws of humanity and Christianity, as well as the necessities of the operatives of France, require imperiously that the Government of the United States should be taught that their disgusting brutality, both towards the Confederate States and towards the European Powers, is no longer to be tolerated. Every one is fully satisfied that, tired of waiting for a decision of the English Government, the Emperor has decided to act alone. And, strange to say, far from being depressed at the prospect of a single-handed war with the United States, the French people seem to rejoice at the idea of distancing the sluggish movements of England, which, after all, they think capable of abandoning France in America, as it did in Mexico. Finally, every one sincerely believes that the immense naval force which has been ordered out to the Atlantic coast of America, under the command of Admiral Jurien de la Graviere, and the 30,000 men about leaving for Mexico, under the command of General Forey, are not solely destined to operate against President Juarez.

The Admiral la Graviere, who, by-the-by, has never disguised his deep sympathies for the South, and his antipathies for the land of Yankeeism, is soon expected to proceed to the West Indies. He has had several long interviews with the Emperor, who is said fully to approve of his course in Mexico, and to have placed in his hands sealed instructions to be opened when he reaches Havannah. The new steam iron-cased frigate La Normandie is now being fitted out to receive the Admiral, his staff, and the pennon flag.

Notwithstanding all the rumours to the contrary, it is now certain that a portion of the troops destined to Mexico will be embarked in a few days; the transport ships have already sailed for Africa to take them on board, and thence to proceed at once to the West Indies. Two battalions of Turcos have asked permission to join the expedition, and have been allowed to do so.

Since the Emperor has ascended the throne, France seems determined to reconquer her true position among the civilized nations, and to take the lead in all the great political questions which agitate the world. Conscious that the noble and chivalrous Prince who rules her destinies aspires to have the tri-coloured flag wave high over and above the colours of all other nations, France blindly follows her leader without fear, and regardless of consequences. England again will have to be content with a secondary position. The Southerners have little cause to feel towards her any especial friendship, and they may remember, to her cost, that in the rules of political economy which govern the commercial intercourse between nations there are such things as differential tariffs.

The day after the adjournment of the Corps Legislatif, the Count and Countess Morny left Paris for Fontainebleau. Among the Imperial visitors are also the Prince and Princess de Metternich, the Prince and Princess Czartoriski, and the Prince de Reuss (General Prim). Though very courteously received by the Emperor, the Prince de Reuss is said to look very much embarrassed in the presence of his Majesty. It is natural it should be so, for it must have been quite an uneasy task for him to give a satisfactory explanation of his extraordinary behaviour in Mexico.

After the departure of his guests the Emperor is to go to Vichy, where he is expected to remain during the whole month of July.

The criminal proceedings instituted against Mirés were called to develop the most astounding features ever recorded in the judiciary annals of the legal world. You, no doubt, recollect that, after having been convicted by the Court of Paris, Mirés was remanded to the Court of Douai, which, after a long and tedious trial, gave a verdict in his favour. By a singular disposition of the French laws, an appeal of this judgment was taken to the Court of Cassation by the Procureur General "to vindicate the law."

Before the argument delivered by M. Dupin, M. Faustin Hélie read his report to the court. Among the documents composing the docket was a most extraordinary letter from the Minister of Justice, in which his Excellency deplores the judgment rendered by the Imperial court of Douai, and declares that if the facts contained in Mirés' indictment could possibly be received without being reached by the law, that then it would become the duty of the Government to restrain commercial liberty.

Public opinion has been singularly shocked by such declarations emanating from Messrs. Delangle and Dupin. Well it might be, for they can be construed in no other light than an attack upon the integrity of one of the most honourable tribunals of France. M. Delangle has, in fact, assumed that the judgment of that tribunal constituted a real social danger. M. Dupin has boldly asserted that the decree appealed from had completely destroyed all the guarantees of the law of 1856, thus protesting against the judgment and tainting the court itself with suspicion.

The Court of Cassation has, as was expected after such urgent appeals on the part of the Government, reversed the judgment of the Court of Douai.

What is to become of Mirés I cannot tell, for I am entirely ignorant of the French laws bearing upon the subject. But I understand, from eminent members of the bar, that though this right of appeal by the Government cannot be denied, yet Mirés' case is one of the few, if not the only one, in which it has been resorted to.

These proceedings but confirm the opinion I formerly expressed with regard to Mirés' position. He can be but considered as the victim of some powerful enemies, deeply interested in his utter ruin and fall.

To finish with a more pleasant subject, I will say a few words about a certain morning undress coat, to which the attention of the fashionables was particularly attracted a few days ago. This coat was to be seen in the beautiful show-case of Pomadere, one of the most fashionable tailors of the Boulevard des Italiens. It is made of light Victoria blue cloth, of the most elegant and distingué cut, and that which will render it extremely agreeable for your Southern friends to wear is, that Pomadere has named that frock-coat a Jeff Davis.

P.S.—It is this moment rumoured at the Bourse that the British Cabinet has asked explanations from the Tuileries about the concentration of the French fleets in the West Indies.

BRUSSELS, July 2, 1862.

Some years ago I had been roughing it on the banks of the Brazos River, under the sunny sky of Texas, and a happy souvenir, and a deep souvenir, have those days impressed on my memory. I was then at the plantation of Dr. Peebles, his kindly treated guest, and I do hope that my noble friend under his hospitable roof may, with the least possible misery, get through these trying times. I found there some French books and newspapers, and amongst the lot was a letter by Alphonse Karr, on the use of tobacco. It was written with the magnificent wit of the author of "Les Guêpes." He fancied a fellow coming to the Minister of Louis XIV. and offering him a plant, a weed, brought over from "the Islands," as they called the new continent; a thing tedious in its cultivation, extremely exhausting of the soil, perfectly useless for the food of man or beast, having not one feature that could be made available for manufacturing purposes, of no good whatever as a medicine; but which had the advantage of containing one of the most deadly poisons in existence; then Karr gave a true and shocking description of its effects as a poison. The inopportune fellow would have added to such a nice picture, that after awhile, people would take to it so kindly, from the crowned heads of nations down to the "Chiffonniers," that it would become one of the fairer sources of revenue to the Exchequer. What a caning would the poor crazy devil have got at the hands of Colbert. And yet I can read in the Independence, that great journal of ours, independent of everybody except the paying cashiers of one, or two, or three emperors—I can read, while smoking a cigar in the Café des Mille Colonnes, that “the French exciseman’s heart is rejoiced at the increased revenue from tobacco. During the year 1861, not less than seven thousand millions of cigars were consumed in France, and Government reaped a net profit from the weed of 216,000,000 of francs.”

Why, the very absurdity of the fact comes at the right moment, for I had been for an hour wondering at the strange freaks into which the human race at large seems to be indulging just now, and one more anomaly is but in keeping with the rest.

Brussels is a sort of an avant-scène from which we can quietly gaze upon Europe, and, as a consequence, upon the whole civilized and uncivilized world.

But lo! what sort of a farce are they performing to-day. Let me try and express in words what the two barrels of my opera-glass are showing at a single glance:—

1st barrel.—Here is England marrying a lovely Princess, and good humouredly and courteously inviting all foreigners to her Great Exhibition.

2nd barrel.—There is Spain attesting to the “accouchement” of Isabella (sic worded in etiquette records), and the Spaniards forcing into a deadly fight the French workmen who have come to benefit her with railroads.

1st barrel.—Here is the Italian Ministry fondly supposing that Garibaldi has quietly returned to Caprera.

2nd barrel.—There is Garibaldi, who has unexpectedly turned up at Palermo, where he is making stump speeches and preaching concord.

1st barrel.—Here are the citizens of Mexico, who are getting up a subscription to offer “une épée d’honneur au Général Prim,” and Zaragoza, “le grand Général de l’Armée d’Orient,” subscribing a few dollars.

2nd barrel.—There are Count de Lorencez, Dubois de Saligny, and Almonte, each of them sending a special envoy of his own to Paris.

1st barrel.—Here is General Prim, Prince of Reuss, indulging in an after-dinner speech in New York against some very high located folks.

2nd barrel.—There is General Prim, Prince of Reuss, having had a short and pleasant passage to Europe—here is General Prim, Prince of Reuss, at Fontainebleau!

1st barrel.—Here is the book of Victor Hugo, “Les Misérables,” breaking out when it was believed that literature had migrated to some parts unknown, with nothing but military bulletins and chief-tain’s ordres du jour to fill its place; “Les Misérables,” which is said to be a masterly representation of the men of this century.

2nd barrel.—And there is Nadar and his electric light taking to the Paris catacombs; a caravan d’hommes d’esprit et de femmes élégantes, to look at what remains of the men of the centuries before.

1st barrel.—Here is the English army, who recently covered itself with glory in India.

2nd barrel.—There is the English navy looking quietly at her flag trampled down by the Yankees.

1st barrel.—Here is Russia supporting Montenegro, intriguing everywhere against Turkey.

2nd barrel.—There is incendiarism rampant all through her empire, while General Luders is shot in the capital of poor oppressed Poland.

1st barrel.—Here is the Pope, quiet and dignified, in his threatened capital.

2nd barrel.—There are the King of Italy and his sons, fretting and voyaging from north to south.

1st barrel.—Here is Count de Chambord ordering his 4000 devotees, each and every one of whom is a man of considerable importance at home, to abstain from all and every political act.

2nd barrel.—There are busy preparations made at the Ministry of the Interior in Paris for the elections.

1st barrel.—Here is mild M. Assolant, who, unable to prevent English girls from being unmercifully beaten by clowns in the streets of London, has applied to the Royal Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, so that when he comes again to London he may oppose, at least, some of the English brutality.

2nd barrel.—There is poor M. Busquet, who has taken so kindly to English drinks that he is seriously injuring his health; but he hopes that he may be buried near James Watt, in Green Park, under a tuft of grass.

1st barrel.—Here is M. Mirés preparing to fight some new law battle.

2nd barrel.—There is the Cour de Cassation, unable to reverse practically the decision that declared him innocent, as the case is in every civilized country, yet cancelling morally the acquittal.

Here . . . but let us stop; it would take three barrels this time.

At the door of your great London Exhibition one could see three men actually brought close together by the pressure of the crowd. One is Ledru Rollio, one is Duke d’Aumale, one is Prince Napoleon!!!

There exists in the neighbourhood of Naples a lunatic asylum much vaster than Bedlam. Its name is the Manicomio d’Aversa. The present director has attained remarkable success by means of a quite new mode of treatment which he has submitted a number of them to. He makes them perform tragedy and comedy. He was so elated with the favourable results that he wished his actors to perform before the public, and one evening of last week the troop of lunatics actually played, at the Theatre del Fondo, a tragedy of Alfieri, “Brutus I.” The house was crowded, and all the outlets of the stage were carefully guarded by the male and female nurses of the hospital. The Neapolitan people were amazed at seeing these unfortunates performing Alfieri’s masterpiece with consummate talent.

Alas! was not that performance about which I was gossiping with you, and which the Brussels avant-scène allowed me to see all over the world, wasn’t it also suspicious of the soundness of mind of the millions of performers?

But why should we stop to-day looking at the follies and meanness of mankind. There are still noble hearts and vigorous minds—we have heard, blessed be the news, that our friends fighting for their families, their homes, the inheritance of their children, the sacred homes of their births—that our friends are everywhere driving back the invader—the blood-thirsty, the woman insulting, the hated invader.

Every man who hates despotism, and loves independence, who hates mob-law, and loves order and civilization, whose heart can beat for his country—has received joyfully the cheering news, and earnestly hopes you will soon announce to us that every Yankee has been driven out of your young Republic.

NEW YORK, June 17, 1862.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

Sir,—Notwithstanding the Morill Tariff was intended to be prohibitory in its character, importations are beginning to be quite large. The Southern and Northern States are bare of manufactured goods; we are without the raw material, and have to rely upon other countries for supplies. The cash duties paid during May were 4,716,354 dollars, against 979,145 dollars, the corresponding month in 1861. The total imports since the 1st of January have been 72,714,180 dollars, while the exports have amounted to only 48,956,541 dollars, showing a deficit of 23,757,639 dollars, which has been partially made up by the shipments of specie to the extent of 18,108,737 dollars. It is estimated that the imports during June, July, and August, will be 58,000,000 dollars, and that the exports cannot exceed 16,000,000 dollars. When the war broke out we had large quantities of foreign goods on hand, and our manufacturers were well stocked with cotton, all of which has been consumed. Our exports since the fall of Fort Sumter sum up 140,000,000 dollars, 30,000,000 dollars of which was made up by shipments of Southern produce, and the remainder consisted principally of bread-stuffs. So with good crops in Europe, we will have nothing to balance the importation but gold, and it is likely that the Government may prohibit the precious metals leaving the country. The want of clothing material will soon become a serious element of trouble in the North.

Much anxiety is felt as to whether Mr. Chase will be able to pay the semi-annual interest. We are aware that it has to be settled for in specie. The banks have taken advantage of the speculative mania, and sold out the 70,000,000 dollars Treasury notes, with which they were saddled last September. The contemplated issue of an additional 150,000,000 demand notes by Mr. Chase has created ill-feeling between him and the banks, and it is doubtful whether they will come to his relief as formerly.

THE BATTLE BEFORE RICHMOND.

The following has appeared in the Times. It is furnished to that print by F. Smith, Esq. (J. P. Co. Staff), who vouches for the veracity of the intelligence:—

Fortress Monroe, June 4, 1862.

I now realize war in all its horrors. I have witnessed such scenes as would make the blood curdle to read about, but to look upon them is truly horrible.

I have seen within two days past, more than 12,000 men torn in all parts of the body with balls and bayonet wounds. I went on board of the Vanderbilt this morning, and saw lying all over the boat 850 wounded and dying men. I sickened at the sight, but was compelled, for the sake of humanity, to do all I could to aid them. I there saw Colonel Bratton, of South Carolina, a rebel colonel, who fell upon the field, not dead, but badly wounded. Some of the wounded were hit in four or five places.

Those men are less than one-quarter that fell upon the field of battle on last Saturday near Richmond. The rebels there attacked the Union troops and completely routed them, taking all their stores, ammunition, artillery, &c.

On Sunday there was some fighting, which the papers report as being terrible, and that they regained all they lost on Saturday, but this is not so. The rebels fought terribly hard, and I very much fear McClellan’s army will be completely routed if he does not soon receive heavy reinforcements.

Yesterday Sumner’s division was attacked again by the rebels, but we have not received any news of the result, as the wires are down from head-quarters.

We have lost a great many officers, numbers of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, &c. I was informed one boat alone was filled with officers.

Colonel S— was wounded, as was his captain, and his company was terribly cut up, but few men remaining.

The Pennsylvania regiments suffered terribly; only 150 men are left in the 104th regiment.

The number killed, wounded, and missing in the two days’ fight approaches 16,000 certain. Don’t believe anything you see in the papers. I know they lie awfully.

Official despatches are worth nothing.

A SCENE IN THE SENATE

In the United States’ Senate, on the 6th ultimo, in a debate on the motion to reconsider the vote laying a tax on slaves,

In the course of the debate, Mr. Cowan said it might be said he intended to lecture the Senate. He thought it deserved it by passing acts which were calculated to trample upon the Constitution. It might be said he was dogmatic. Well, he intended to be dogmatic.

Mr. Wade (in his seat): “All but the matie.”

Mr. Cowan: When the Senator settles his little account with his colleague in the other house it will be time enough for me to pay attention to that kind of a remark. Till then he must excuse me.

Mr. Wade spoke to Mr. Cowan as having a right to be a mere advocate and watch-dog of traitors in the field, but should not come here to lecture the Senate. Whoever heard of him? He was willing to be criticised by some one having authority. He had rather be lectured by anybody than the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Cowan said he might be very humble, inexperienced, and unknown, but he was here as a representative of Pennsylvania. He represented two millions of people, and was not going to apologize for his people, for his inexperience, or his youth. He never understood that age or long service here would satisfy folly, or give character to Billingsgate, which might be learned of any fishwoman. After further discussion a vote was taken, and the reconsideration carried—22 against 18.

ADVICE TO THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON.

The New York Herald concludes a long leader, abusing the French Emperor, with the following advice:—

The only other alternative left to the Ruler of France is to create a quarrel with England out of the Mexican imbroglio, and invade her at once. Spain is not a foe worthy of his steel. But in England he has the mortal foe of his uncle and of his own dynasty—the hereditary enemy of France for many hundred years. With that greedy and aggressive Power he has accounts to settle reaching back for several centuries. By invading her, as he can successfully do with his iron-clad fleet, he would become a second William the Conqueror, and, carrying out the unfinished programme of his uncle, establish in Europe such an empire as it has never yet seen. He is the man of destiny to whom the first Napoleon has bequeathed the legacy of avenging Waterloo and St. Helena. If he does not take the tide of fortune at the flood he will soon find himself a stranded wreck, washed ashore upon the same lonely rock where his uncle gazed out his heart. Russia would not interfere with his enterprise—indeed, could not in time. Prussia, by any feeble hostility she could offer, would only provoke the seizure of her Rhenish border; and the rest of Germany is in too revolutionary a condition to permit any movement of its princes against France. The game of Napoleon, therefore—the sure and winning game—is to attack England at once; and that he will do it is extremely probable. It is his only salvation.

THE MEANING OF SUBJUGATION.

From the Richmond Examiner, June 14.

Thanks to their own acts, performed already in New Orleans, Nashville, Norfolk, Kentucky, Tennessee, the Southern people now know what subjugation means. Even if the people of the Confederate States were the worst race of cowards that ever disgraced the face of the earth, the Northern Congress has been kind enough to do for us what renders cowardice a source of strength. That Congress has prepared, before our eyes, all the implements and engines of torture—the abolition, the negro intercourse, the confiscation laws, the whole machinery of judicial murder and robbery to be inflicted on the South; laws before which every man of us has forfeited his life and heretofore his family of property; enactments which reduce an entire people to the condition of hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Yankee appropriators of their land; provisions that annihilate entire States, and place the broad land and all it contains at the absolute will and mercy of wretches whose name has never, at any time, been heard without the fear and loathing that is felt at the view of a scorpion or a snake: the Andy-Johnsons, the Butlers, and Stanleys. Congress has left no doubt as to the consequences of subjugation. With pleased malignity and diabolical confidence, it has arranged before our eyes its racks, thumb-screws, gibbets, axes, pinchers. The hangmen stand at ease, full in view, waiting with folded arms the moment when the military work is ended, and the judicial business begins. The Congress of Washington has shut the door on cowardice. If all the South were overrun, but one only county, defended by one solitary company of infantry, it would hold together and fight to the death, rather than live to endure the miserable fate prepared for those who can neither win liberty nor gain an honourable death.

An officer of the 37th Regiment, writing from Baltimore, says that on arriving at that city, after seventeen hours’ travel, they were welcomed by a pouring rain storm, and remained all night in a railroad shed. He adds:—“Baltimore is a perfect hot-bed of Secession—not a cheer or a flag for Union troops. I rode in a city car with a most beautiful young lady, but she turned her head away, and when I got out she gathered her dress in so that I would not touch it. I pass on safely through the streets, but very often sneered at. I might easily imagine myself in New Orleans before the reign of Picayune Butler. Our soldiers guard the railroad depot.”—New York Post.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through JAMES HORTZ, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JULY 3, 1862.

The End of the Spring Campaign.

THE news of the past week, like that of the preceding, has been deficient in that stirring tragic interest to which the spectators of the great gladiatorial contest in America had of late become accustomed. The dénouement, though long foreseen, appears further off than ever; but in a spectacle on so grand a scale attention can never flag. The dearth of important events affords us time for a more careful study of the relative position of the combatants, now that, with the close of the Spring campaign, the curtain drops upon another act of the great drama. On this much light has been thrown since our last survey of the field.

In the West, Halleck, according to the latest advices, is about to abandon his "aggressive policy" and assume the defensive. Many on this side of the Atlantic were not aware that he had ever assumed any other since the disaster at Shiloh. The paragraph, however, probably means that he is conscious of the state of paralysis in which that event left his army, and is preparing the public mind for its consequences. After anxious search he has at last discovered the whereabouts of Beauregard; and so soon as discovered, we have the gratifying intelligence that General Pope magnanimously "relinquished his pursuit." It is somewhat surprising to learn that, after the repeated captures of whole brigades by this General (which, by some strange accident, were never confirmed by any subsequent details), the "rebel" chieftain is still at the head of 80,000 men. It is mathematically demonstrable, from the Federal accounts, that he ought to have 40,000 less than none; witness his losses by Pope's captures, by disease and desertion, estimated at 30,000; his reinforcement of Richmond, of Jackson's corps d'armée, and of Charleston, by about 20,000 each, say 60,000 more; Kirby Smith's division detached from the main body, 20,000; General Van Dorn's at least 10,000; making in all 120,000 men withdrawn from an army which, according to authentic data obtained from Richmond, and published elsewhere in this impression, did not exceed a numerical force of 80,000 men before the battle at Shiloh. But Federal figures must not be scrutinized too closely, and no one who had read former bulletins of Halleck's believed in the wholesale captures or the wholesale desertions.

From the information before us, such as it is, it may be assumed, then, that Beauregard, with his main force, still confronts Halleck, barring his southward progress, while a flank attack is probably preparing from Eastern Tennessee, which his Lieutenant (Buell) is gone to avert, at immense risk to himself; that Van Dorn's division forms the left wing of Beauregard's army, stationed so as to endanger Halleck's communication with Memphis; that Kirby Smith, in an admirably selected position among the natural defences of Chattanooga, forms the connecting link between the Confederate armies of the East and West, ready to reinforce either, or to make a sudden dash upon Nashville, as occasion may favour, or an emergency require.

In the East the interest is divided between Jackson's brilliant strategy in the valley of the Shenandoah and the critical position of McClellan before Richmond. As we assumed from the beginning, it is now understood that the former's operations had for their object to prevent the junction of the Federal armies concentrating upon the Confederate capital. In this he has had to perform a task not unlike one of the most admired exploits of the old Napoleon in the first Italian campaign, and thus far with astonishing success. So long as he is able to bolder in check the triple columns of his antagonists—Banks, Fremont, and Shields—Richmond may be considered safe, and McClellan the besieged, not the besieger. In accomplishing this work, General Jackson will most probably continue the same rapid movements, alternate retreats and advances, alluring the enemy into dangerous situations, and never assailing him except when under a disadvantage; and we therefore doubt whether he will fight that pitched battle which at latest advices was deemed imminent.

McClellan, meanwhile, had had to look to a different quarter for reinforcements. Our Washington Correspondent, whose facilities for obtaining information entitle his statements to much consideration, asserts positively that General Burnside, having suspended his operations in North Carolina, is en route with his force to join McClellan, via Fortress Monroe. The later advices received through the War Department at Washington are silent on this point, but the statement, independent of the authority on which it rests, possesses strong intrinsic probability. If confirmed, it proves the desperate straits to which McClellan must be reduced; for the abandonment of North Carolina would undo the work of many months, performed at an incredible expenditure of men and money. Whether the addition of some 20,000 or 30,000 men to his effective strength by this means would enable McClellan to resume the offensive successfully, is still problematical, but the Confederates might justly claim in that event a fair offset to the evacuation of Richmond. Some fears were entertained by the friends of the South that the late rise of the James River might facilitate a second attack by the Federal iron-clad fleet upon the water defences of that city; but those acquainted with the topography of the locality, pronounce these fears as groundless, and at the last advices the Federals claim no important advantage at that point. General McClellan, then, is wholly dependent upon his land forces, and this dependence is daily becoming more precarious. It is a strikingly suggestive fact, that a small body of Confederate cavalry should have been able to completely circumvent his camp, brush by his left flank, around his rear, and returning safely, with valuable booty, from his right. This is, assuredly, the boldest and most successful reconnaissance on record; for it must be remarked that the Northern accounts of the exploit, which are the only ones we as yet have, prove that not in one place only, but along their whole course in skirting the Federal camp, this adventurous party marked their path by death and destruction of property. They temporarily interrupted the hostile General's communications by land and by water, burnt two of his store-ships, and many waggons and tents, fired into his railway-trains, cut his telegraph lines, and without suffering any loss themselves accomplished their round, carrying with them the prisoners, horses, and medical and other stores they had captured. We are now informed that similar demonstrations are becoming frequent, that guerilla bands hover on the flanks and rear of the invading army, which is not yet 200 miles from its own territory; and that, in fine, the Confederates are growing bolder and "more menacing." The reverse may be assumed as being the case with the army which is thus harassed. It is asserted that McClellan's position ensures him against any present attack, being in a low and densely wooded swamp. But to defend himself in such a spot was not the object of a General at the head of a great army of invasion, and even this brief respite he pays at a fearful cost; for the press and private correspondence of the North is filled with heartrending details of the condition of the hospitals. It is scarcely probable that a more favourable moment will recur than that which he has already lost; for while his army dwindles by disease, that of the Confederates is swelled by reinforcements, and every day they gain additional strength to their defences.

The spring campaign is now closed. Ere this the fate of Richmond must have been decided. If, contrary to all the probabilities of recent events, it has fallen, the Confederates have retreated where the invader dare not follow them until the sultry-summer months are past. If, on the other hand, the Confederate flag, as we firmly believe, still waves defiantly over the temporary capital, there is nothing left for McClellan but to withdraw to a more healthful position. The North will then, for the hundredth time, have falsified its boastful promises and threats; and it will be seen whether the patience of Europe is really without bounds, or its credulity fathomless.

The Approaching Prorogation of Parliament.

ONLY a few weeks, if not days, remain of an unusually dull and prosy session of Parliament. Its ordinary business is transacted, and but for the distressing war in America, Parliament might, and perhaps would, have been prorogued a month since, without detriment to the public service. Yet every one feels that while so grave an international question remains pending, the legislators of the realm should not leave their seats without doing something, though no one appears to know what that something is. It really would seem that, after eighteen months, England had not yet recovered from her first surprise at the American catastrophe, and that her greatest intellects felt themselves unequal to the task of grappling with a fact which can neither be revoked nor ignored. Time brings a cure to many ills, but time cannot cure a festering wound. The American question demanded quick resolve, and decisive action. Procrastination, always the confession of weakness, has made it only more difficult to deal with. Four months ago it was susceptible of an easy solution. One word then, if firmly spoken, could have pacified the Western World. To-day it may, or may not, be too late, but certain it is that four months hence it will.

It is difficult to even conjecture the shifting reasons which have caused this fatal procrastination ever since the disruption of the American Union became to all eyes a practical, undeniable fact. The only consistent reason—and this far be it from us to ascribe to any one whom England honours with confidence or power—would be, that the two combatants must be deliberately and purposely incited to inflict wounds from which both would bleed to death, and that therefore each of them alternately should be flattered by vague hopes lest his courage might flag. This, we believe, for humanity's sake, could not have been the motive, but the effect has been the same as though it were. Certainly, but for the passive attitude of this country, there was a time when the North would have stopped in its mad career. Certainly, also, at another period and in another mood, the North was only egged on to more exhaustive efforts by favours supposed to have been shown to its opponents.

We said the motives were shifting and varying. At one time it was argued that the recognition of the Confederate States, the only form in which Europe can act with any practical results, would imperil vast financial interests which this country has at stake in the Northern States. By allowing these States to persevere in an undertaking long after it had become hopeless, and thus to consume not only the resources of the present, but of many future generations, until universal bankruptcy shall have become the last remaining relief from still greater evils, precisely that has been produced which it was desired to avert. At least, in the case of war and wholesale confiscation, the British holder of American securities could console himself with the almost certainty that the armed power of his nation would force the refractory debtor into unwilling restitution. But if universal bankruptcy of Government, corporations, and individuals, converts these same securities in his pocket into waste paper, what will fleets and armies avail with a debtor who has not the wherewith to pay?

Again, the marvellous development of Northern naval power was used as a threat to ubiquitous and timorous commerce. The truth was that the United States improvised a navy, which was, indeed, effective against an opponent who had not a ship at sea, nor a long-range gun on land, but which could have been swept from the waters as a housemaid sweeps cobwebs with a broom. At the outbreak of this war, the United States, though they had a mercantile marine second to no other, and could, therefore, inflict no injury to which they were not as vulnerable, as their antagonist, were not even a fifth rate Maritime Power. Little Denmark equalled, if not excelled them, in the number of its armed ships. Since the war, not a sea-going vessel has been launched from their dock-yards. They have withdrawn their merchant vessels from the pursuits of commerce, which no longer needed them, until now they have little more to lose on the ocean, and have converted them into engines of war. Crafts, like the Mercedita, quite competent to insult or capture peaceful ships, and, therefore, to blockade neutral ports, and to bully, but which would shake to pieces on the discharge of their own broadsides, swell the catalogue of Federal men-of-war. But, while it is confessed that the probability of a war with the United States is not removed, it is proposed to delay it until, in the superhuman strength of a mad fury, by efforts of which, in their sober senses, they would be incapable, they shall have built a real navy of iron-clads, out of the very means which should have paid the principal and interest of British debt.

Much stress has been laid upon the argument that the United States were an arrogant, quarrelsome, self-conceited, insolent Power, and no man cares to deny these premises. They themselves rather glory in these avowable attributes, than disclaim them. By a marvellous train of logic, they were therefore to be treated as an indulgent parent treats a very badly spoiled child. Their insolence and arrogance were met with bland politeness; their threats with mild forbearance, so as to teach them how to form a humbler estimate of their grandeur, puissance, and glory. All the world admiringly testifies to the wisdom of this system of teaching.

The dangerous position of Canada has been another of the motives upon which the astute Premier of the Washington Cabinet, and his emissaries, have played with much skill and some effect. On pain of summary vengeance in that quarter, this country is required to give its direct, or at least, implied moral support to the subjugation of a free people of our own race, until the Federal armies, from raw volunteers, shall have become veterans, until the war which now gnaws the vitals of the North shall have become an incentive to still greater deeds, until the Federal ships, released from a blockade rendered superfluous by the possession of the ports themselves, shall have had time to protect California; and leisure to prey upon unarmed commerce. On condition of such patient and submissive behaviour, we are promised the boon which Polyphemus granted to Ulysses, that of being devoured the last. When the North, thanks to our complacent looking on, shall have punished 8,000,000 of people as rebels and traitors, when it has the full disposal of its trained military strength, when it can threaten us with cotton as well as with cannon, when a foreign war has become a necessity to obliterate recollections of the war at home, then, and then only, if we remain good boys and good girls so long, will "manifest destiny" be let loose upon us. Kind, generous, gracious Mr. Seward!

Such are some of the motives which may partially account for the neglect of so many golden opportunities. One stronger than all, however, and in the background behind them all, has been the persistent belief that the question would settle itself, the Gordian Knot would unloosen of its own accord. Doubtless, had English statesmen foreseen that after a twelvemonth and a quarter of active hostilities, after the slaughter of 100,000 men, and the slower hospital death of as many more, the war would only have begun, and the settlement of the quarrel more complicated by difficulties than at the first outset, their course would have been different. Why, then, not listen to the experience of the past, and to the voice of those few who foresaw events truly, rather than those whose predictions, one after another, have been falsified almost as soon as made.

Grant, for the sake of argument, that the opportune moment, so often passed, has not yet recurred. If that opportune moment depends on the strategic position of the combatants, then seize it so soon as the vicissitudes of war bring it again. If that opportune moment is to be awaited from a change of temper or of purpose on their part; if, in other words, England waits to part them until they both have shaken hands, then it will never come. So long as the North believes that the world trembles before its prowess, so long as the world, by its inaction, belies its words, and, by implication, recognizes the ultimate feasibility of its enterprize, the North will persevere in the war. Even if it wished it, it could not stop of its own will; for there are laws of gravitation in the moral world as well as in the physical. As for the South, it is a cruel mockery to appeal to her for peace. There has never been a time, either before or since the war, that she was not eager to employ every honourable means to secure it. She was forced into this unequal contest, when every odd was against her, without an army, or even the nucleus of one, without an arsenal, or a ship on the high seas, without a treasury or any other wealth than that of her bounteous soil. Appeal to a man who defends purse and life against a gang of highwaymen, to surrender both in the name of peace and public order. Unless the man is a coward, he will defend them so long as breath remains in his body, and he will feel your appeal as an insult to his manhood. The South fights both for its purse and its life. Property, civil and political rights, the honour and chastity of women, are words of well-defined, tangible meaning. They represent no vain abstractions, but facts which honourable men hold dear and deem it a sacred duty to defend. We challenge the casuists of the North to state what else the South contends for, or what equally holy motive they can allege for their cause. When the Southern States withdrew from the Federal compact, they took with them naught but their own soil and the population that inhabited it. They left to the North the prestige and substantial power of a constituted Government, with all its machinery in actual operation; they left it an army, a navy, a treasury, a boundless, unsettled territory wherefrom to carve new empires. They laid no claims to these, threatened them not, coveted them not. All they claimed was the right to be let alone, and attend to their own affairs in their own way. To sit under their own vine and fig-tree, to live at peace with all nations, was their earnest and sincere desire. Situated as they were, it would have been worse than folly to have desired otherwise. They had everything to lose, nothing to gain, by a war in which they must needs be inferior in all save courage and cheerful self-devotion. When the North forced them to assert by arms the title to their own soil and the allegiance of their own citizens, they did so with reliance upon God, who ever defends the right, though they lacked every artificial requisite which nations prepare for war. Their very destitution in arms, money, munitions, manufactures, allured their enemies to the evil deed, and has been sometimes pleaded as a justification of the wrong even in Europe.

And now, suppose this people, which has shed its best blood without stint against hirelings collected from the refuse population of all Europe, to suddenly lay down its arms, surrender its leaders to the halter, resign its women to the insults of a vulgar conqueror, its own civil and political rights to the whims of military pro-consuls—would not the contempt of all the civilized world be the certain and just punishment of such unprecedented and infamous cowardice? The name of Southerner would become a by-word and a scorn; and yet there are persons, on both this and the other side of the Atlantic, who expect and wish men of the Anglo-Saxon race to do so. Were there one right of the North, one jot of its property, one foot of its territory, which the South impugned, and the surrender of which it made the condition of peace, we should raise our voice against its pretensions in the same manner, and for the same reasons, that we now appeal to the tribunal of nations for a condign condemnation of the course adopted and persisted in by the United States.

Deeply and conscientiously impressed with the conviction that by its silence Europe lends a sanction to one of the greatest outrages that have ever been committed upon justice and humanity, we believed it due to the dignity and honour of this great nation, that Parliament, the most august representative assembly in the world, and by this the palladium of true constitutional liberty, should not adjourn without expressing what we sincerely believe to be the well-nigh unanimous public opinion of Great Britain. If, in the judgment of the wise men of the nation, the time has not yet arrived for the recognition of the Confederate States, at least let it be proclaimed to the world that England, the land of free men and free women, is not indifferent to the undeserved sufferings of their fellow-beings of the same race. Come in what shape it may, in the form of a solemn protest against the continuance of the war, an assurance of sympathy to the injured, an authorization of Government to avail itself of the first opportune moment to bring about, by peaceful means, a relinquishment of the unjust pretensions of the North upon the territories and rights of its late partners under the Federal compact; in whatever form this expression may come, it will produce a salutary effect. At the North it will revive the hopes of those who are weary of the war and sickened of its consequences. At the South it will win back to England those affections which are rapidly becoming alienated. If the talented and far-sighted Member for Galway, whose name must ever be inseparably linked with Southern independence, and who from the first appears to have understood the true issues involved, and boldly advocated the cause of justice when it was yet clouded by the ingenious sophistry of its opponents, would make himself the mouthpiece of the sentiment which we know to be entertained by the vast majority of Englishmen in and out of Parliament, we do not doubt that it would express itself in a form in which it would be acceptable not only to his colleagues, but to the Government. We go even further, and assert that if it is to be done at all, it must be done by him. The honourable prominence which he has won as the thorough master of this difficult and little understood subject, and as the unflinching supporter of the South through good and evil report, devolves upon him duties and responsibilities which he would be the last to shirk. He can speak with an authority in this matter to which few others can pretend, and upon him now rests the decision whether the British public shall speak through its lawful representatives, or whether the opinion shall be allowed to go abroad that Great Britain reserves her judgment until the chance of battles has shown where lays the might, if not the right.

The Ingredients of the Contending Armies.

WHEN men speak of money as being the sinews of war, they assert that which is only partially true. No doubt large resources often conduce to victory, though they do not insure it, and it is certain that nations have often carried on war successfully with very limited means. Notwithstanding all the modern and costly improvements in the art of warfare, notwithstanding the arrogant boast of the United States during the Crimean war, that the taking of Sebastopol was merely a commercial question, it is a fact that the reliable sinews of war are the men that compose the army. For parade purposes, any people—Mexican or Chinese—can be converted by drill into good soldiers, but it requires inherent fighting qualities to make good fighting soldiers. Besides the mere physical pluck and endurance, much depends upon the spirit that animates an army. Mercenary troops have often displayed great bravery and determination on the field of battle; but the endurance that is not daunted by privations or discouraged by all but overwhelming odds, or dispirited by reverses, is the offspring of a nobler motive than the hope of pay and plunder. In the memorable contest that issued in the independence of the Netherlands, the Spaniards, animated by the hope of booty, displayed wonderful resolution and devotion. Notwithstanding this, the enormous power of Spain could not crush the determination of the Netherlands to maintain those liberties and rights that were dearer than life and property. Hence it is that history does not record a single instance of the permanent subjugation of a people determined to vindicate their independence. Remembering this, if we glance at the ingredients of the contending armies that are now waging deadly war in America, we discover another assurance of the invincibility of the South.

The change of Government, engendered by Secession, was effected in the most peaceable, orderly, and constitutional manner, without noisy demonstration, and without one thought of the deadly hostilities that have ensued. Not only were the Confederates unprovided with the munitions of war, but the possibility of the North trampling on the Constitution which it professed to serve, and warring against the independence of sovereign States with whom it had been in federation, was not even entertained. The call to arms found the citizens of the Confederacy busied with peaceful pursuits; but at that call to defend country and home against the lawless design of the North to attempt the conquest of the fair and rich domains of the South, every citizen evinced his patriotism by offering his services as a soldier. No wonder, despite the unpreparedness, it was an easy matter to organize the Southern army. The regiments that sprang up, as if by magic, were manned by the scions of the noblest and richest families. Lawyers forsook their clients—physicians, their patients—planters, their broad estates—to become private soldiers, and to submit to discipline as rigorous and uncompromising as the discipline of any army in the world. There was no clamouring for commissions; the only demand was to be enrolled in the army destined for the defence of the country. In the diary we have been publishing, entitled “Three Months in the Confederate Army,” the organization of a company is described that was composed of young men whose birth, education, and wealth entitled them to mingle with the highest circles of society. The social standing of the members of that company was not exceptional. In the sacred cause of national independence, it was thought that no sacrifice could be too precious; the higher a man stood, the more he felt bound to offer his life on the altar of patriotism. Of course, citizens of inferior social grades rallied round the Confederate standard; but in the Confederate army there was not a foreign regiment—not one mercenary soldier. Those who had the means furnished their own equipments, found their own rations, and expected no pay. Those who had not the means accepted cheerfully such equipment, rations, and pay, as the Government could offer. In short, the army of the South was, and is, an army of patriots. No marvel that, though cut off from warlike supplies, the Confederates have held their own against their enemy, superior in numbers, and having the advantage of unlimited access to the stores of Europe. No marvel such an army is not disheartened by the loss of frontier cities, and feels confident that the sacred cause for which it contends must triumph, even though that triumph may be preceded by great tribulation.

We have looked at the composition of the patriotic army of the South, let us briefly notice the ingredients of the marauding army of the North.

At the outbreak of the war, or rather, in the excitement before the outbreak of the war, unquestionably many citizens of the United States enrolled themselves as “Three Months’ Men.” How did they act? On the eve of the memorable Battle of Bull Run, at the sound of the Confederate artillery, these “Three Months’ Men” found all their martial ardour had evaporated; pleaded that their term of service had expired; and made from the field and the roar of the enemy’s artillery. We say, advisedly, that from that time few, very few, natives of the United States, always excepting the levies made in some of the Western States, have been found enrolled in the Northern armies. When there is a panic about the safety of Washington, the 7th New York Regiment marches down Broadway, with flying colours, amidst the cheers of the mob, and proceeds to Washington, feeling confident, if there is any actual danger, they will scent it afar, and be able to make a prudent return to New York with whole skins. Whether there is such a thing as bravery amongst the natives of the North, as well as braggadocio, we know not; but we do know that the natives of the North have not shared the perils of the wicked war waged against the South. They are like a well-known Italian Revolutionist, who is a physical and moral coward as well as a cunning knave, and who hires assassins to do the bloody and treacherous work that he himself is afraid to attempt.

One of the fast regiments raised by the Federals was Wilson’s Fire Zouaves, composed of the jail birds of New York. Well, perhaps it is as honourable to carry on an aggressive war with convicts as with foreign mercenaries; and the army of the North is mainly composed of foreigners, the majority of whom are Germans, who only fight for present pay and plunder, and the hope of sharing the spoils of the conquered South. Not only is there a large German element in almost every regiment, but some divisions are wholly composed of Germans; for example, General Sigel, who, in the revolution of ’48, was the leader of the Baden insurgents, and is now entrusted with a high command in the Federal army, is not a naturalized citizen of the United States. So important does the Federal Government consider it to maintain and increase their influence over the Germans, that Mr. Schurtz, who has only lived six years in America, was appointed United States Ambassador to Spain, as the reward of political harangues to his countrymen. Let any one take up the muster-roll of the Northern army, and he will perceive that we do not unjustly designate it an army of foreign mercenaries. Sometimes the scourgings of the Northern cities are attracted by the bounty to enter, or are pressed into the service—of such men was composed the division of General Casey, that imitated the cowardly conduct of the “Three Months’ Men” at Bull Run, by running away at sight of the enemy, and leaving their braver companions to bear the brunt of the battle. Convicts, a pusillanimous mob, a sprinkling of native Americans, but mainly mercenaries, compose the army that, in the name of humanity, endeavours to trample on the rights of humanity; that, under the plea of defending the Constitution of the United States, violates that Constitution; that is, in fact, the instrument of the dollar-worshipping people of the North to steal the liberties of the South; not that the Northerners care for their own or any other nation’s liberty, but they crave for the conquest of the South, because they lust for the riches of the South. Happily, they must kill before they can take possession, and the spirit of Southern liberty is invulnerable, and the North cannot hire a sufficient number of foreign mercenaries to exterminate 8,000,000 of a superior race.

To those who are astonished, and perhaps grieved, at the terrible bitterness evoked in the South by the ruthless invasion of the North, we commend the calm consideration of the ingredients of the contending armies, confident that then they will no longer wonder at or condemn the loathing and deadly animosity so universally manifested.

The Cotton Famine.

SOME surprise has been expressed that we have not from week to week recorded and commented on the progress of the cotton famine. Our silence is not the result of indifference. Amidst the din of war, the sharp cry of Lancashire distress has rung in our ears and palled on our heart. Deeply sympathizing, as we do, with the sufferings and privations of a kindred people, engaged in a life and death struggle for freedom, for the sanctity of home, for national existence, and for individual happiness, we have and do deeply deplore the heartrending misery of the manufacturing districts. We have admired the wonderful and unexampled patience with which the affliction has been borne. We have been silent, because we would not intrude on sorrow so bravely endured, especially as we could not suggest any prospect of speedy relief, and we shrink from adding to affliction by mocking it with delusive hopes, and by suggesting comforting expectations that cannot be realized. Only those who are ignorant of the gravity of the situation will think we treat it with undue solemnity, and we trust that we shall not write a line that can justify our bitterest opponent in charging us with an attempt to make political capital out of a national calamity.

We have not before us the latest accounts of the state of the manufacturing districts. The returns from which we quote are a fortnight old, and although within the last two weeks there has been a considerable increase in the amount of pauperism, they are sufficiently gloomy to give some conception of the indescribable misery. At Blackburn 11,193 persons were receiving relief, and out of this number 4064 are designated as able-bodied. At Preston 10,810 persons were dependent on parochial aid, and the relief committee had 17,189 claimants on their bounty. At Stockport, out of a population of 30,745, there were, on June 14, 1826 paupers, being equal to 6 per cent. of the population. At Wigan, 3193 persons were relieved by the guardians during the week. We might continue this list, but we have given sufficient examples of the state of pauperism prevailing in the manufacturing districts. But the amount of pauperism, though it indicates, does not set forth the extent or depth of the sufferings. We need not say that the relief afforded, though sufficient to ward off starvation, does not supply any of the comforts, and barely the necessities, of existence. The haggard looks of the recipients of parochial relief show what a narrow line separates, avowed pauperism from sheer starvation. We do not complain that the guardians of the poor are niggardly; we do not say that the rich have not contributed liberally to the need of their unfortunate neighbours; but it is impossible for the best devised system of poor law, aided by the most bountiful private benevolence, to avert the dire effects of an industrial famine.

We must remember that avowed pauperism is, with the industrial classes of England, the last resource. Only when the hard-earned savings have been withdrawn from the bank and expended, when the little credit with the shopkeeper is exhausted, when every article of the slightest value is pawned, when the children cry for bread, and cry in vain, when it is manifest that hunger heralds the approach of death, does the British artisan apply for that aid to which he is legally and morally entitled.

The thousands who seek parochial assistance represent thousands who need it and will not seek it. It is no use disguising the fact that our fellow-creatures in the manufacturing districts are dying from starvation. We do not mean that relief is ever refused, but though it is sufficient to prevent the tragedy of death from absolute destitution, it does not maintain the health and vigour necessary to resist disease. It is well known that after a famine there is a fearful mortality amongst those who were subject to its ravages. However, it is in vain to dwell upon a calamity which may be seen and felt, but which cannot be imagined or portrayed.

The cotton famine is exceptionally distressing, not only by reason of the certainty that it must last a long time, but that the term of its duration cannot be defined. When it pleases Providence to blight our harvests, we look hopefully toward the succeeding harvest; but what are our prospects with respect to cotton? In the Southern States immense quantities of the invaluable staple have been burnt to prevent it falling into the hands of the Northern invaders. Large quantities have been left unpacked and unginned, and are consequently spoilt by the damp. Wherever the Northerners penetrate into the cotton growing States, the torch will be unhesitatingly applied by the patriotic people of the South. Even should a large quantity be saved from destruction by the non-success of the Federal arms, it cannot reach Europe until the blockade is actually raised by the termination of hostilities. Meanwhile, during the continuance of the war, grain is sown in the place of cotton. The sooner the war is over and the Southerners are enabled to return to the pursuits of peace, the sooner the cotton famine will be at an end; but an immediate peace would not afford immediate and complete relief.

The idea of obtaining supplies of cotton from India, Jamaica, or Africa, to compensate for the loss of the American supplies, is chimerical. Even if cotton could be profitably grown in those countries at present prices, some time must elapse before any considerable quantity could be produced, and the speculation is discouraged, because when the Southern States again enter into competition the prices will be rapidly reduced. Constant appeals are made to manufacturers to invest money in Indian cotton cultivation. Why do they not heed the suggestion? They suffer immensely by the cotton famine, and would derive a permanent benefit by bringing Indian cotton into competition with American cotton, since such rivalry would reduce the price of the article. The Manchester men are too shrewd to be imposed upon by philanthropic schemes to alter and control the dispensations of Providence. They know the experiment has been tried in India and has failed. They know that the plea of want of capital is delusive. There is no lack of capital in India to cultivate indigo or any other produce that will yield a fair profit. The Government has been asked to encourage the growth of cotton in India. How can it do so? Granting that India can produce the kind of cotton required, how can the Government insure the grower the present high prices? But a single fact is better than a thousand theories. Since the outbreak of the American war the production of cotton in India has not been increased, and it is supposed that it has decreased.

The agents of the United States assured the Lancashire mill-hands that as soon as the Southern ports were taken—in thirty, sixty, or ninety days—plenty of cotton would be forthcoming. Some of the ports have been occupied by the Federals; but where is the promised cotton? And these agitators have shamefully deceived the English artisans as to the cause of the war. They have pretended it is a war for the emancipation of the negro, well knowing that the North hates the negro, and would not spend a dollar to save the whole race from utter ruin. The Northern agitators are perfectly aware that the war is instigated by Northern avarice and by no higher or better motive. They have contended that the subjugation of the South would be beneficial to the manufacturing interests of England; yet they know the United States not only imposes a high duty on the import of English fabrics, but intends to levy an export duty on cotton. It has been stated by the Northern agitators that the people of the United States are friendly to the people of England; yet they must have been aware that the United States' people are our bitter foes; that they openly avow a desire to injure us; that they embrace every opportunity of insulting us, and only wait until they are rid of the Southern war to begin an English war, if they can find the means for so doing. The Northern agitation is in itself bad taste, for no circumstances can justify the agents of one country agitating in another and friendly country. But the way the Northern agitation has been conducted increases its offensiveness. The most gross and unscrupulous misrepresentations have been used to deceive the English working classes; and efforts have been made to sow the seeds of enmity between the employed and their employers.

When the cotton famine will be over we will not pretend to predict; but it will not be terminated by the production of Indian cotton, or by the success of the Federal arms. We trust that when the labouring people of England discover how they have been duped by the agents of the United States they will still continue to exhibit the excellent and orderly bearing that has already won for them universal admiration and respect.

Reviews.

SOUTHERN STATISTICS.

I.—THE UNITED STATES' CENSUS OF 1850.

WE propose to contribute a series of papers on Southern Statistics, founded on the United States' census of 1850. We do not intend to advocate or support theories by stringing together an imposing array of figures, or even to pursue the course, though it is perfectly legitimate, of deducing theories from ascertained and admitted facts. The unadorned eloquence of facts and figures is always the most lucid and the most convincing. By the analysis, comparison, and sometimes syncretical arrangement of the returns comprised in the United States' census, we hope to present an animated picture of the social and political characteristics, condition, and progress of the Southern States of America. As a rule, statistical studies are unattractive to the general reader; when, however, statistics are the oracle of a people's past history and future prospects, they not only appeal to the reasoning faculties, but are invested with a lively interest that makes them fascinating as well as instructive.

The census of 1860 was taken; but, owing to the war, it has not been prepared for publication, and under the most favourable circumstances could not yet have made its appearance; the last census was not printed until three years and five months after it had been commenced. The latest census at our disposal is that of 1850, but this is sufficient for our purpose; because, compared with the census of 1830 and that of 1840, it establishes a uniform ratio of progression. That the ratio of increase has not been diminished we learn from the census of some of the States taken since 1850, as well as by the United States' trade returns. Practically, the census of 1850 is as useful and reliable for our purpose as would have been, if published, the census of 1860.

The United States' census is, from its completeness, minuteness, and felicitous arrangement, a splendid specimen of the power of skillful organization, and a creditable and enduring testimony to the enterprise of the American people. The schedules of the census of 1850 consisted of 640,000 pages, and they were prepared by forty-five marshals and 3231 assistant-marshals. Before being sent to press, the returns were most carefully revised. The cost of the census of 1850 was 1,318,027 dollars, being equal to rather less than six cents per head of the population. The elaboration of details leaves nothing to be desired. Take the agricultural returns as an example. There is first a table showing the number of farms in each State; the number of acres of improved land; the quantity of unimproved land; the average number of acres to each farm; the aggregate cash value of farms; the value of farming implements and machinery; the average value of each farm; the average value of farming implements, and machinery; and the average value of farms, implements, and machinery. Such ample tables relieve the student from the trouble of evolving details, and they even suggest instructive comparisons. Besides these elaborate returns, we have an account of the produce of each county in each State—not merely an account of the value of the products of each county, but of the quantity of each article produced. The educational and religious statistics are likewise carefully prepared.

And such elaboration enables us not only to test the arithmetical accuracy of the tables, but also the reliability of the data on which they are founded. The returns of population give the white, free coloured, and slave population for each county of each State. There is, likewise, a table of the increase of the population from 1810, and, in some cases, from 1790 to 1850, and a table of the "nativities" of the white and free coloured population. By comparing the United States' immigration returns with the census returns of "born in foreign countries," we are struck with the amazing accuracy of the latter; and we are able to trace the settlement of emigration, and to divine how much of the increase of each State is due to its prolificness, and how much to the influx of emigrants. In 1850 Virginia, with a free population of 949,133, had 22,985 inhabitants who were born in foreign countries; whilst Michigan, with a free population of 397,654, had no less than 54,703 inhabitants born in foreign countries. Further, in Virginia, out of the free population of 949,133, there were 57,986 persons born out of the State, and in the United States, and the number of persons born in the State was 867,691; whilst in Michigan, out of a population of 397,654, no less than 203,229 persons were born out of the State and in the United States, and the number of persons born in the State was 138,497. Persons migrating from one State to another are frequently emigrants disappointed in their first settlement, or, at all events, they are the unsuccessful, discontented members of Society. How important are such returns as those we have been quoting from, considering that, by the Constitution of the United States, the old and settled State of Virginia has no more votes in the Senate than Michigan, and that in the House of Representatives the emigrant and newly-settled people of Michigan returned as many representatives as a like number of the rich and settled people of Virginia. Such an arrangement was of itself sufficient to dissolve the Federal compact.

The agricultural returns are equally instructive. We find the South is vastly more productive than the North, and that the South yields more than three-fourths of the exports of the United States. As soon as these facts are presented, we understand why the North advocates a protection tariff, and why the South determines upon the adoption of a free trade policy. Moreover, we must be struck with the unfitness of a federation binding together peoples with interests so diverse; and we cannot fail to see the germ of the separation that must hereafter take place between the West and North, just as the South has now been severed from the North. Whether the North will be able to stand well, when she stands alone, we need not discuss, but it is just and expedient that her monopoly should be taken away, and that the priceless commerce of the South should be open to the competition of the world. The attempt of the North to subjugate the South likewise becomes intelligible when we investigate the returns of productiveness of the two sections.

We cannot wonder at the money and time devoted to the compilation of the United States' census, when we reflect that it regulates the basis of representation and decides the political fate of each State and each section of the Federation; and to a great extent indicates the political condition of the Union, for it shows the number of Irish and German emigrants that have been added to the list of voters. The census records the growth of the population of the territories, and points to the formation of new States, and a consequent accession of power to one party or the other. A new State has as large a representation in the Senate as an old State. Not that we object to the equal Senatorial representation of unequal States, which only becomes injurious by the indiscriminate bestowal of the rights of citizenship; and the adoption of universal suffrage. The sovereign States are equal in respect to their sovereign rights; and to have regulated the Senatorial representation by the extent, riches, or population of the several States, would have been equivalent to placing the smaller States under the dominion of the larger States.

If the framers of the United States' Constitution had not avowedly and tacitly acknowledged the sovereign independence of the several States it would have been an act of monstrous, ridiculous injustice of the Convention to have placed Virginia, with a population of 442,115 on an equality with Rhode Island, having a population of 64,689. The equal Senatorial representation of unequal States is one of the many proofs that the abnegation of sovereignty was never contemplated by the States in entering into the Federal league.

However, inasmuch as considerable powers were vested in Congress, including the authority to raise a Federal revenue, it was deemed expedient that the Lower House should represent the several States according to their importance. Unfortunately, population was fixed upon as the basis of representation; yet, by allowing five slaves to count as three whites, in calculating the number of representatives, although it is known that the slaves did not and would not vote, it is evident that population was regarded as a test of property, and when the United States' Constitution was framed it was a very fair test. But of what value was the test in 1850, when, as may be seen, it gives as much power to emigrants and new settlers—persons possessing little property and little fitness for the exercise of the elective franchise—as to the settled population of the oldest State? Population continued to be the basis of representation, but population was no longer a criterion of responsibility. Power divorced from responsibility naturally degenerated into tyranny—and in the case of the United States, into that worst of all tyranny, the tyranny of the mob. But the bad enough and destructive in itself, was augmented by a evil very peculiar arrangement.

When new States were admitted, or old States had so increased as to be entitled to more members, instead of adding to the number of the House of Representatives, the representation of other States was diminished; that is to say, after each census the ratio of representation was fixed, and so that the number of representatives did not increase with the number represented. In 1850 an Act was passed fixing the ratio at the quotient obtained by dividing 233 into the whole representative population. In 1790 there was one representative to 33,000 persons; in 1850 there was one representative to 93,420 persons. In 1800 Virginia had twenty-three, and Indiana one representative; in 1850 Virginia had thirteen, and Indiana eleven representatives. In 1800 North Carolina had two representatives, and Ohio one; in 1850 Ohio had twenty-one representatives, and North Carolina but eight. Arithmetically, Virginia and North Carolina had lost respectively ten and four votes—North Carolina had lost five, because in 1810 her representatives were equal to thirteen. But the arithmetical difference does not represent the real difference. What became of the votes taken from Virginia? Suppose they were bestowed upon a State with political instincts opposed to the politics of Virginia. If the opposition State had been invested with ten votes without taking from the votes of Virginia, the votes of Virginia would have been diminished by ten; but Virginia being first deprived of ten votes, and then, with her remaining thirteen votes, having to encounter a new opposition of ten votes, her loss practically amounts to twenty votes. It is not surprising that such an arrangement should have been extremely distasteful to the old States. It was not agreeable, with an increasing population, to have a diminishing representation, but it was intolerable that this diminution should be made a means of the complete nullification of political influence.

The Presidential election is dependent on the returns of population. Each State, according to its representation in Congress, casts votes. Supposing that the ten votes of Virginia had been bestowed upon States opposed to the Virginian policy, then in the Presidential election Virginia had but three votes. When we consider not only the enormous patronage, but the constitutional power of the President, we must admit that it is of paramount importance to each State to be fully represented in the Presidential election. No sooner was the census of 1850 published, than the South found that, unless she could defend herself by party organization, her political independence was gone; and the North rejoiced in the prospect of dominion over the richest of the Federal States. In the last election the North exerted its power and returned Mr. Lincoln, although he was opposed by the united South; that is, the Northern politicians endeavoured to impose on the South a candidate universally rejected. And the often repeated remark about the North only doing to the South as the South had done unto the North, is founded on gross ignorance, or is a wilful falsehood. The South never imposed a President on the North who had been universally rejected by the North. Nor is Mr. Lincoln the elect of the people. When the popular votes are added up, there is a considerable majority against Mr. Lincoln. Some of the Northern States chose him by a plurality of votes—not an absolute majority; and, as we have remarked, the South unanimously opposed him. If the Southern States had not been deprived of their representative votes, notwithstanding the additional votes bestowed on Anti-Southern States, Mr. Lincoln would have been rejected, and Secession postponed.

It is not at all surprising that the United States' census should be carefully and elaborately compiled, since upon its returns depends the political government of the country. Future historians will find in the census of 1850 a full exposition of the cause of Secession.

THE COLONIAL HISTORY OF VIRGINIA.*

In the State Paper Office is preserved an account of America, given by certain persons who travelled "in the aforesaid countries":—the women were arrayed in armour of gold; in every cottage there were pearls, and in some houses a peck of them; there were fiery dragons, "which make the air very red as they fly;" "banqueting houses built of crystal, with pillars of massive silver, some of gold;" and many other such wonders were testified to by one David Ingram, and doubtless believed by our forefathers. If the future of America had been revealed to David Ingram, and he had published the revelation, he would have been scouted as a maniac. If he had announced that "the aforesaid countries" would in less than three centuries be peopled with Europeans and their descendants, differing in many essential particulars, but all speaking the English language, and that a war of enormous proportions would be waged in "the aforesaid countries," and have the effect of paralyzing the commerce and industry of Europe, no man would have credited his report. The bare truth is infinitely more marvellous than the wild fables of David Ingram. We intend, by the aid of Mr. Sainsbury's excellent calendar of colonial state papers, to glance at some interesting particulars of the colonization of Virginia; and our object in doing so is not so much to produce a pleasant and readable paper, as to show that Virginia was peopled by a race essentially differing from the colonists of the Northern States. Not the least wonderful of the incidents of American history is the marked distinctions between the people of the North and the South; distinctions not engendered by climate or by the institution of slavery, but which were inherent in the fathers of the American nations.

Virginia was essentially an aristocratic colony; the adventurers who settled Virginia, not only did so by permission of the Crown, but under the auspices and patronage of the Crown. Whether it be true or false, as asserted by Northern writers, that the first adventurers were the wild and reckless scions of the English aristocracy, who went to Virginia because they had wasted their fortunes at home, it is unquestionable that they were the representatives of noble English families, that they were men of dauntless resolution, and though unwaveringly loyal to King and Church, were free from that narrow sectarian bitterness of spirit which is the marked characteristic of Puritanism. During the civil troubles in England, and the Protectorate of Cromwell, Virginia became the asylum for those loyalists, who thought it better to go into exile rather than live under a Government to the principles of which they were strenuously and conscientiously opposed. When King Charles was restored to the throne, his Virginian subjects evinced the greatest delight, and the colony became the resort of loyalists who were infected with the spirit of adventure. We do not say, that Puritans never took up their abode in Virginia; for there were no laws or regulations to exclude them; but a colony so loyal to King and Church must have been distasteful.

We may observe, in passing, that the Virginia colonized in the manner and by the class we are describing, is the Virginia of to-day, and does not include the territories ceded after the War of Independence.

The colonization of Virginia was not effected without great sufferings and dangers. The native King Powhatan proved a somewhat determined and dangerous enemy. Captain Newport reported in 1607 that the adventurers could not expect to remain at peace with the natives, and had fortified themselves, and built a small town, which they called Jamestown. In 1610 Lord de la Warr arrived in Virginia, and found the settlement of Jamestown in a wretched condition, both with respect to the mortality of the people and the unprofitableness of the enterprise. The next year, Sir Thomas Dale, though admitting the difficulties of the position, was convinced that, with 2000 men, he could conquer Powhatan, and secure the permanence of the colony. "On account of the difficulty of procuring men in so short a time all offenders out of the common gaols condemned to die should be sent for three years to the colony. So do the Spaniards people the Indies. Their little colony murmurs at their present state for want of English provisions." Happily for Virginia, the 2000 condemned convicts were not forthcoming. It is rather curious that, placed in such a fertile country, the colonists should have been languishing for English provisions. Powhatan, before the year 1616, must have been temporarily conciliated, for when Sir Thomas Dale returned to England he brought with him Pocahontas, the daughter of the said Powhatan, who was married to one of the English adventurers named Rolfe. The lady was introduced to the King, and was so mightily pleased with her reception, that she was loth to return to her native land, and died at Gravesend from disappointment, if not from a broken heart. In 1622 John Chamberlain reports to Sir Audley Carleton that a ship had arrived from Virginia, "with news that the savages had by surprise slain about 350 of the English, through their own supine negligence in living in scattered and straggling houses." We are inclined to think that more blame is to be attached to the Home authorities for not sufficiently caring for the protection of the settlers.

In 1623 considerable excitement was caused in England by Captain Butler's information, entitled, "The Unmasking of Virginia," and which the Governor, Council, and the Assembly of Virginia declared to be full of slander and notorious untruths; they ascribed many of the colonial mishaps to the bad conduct of Captain Butler, whom they accused of entering into an alliance with the Indians, because he was not admitted as one of the Council. This letter of remonstrance is signed by Sir Francis Wyatt, Francis West, Sir George Eardley, Isaac Maddison, W. Peirce, and twenty-seven other persons. To this was added a paper, setting forth the miseries of the colony during the twelve years' home governorship of Sir Thomas Smythe.

Spain was extremely jealous of the English settlement in Virginia, and constantly protested against it. Had it not been for the discouraging position of the colony, and the opinion generally entertained that it must die out, it is likely enough Spain would not have been contented with diplomatic protests. The domestic troubles of Virginia saved her from foreign aggression.

The complaints of the Indians are continual. In April, 1623, an account is furnished by George Sandys, of twenty-six well-armed men, under the command of Captain Spilman, being cut off and taken prisoners. At the same time Sir Francis Wyatt, the Governor, finds serious fault with the carelessness of the people. Some persons, whilst trading, had been surprised by the Indians, and had not the opportunity "of discharging a piece." The Governor declares his opinion: "Without doubt, we must drive them (the Indians) or they us out of the country." Yet just before this, the Great King had sent a peaceful embassy to the English Government, and his overtures had been accepted. The native terms were, "that if they were suffered to plant at Pamunkey, and their former seats, they would send home about twenty prisoners saved from the massacre at Martin's Hundred." Mrs. Boys, one of the prisoners, returned to the colony, "appareled like an Indian queen." The loyal observation of the treaty was not intended. The Governor and Council, in addressing the Earl of Southampton, suggested, "that if the savages send home the English prisoners, and grow secure upon this treaty, the colony will have the better advantage to surprise them and cut down their corn." This looks like reprehensible conduct on the part of the English settlers, yet it was somewhat justified by necessity. It was not to be expected that the savages would observe the compact when a favourable opportunity presented itself for breaking it with advantage. The colony was too weak to defy the natives, and the only practical policy was to oppose cunning to cunning. Many and sincere efforts had been made to establish friendly relations, but they had all proved abortive. The presence of the English was an unpardonable offence, and the native propensity for theft was too strong to be resisted. Happily, the savages did not think of combination, for had they done so the little colony would have been annihilated. On the whole, the way the Virginian settlers treated the savages was singularly forbearing. It was only after repeated massacres that a spirit of distrust was raised, and the radical treachery of the savages understood.

Next year (1624) the Governor and Council report their proceedings to the Virginia Company; "recount the wars in which they have been engaged with the savages; how they have cut down their corn, burnt their houses, 'and slaughtered many.' That they have also revenged the treachery of the Pascatronics and their associates—the greatest people in those parts—for cutting off Captain Spilman and Mr. Puntis's pinnace, and murdering great numbers of their ancient allies, the Patowmacks. They had no small difficulty to maintain a war by unwilling people, and were constrained to desist for want of means to feed the soldiers. No hope of subduing these barbarous and perfidious Indians but by stratagem; neither fair war nor good quarter can ever be held with them." It is clearly impossible to have fair war with savages, and the only way of keeping them in order is by awing them with heavy punishments. This seems to have been the colonial stratagem, and it is the best and only one available. It will be noticed that the plan of forming native alliances had been adopted; but how, in 1624, the Patowmacks could have been our ancient allies, passes our comprehension, seeing that the colony was yet in its infancy.

The cultivation of tobacco was the main object of the colonists. The Council fixed the price at three shillings per pound for the best quality, and one shilling and eightpence for the second quality. The King, by reason of his gracious desire to promote the welfare of the colonies, granted to the Virginia and Somers Island Companies "the sole importation into the King's dominions." Assuredly the encouragement was needed, for Davison, the Secretary to the Council, writes to the effect that "he cannot yet pay Mr. Bland his thirty pounds of tobacco, because he has not yet received so much from his five tenants, all that are alive, nor one grain of corn to help them."

* Calendar of State Papers, Colonial Series, 1571-1606. Preserved in the State Paper Department of Her Majesty's Public Record Office. Edited by W. NOEL SAINSBURY, Esq. London: Longman and Co.

The Council was called upon to decide some curious cases, as a sample of which we may cite that of Mrs. Cicely Jordan, who married four days after the death of her husband, and almost immediately repudiated the second contract, and entered into a third alliance. The following is Mr. Sainsbury's note of the transaction :—

June 4, 1623. Examinations of Captain Isaac and Mary Maddison, and Sergeant John Harris, taken before Sir Francis Wyatt (Governor), Sir George Yeardley, George Sandys (Treasurer), Dr. John Pott, Captains Roger Smyth and Ralph Hamor, and John Puntis; of the Council of Virginia; and Chr. Davison (Secretary), touching the supposed contract of marriage between Mr. Greville Pooley and Mrs. Cicely Jordan, three or four days after her husband's death. With note underwritten that Cicely Jordan, having since contracted herself to Will Ferrar before the Governor and Council, and disavowed the former contract, they are not able to decide so nice a difference, but desire the opinion of the civil lawyers.

Mrs. Cicely Jordan must have been a very fascinating dame, and, doubtless, a great acquisition to, though a somewhat incongruous member of, the young and struggling colony.

In 1623 the King urged upon the Archbishops of Canterbury and York the duty of helping the planters of Virginia in erecting churches and schools for the education of the children of the infidels. The clergy were to make four collections for this purpose in two years. Whether the collections were made we know not; but we feel sure that very little progress was made in the benevolent project of educating the juvenile savages.

A certain Captain Bailly propounded a scheme of emigration which has every merit except that of practicability. He proposed that 3000 poor should annually be sent to Virginia, each of them to be presented with twenty acres of land, a house, and victuals for a year. The worthy captain does not indicate where the houses and victuals are to come from. He suggests that every family in England should subscribe a penny; but the Government would not propose such a tax for such a purpose, and the people would not voluntarily take such a burden on themselves.

In 1624 a petition was presented to the King by the Governor, Council, and Assembly of Virginia, praying for his protection, and giving a very interesting history of the colony from its commencement to the year 1622. This account commences with the recital of the reasons given for settling the plantation in 1606. The first body of adventurers sent out numbered 100 persons, and when, nine months after, a second party of adventurers arrived they found only forty of the first party alive, and only ten of those able-bodied men. But four acres of ground had been cleared for the colony. We will continue by quoting Mr. Sainsbury's abstract :—

The second supply, sent in the Mary Margaret, with sixty persons, mostly gentlemen and some Poles, and about nine months after, Michaelmas (1608). In less than two months want compelled them to trade with the Indians for corn. Captain Samuel Argoll came in a small boat, but with neither men nor provisions. The following month the third supply arrived, called Sir Thomas Gates' fleet, of seven ships, and near 500 persons; but there were so few houses that these were quartered in an open field. The colony was then divided into three parties; the first, under Captain Francis West, to seek out the head of the river; the second, under Captain James Smith, then President, at Jamestown; and the third, under Captain John Martin, in Naumound River. The Indians forced them all to return, and famine compelled them to devour hogs, dogs, and horses, or what they could light upon. On May 20 (1610) Sir Thomas Gates and Sir George Somers happily arrived in two small boats. Their numbers at that time consisted of sixty persons. They soon resolved to leave the colony, hoping never to return, and had all embarked in two pinnaces when they met with Lord de la Warr, who had brought three good ships, 250 persons, and some store of provisions. Within a few months not less than 150 died of calenture or fever.

Broken health obliged Lord de la Warr to leave the colony, and shortly afterwards arrived Sir Thomas Dale, who "immediately published most tyrannous and cruel laws, sent over by Sir Thomas Smythe." "The colony continued in extreme misery and slavery for five years." During the governorships of Sir Thomas Dale and Gates, the pursuit of husbandry was forbidden, so that necessary improvements in fortifications and buildings might be effected. When peace was concluded with the savages, a mutiny was discovered among the colonists, which resulted in six executions. Under Governor Yeardley, the colony was prosperous, and a league was formed with the Indians, which lasted for ten years, because it was preceded by severe punishment. The colony suffered great misery during twelve years :—

No man was permitted to go home, but was kept in the colony by force. One man received the King's pass, closely made up in a garret, lest it should have been seized. Sir Thomas Dale, on his arrival, pulled Captain Newport's beard for affirming Sir Thomas Smythe's relation to be true.

Sir George Yeardley, on his arrival as Governor, set to work to reform abuses.

All who arrived before the departure of Sir Thomas Dale were made free; the cruel laws by which they were governed were abrogated; liberty was given to all to choose and plant their dividends of land; a general assembly was established and ordered to be held yearly, to consist of the Governor, Council, and two burgesses from each plantation, freely to be elected by the inhabitants. In three years the country was in a flourishing condition, which is described. In October 1621, Sir Francis Wyatt arrived as Governor, who confirmed them in all their privileges. Then came the massacre by the Indians, on the 22nd of March, 1622, that "almost defaced the beauty of the whole colony, and prevented the continuance of those excellent works wherein they had made so fair a beginning; and after that the famine of the following year. The colony has been revenged upon the savages, and in time it is hoped they will be driven from those parts."

The submission of proud, daring colonists for twelve years to the edicts of Sir Thomas Smythe, especially when even the persons in authority protested against them, is a proof, if proof were needed, that Virginia had not been settled by Puritans. It would have been easy to refuse obedience to mandates that could not have been enforced. But the men of Virginia were of a race who thought it was their duty to obey so long as obedience did not compromise their honour. They did not think personal offence a justification of revolt. They were of a race fitted to command, and therefore capable of exact and faithful obedience; and the spirit of the Virginian settlers survives in their descendants. The tyranny of the United States was submitted to so long as it only impeded the national prosperity of Virginia, rather than bring about a sweeping change in the Government; but as soon as it touched her honour, her independence, Virginia drew the sword, which she will not sheathe until her sovereign independence has been vindicated.

(To be continued.)

UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—If Parliament be indisposed to entertain and approve of abstract resolutions, both Parliament and the country are strangely averse to providing for possible contingencies. As a people, we are content to endure present evil, and enjoy present good, careless of the fact that, by our indifference as to what the morrow may bring forth, we may be unconsciously drifting towards a state of things fraught with unmitigated evil, and ruinous consequences to ourselves and our country. At the present moment our statesmen and speculative writers are engaged in watching the fortunes of the war between the Federal and Confederate States, and calculating the claims of each to our sympathy and assistance. They are too much occupied in watching the game to care about what will occur when it is played out. Now, the war cannot last for ever. The chances are that it will terminate sooner than the partisans of the North expect or desire. It is of paramount importance to us what attitude the North is likely to assume towards England at the close of this lamentable contest. To my mind there are good grounds for determining what that attitude will be. Whatever may be the issue of the present war, whether the North succeed in nipping Southern independence in the bud, and in restoring and maintaining a fraternal "Union" by means of fratricidal bayonets, or whether, as is more probable, and ten times more desirable, the Confederate States triumph in their gallant struggle for freedom, and manage to consolidate their power, it is almost certain that the North will embark in war with England, and the subject of war will be Canada. It were impossible to condense within narrow limits all the arguments which might be advanced in support of this view; but a few of them may be stated, and I shall proceed to mention the principal ones.

Let it be supposed that the North proves the victor, and manages, under the pretext of reconstructing the "Union," to found an empire which shall be governed by a despot with the meaningless title of President, it will naturally aim at extending its sway over our valuable North American possessions. All conquerors lust for fresh conquests; their appetites grow with what they feed on. A nation which has once entered on a career of aggression can never again return to its former peaceful state. In this it resembles a tiger which, having tasted human flesh, becomes an inveterate man-eater. The Federals may boast that natural laws which apply to all mankind are exceptionally suspended in their case, and their devoted and untiring European eulogists may believe them. They will assure these much-trusting eulogists that heretofore they have never coveted other people's territory, and hereafter they will neither covet nor try to acquire any. Those who are deluded by such assurances will be the earliest victims of the aggressive North. But suppose the North fails in its projects; suppose that, at the very outset of its career of conquest, it meets with a thorough and well-deserved defeat, will it not try and compensate itself for the loss of the Southern States by getting possession of Canada? That it will do so is only natural; that it purposes doing so is more than probable. I say nothing of the barefaced way in which engagements with us are about to be violated by the proposed construction of a Federal fleet for service in the Canadian lakes. That scheme is only now matured; but the design has been long in contemplation. Startling events succeed each other with such rapidity, that matters of comparative recent date are soon effaced from the memory of the public. For instance, it may have been forgotten that when Mr. Seward was candidate for nomination as President he made several speeches, impressing on his hearers that it was the interest and duty of the North to annex Canada without delay. Much of his popularity is owing to his entertaining that opinion. It is not affirming too much to conclude that he will aim at increasing his popularity by endeavouring to accomplish what he advocates. About a year and a half ago, when the Southern States were forming themselves into a Confederacy, and before the North had resolved or entered upon its insane crusade against the South, the New York Herald contained articles supporting and approving the course of policy proposed by Mr. Seward. Here are a few samples, taken from a leading article which appeared on February 9, 1861, of the doctrines then enunciated. In the first place, however, let me state one fact, to show how popular Secession was at that time in those Northern States which now so vehemently and pertinaciously call for the prosecution of the war. The State of Maine wished to follow the example of South Carolina. A petition signed by 16,000 persons was presented to the Legislature, praying that the State might be incorporated with Canada. The newspaper writer's comment on this is curious and characteristic :—"The eye of Lower Canada is fixed upon Maine, with its magnificent harbour of Portland, and our correspondent says the people of that State desire to be annexed by the Canadians. But at the North here we do not admit the right of any secession from us, while we annex all we can." The writer goes on to depict the miserable condition of the Canadians, to point out the remedy for their fancied ills, and concludes by informing them that they will be forced to swallow this remedy, whether they require it or not. His words are these :—"The united population of Canada is greater than the population of the thirteen colonies when they threw off the British yoke—a population too large, too free, and too enlightened to be dragged at the tail of another nation 3000 or 4000 miles distant from it." "It would make thirteen sovereign States, averaging in area thirteen States of the Northern Confederacy. Such a prize is not to be lost." "By peaceable means or force Canada must be annexed." "The contracted views of the people of Lower Canada will be enlarged and expanded by an infusion of the Anglo-Saxon element and the energy of the people of the Free States, who, being cut off from a Southern field of enterprise, must, by the law of their nature, expand northward and westward. Such is the decree of "manifest destiny," and such is the programme of W. H. Seward, Premier of the President Elect."

Whoever shall reflect on what has been written, said, and done by Northern politicians, must conclude, I think, that some day or other they will persuade their countrymen to attempt the conquest of Canada. It has been already stated, that, in whatever manner the present war may end, there will be equal inducements and incentives to make that attempt. If this be true, then it is our manifest duty to prepare for the inevitable attack, and in no other way can we do this so well as by securing the friendship of the Confederate States. Aided by them, we might defy the North to do its worst. In order to obtain their present friendship and future aid, we ought at once to recognize their independence. By this time, they have been sufficiently tried by the ordeal of battle to prove themselves worthy of the recognition of Europe. A year's fighting has not sufficed to give the North a single important advantage, or to inflict permanent injury on the South. Should the war go on for a year longer, it is more probable that the South, assuming the offensive, will overrun the North, than that the North will subjugate the South. I again repeat that, whatever be the issue, we may expect to be the object of Northern hatred and attack. As a nation, we should so act as to put the North in a position similar to that of the dying wolf in Lessing's fable. A wolf lay at his last gasp and was reviewing his past life. "It is true," said he, "I am a sinner, but yet, I hope, not one of the greatest. I have done evil, but I have also done much good. Once, I remember, a bleating lamb that had strayed from its flock came so near me that I might easily have throttled it, but I did it no harm." "I can testify to that," said his friend the fox, who was helping him to prepare for death; "I perfectly remember all the circumstances. It was just at the time you were so dreadfully choked with the bone in your throat." By cultivating the friendship of the Southern Confederacy, we need never fear for Canada, as the Confederacy will be a perpetual bone in the throat of the ravenous Northern wolf.

R.

THE POLICY OF THE WAR.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—In any great convulsion of nations, as in those of the material world, though various and often different effects are caused, according to the locality affected, yet the motive power is the same, and acts according to known rule; so the contest which is raging here with rapidly increasing fury seems to follow the law laid down. Had the United States been a nation under a monarchical rule, lawyers could understand the offence charged against the South as rebelling against constituted authority; but the public outside the nation cannot help seeing that, however ruled a bundle of States may be, and however strong such Union may prove, the moment the bond is loosed each State becomes disunited, and a new arrangement is imperative; and no one who looks at the question from this point of view can but confess that the idea is founded in fact. The Union was more the consent of the body politic to live under a stated rule than what law, as understood and defined by jurists in the Old World, even contemplated; and the soul of that consent is necessarily self-interest. Here, then, we may look for the law which should guide us in judging of this tremendous revolution. The feeling which has lashed the North into fury is the consciousness that the fabric was crumbling into dust, which on every occasion from their earliest years, private as well as public, was held up to them as the perfection of human wisdom; which the statesmen, orators, authors and even the mothers of the United States, incessantly held up to the admiration of their sympathizing auditors as the envy of the civilized world, and whose destiny was prophesied in even threatening tones to Europe. The South was well aware of its interests. It stands on the vantage ground of the letter of the Constitution. A violation of this instrument is something which the most obtuse can comprehend. A violation of its spirituality requires greater knowledge and intelligence than the masses usually bring to bear upon a national question. But even a clear intelligence of the nature of the disruption would only contemplate a delay of a generation or two. Its causes were too deeply seated, and to productive of inflammation and disease, not to affect the whole body politic even to dissolution. The South, therefore, must conquer its independence through a war as unequal as it is disastrous. Its defensive power is, undoubtedly, great, though impaired by that which makes its territory so valuable in time of peace, viz., the fact that it is intersected by great water-courses, which would naturally be in the power of whichever belligerent had the command of the sea. It has also a latent source of success, which no one in the United States has yet seemed to take into account. The interest of the West is with the South, though its sentiment is with the North. How much will the West be taxed? How far will the West endure taxation? Where will the West find the market for its produce? These are vital questions, the solution of which must necessarily affect the whole. The wisdom of the policy which has carried out the burning of the cotton and tobacco is clear; the war by this masterly stroke has offered to the enemy only hard knocks and no plunder; peace offers profits. The duration of war depends on the pertinacity with which this policy is carried out; the South can only meet the wealth of the North by poverty; and, paradoxical as it may seem at first sight, the greater the poverty the greater the strength. The ship can only ride out the storm under bare poles. Of course, I have not entered into the consideration of military matters. Information is not only so meagre, but so audaciously false, that a bystander, with only the opportunity of daily telegrams, almost invariably conflicting, can form no safe idea of such matters; but it seems to me clear, that when the whole foundations of our society are shaken, and the earthquake shakes not only the surface, but rends the rocks asunder, it is idle to talk of months to settle the State.

A NORTHERNER.

Washington, June 14.

COMMERCIAL VIEWS ON THE LATE COPARTNERSHIP OF AMERICAN STATES.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—No event of modern times has occupied so much public attention as the distressing conflict in America. Historians have been busy with their pens; statesmen have been active with their reasonings; the members of the press have been diligent in giving information; in fact, all classes have been profuse in their explanations concerning American affairs. It is seldom, however, that merchants dilate upon matters that may seem to be purely political; but, when the commercial monarch, King Cotton, is temporarily dethroned, practical lessons may be received from the counting-house. I would, therefore, ask you to reproduce the following articles originally published in the Times.

Yours, &c., H.

From the City Article of the Times, June 25, 1862.

The following illustration in a mercantile form of the points at issue between the Northern and Southern States of America presents a very clear idea of the nature of the cause for which the present unexampled waste of blood and treasure is being carried on, to the horror of the civilized world and the scandal of the 19th century:—

"A commercial firm engages in business, they provide for alterations in their articles of copartnership; but, either from accident, expectation that the firm will last the life of the partners, or that when interest or difference of opinion make a dissolution necessary or expedient, it will naturally take place, they omit any limit of time or any provision for dissolution.

"The firm is prosperous, lasts many years, and individual partners amass a capital equal, or nearly equal, to the original capital of the firm. Differences of opinion also arise, till at length three of the partners are satisfied that they cannot longer remain in the firm without a sacrifice of feeling and interest.

"The question is how are they to get out; the five other partners, they know, will not consent, and there seems to be nothing in the articles to enable the minority to get clear of their associates; but to be released they are determined at all hazards. They proceed to the bankers, and, by the power of signature they possess, they secure about what they consider their portion of capital. They then announce to their five associates their determination to dissolve; they propose to constitute two firms, and desire to continue on friendly terms, and if their proposal is accepted they are ready to come back with the money they have drawn, and have an amicable settlement of funds, paying back in case it should prove they had drawn more than their share.

"The five partners are taken by surprise. They point to the articles of copartnership to show that the three have no warrant there for what they have been doing, and, above all, inveigh against their proceedings at the bankers'.

"The three claim that there being no provision made for dissolution proves that the intention was to leave any partner to go out when he conceived it for his interest to do so, but they mean to go, at any rate.

"Two courses are open to the five aggrieved partners—to file a Bill in Chancery to compel a return of the three, in which process, if they spend half their own capital, they will have the satisfaction of destroying the whole of that of the three; the result, if successful, being to bring them back, with the capital of the whole wofully diminished, and the most bitter feeling engendered.

"The other course seems to be to accept the fact, though, perhaps, refusing to acknowledge the right; make the best bargain they can, each firm to go on in its own way; agreeing, in case of need, to support each other in case of any attack from outside, and be as good friends as they can be under existing circumstances; the five trusting, not unreasonably, to their superiority in capital and numbers to surpass the three, and perhaps make them eventually beg for readmission.

"The above seems very much the condition of the partnership of States in America, where eleven partners out of thirty determine to get out."

From the City Article of the Times, June 26, 1862.

The subjoined relates to the remarks inserted yesterday in illustration of the question as to the right, or otherwise, of the Southern States of America to terminate their partnership with the Northern States:—

"63, King William-street, E.C., June 25.

"Sir,—The illustration, in a mercantile form, of the points at issue between the Northern and Southern States of America, given in your Money-Market and City Article of this day, comparing those States to a firm composed of eight partners, whose articles of partnership do not contain any limit of time, or any provision for dissolution, is undoubtedly a correct comparison, as far as it goes; but by diving a little into American history the writer might have made his simile much more full and his case much stronger, which you will perhaps allow me to do.

"He might, and, indeed, he ought to have said, not only that in the articles actually ruling the partnership any limit of time was omitted, but that in the articles of partnership previously existing between the very same parties there was an express proviso, a fundamental clause, saying and repeating over and over again, 'the partnership shall be perpetual,' which proviso or clause of perpetuity the said partners, in making their new and actually ruling articles (in many points a copy of the previous ones), had carefully expunged from those articles, together with everything that could in any way bear on the subject; thus clearly showing that they fully intended each of them to be free to separate from, or at least not to be bound to remain for ever in, the partnership.

"In fact, in the 'Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union' between the thirteen States of North America, done at Philadelphia on the 9th of July, 1778, ratified by the thirteen States on the 1st of March, 1781—which were the Constitution of the United States of North America until the substitution thereto of the actual Constitution on the 17th of September, 1787—the thirteenth and last article says:—

"* * * * * The articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; * * * and we, the delegates * * * ratify and confirm each and every of the said articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union, * * * and solemnly plight and engage the faith of our respective constituents * * * that the Union shall be perpetual."

"And the second article institutes a Commission, to be drawn from the Congress, 'to hear and finally determine all controversies between two or more States, concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatsoever.'

"In the Constitution of the 17th of September, 1787, the actual one not only is there no allusion to time, duration, or dissolution of the Union; but, besides carefully expunging from their new Constitution the contents of the thirteenth article of their old one in respect to perpetuity, the States were so jealous of remaining unshackled, and free to separate at will, that they did actually expunge also from their new Constitution the Article 2 of their old one—evidently from fear that in case of the secession of one or more States, the remaining ones might, in abuse of their majority, form under the said Article 2 a Court or Commission, and pretend to adjudicate on the case.

To follow the simile of your illustration:—

"If the five partners mentioned in it were foolish enough to go into Chancery in order to retain the three seceding ones against their will, can any impartial and disinterested person doubt for a moment that, on proof being given not only of the absence in the articles of partnership of any provision for its duration, but of the positive and wilful expunction from them of a provision for perpetuity contained in the previous articles between the same parties, the Court would not even grant prolongation for one day of the partnership, but would simply fix a delay for the distribution and apportionment of the assets and liabilities?

"I think you might complete the said illustration by inserting this, on an important point which has not yet been touched or even alluded to by any one.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your most obedient servant,

"A. P."

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE NAVAL ENGAGEMENT IN HAMPTON ROADS.

CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

Navy Department, Richmond, April 7, 1862.

TO THE PRESIDENT:

SIR,—I have the honour to submit herewith copy of the detailed report of Flag-Officer Buchanan, of the brilliant triumph of his squadron over the vastly superior forces of the enemy, in Hampton Roads, on the 8th and 9th of March last; a brief report, by Lieutenant Jones, of the battle of the 8th, having been previously made.

The conduct of the officers and men of the squadron in this contest, reflects unfading honour upon themselves and upon the navy. The report will be read with deep interest, and its details will not fail to rouse the ardour and nerve the arms of our gallant seamen.

It will be remembered that the Virginia was a novelty in naval architecture, wholly unlike any ship that ever floated; that her heaviest guns were equal novelties in ordnance; that her motive power and her obedience to her helm were untried, and her officers and crew strangers, comparatively, to the ship and to each other; and yet, under all these disadvantages, the dashing courage and consummate professional ability of Flag-Officer Buchanan and his associates achieved the most remarkable victory which naval annals record.

When the Flag Officer was disabled, the command of the Virginia devolved upon her Executive and Ordnance Officer, Lieutenant Catesby Ap R. Jones, and the cool and masterly manner in which he fought the ship in her encounter with the iron-clad Monitor justified the high estimate which the country places upon his professional merit.

To his experience, skill, and untiring industry, as her Ordnance and Executive Officer, the terrible effect of her fire was greatly due. Her battery was determined in accordance with his suggestions, and in all investigations and tests, which resulted in its thorough efficiency, he was zealously engaged.

The terms of commendation used by the Flag Officer in characterizing the conduct of his officers and men meet the cordial endorsement of the Department; and the concurrent testimony of thousands who witnessed the engagement places his own conduct above all praise.

With much respect,

Your obedient servant,

S. R. MALLORY,
Secretary of the Navy.

REPORT OF FLAG-OFFICER BUCHANAN.

Naval Hospital, Norfolk, March 27, 1862.

SIR,—Having been confined to my bed in this building, since the 9th inst., in consequence of a wound received in the action of the previous day, I have not had it in my power at an earlier date to prepare the official report, which I now have the honour to submit, of the proceedings on the 8th and 9th insts., of the James River Squadron under my command, composed of the following named vessels:—Steamer Virginia, flag ship, ten guns; steamer Patrick Henry, twelve guns, Commander John R. Tucker; steamer Jamestown, Lieutenant-Commanding J. N. Barney, two guns; and gunboats Teazer, Lieutenant-Commanding W. A. Webb; Beaufort, Lieutenant-Commanding, W. H. Parker; and Raleigh, Lieutenant-Commanding J. W. Alexander, each one gun. Total twenty-seven guns.

On the 8th inst., at eleven a.m., the Virginia left the Navy-Yard, Norfolk, accompanied by the Raleigh and Beaufort, and proceeded to Newport News to engage the enemy's frigates Cumberland and Congress, gunboats, and shore batteries. When within less than a mile of the Cumberland, the Virginia commenced the engagement with that ship with her bow gun, and the action soon became general, the Cumberland, Congress, gunboats, and shore batteries concentrating upon us their heavy fire, which was returned with great spirit and determination. The Virginia stood rapidly on towards the Cumberland, which ship I had determined to sink with our prow, if possible. In about fifteen minutes after the action commenced we ran into her on her star-board bow; the crash below the water was distinctly heard, and she commenced sinking, gallantly fighting her guns as long as they were above water. She went down with her colours flying. During this time the shore batteries, Congress, and gunboats kept up their heavy concentrated fire upon us, doing us some injury. Our guns, however, were not idle; their fire was very destructive to the shore batteries and vessels, and we were gallantly sustained by the rest of the squadron.

Just after the Cumberland sunk, that gallant officer, Commander John R. Tucker, was seen standing down James River under full steam, accompanied by the Jamestown and Teazer. They all came nobly into action, and were soon exposed to the heavy fire of shore batteries. Their escape was miraculous, as they were under a galling fire of solid shot, shell, grape, and canister, a number of which passed through the vessels without doing any serious injury, except to the Patrick Henry, through whose boiler a shot passed, scalding to death four persons, and wounding others. Lieutenant-Commanding Barney promptly obeyed a signal to tow her out of the action. As soon as damages were repaired, the Patrick Henry returned to her station and continued to perform good service during the remainder of that day and the following.

Having sunk the Cumberland, I turned our attention to the Congress. We were some time in getting our proper position, in consequence of the shoalness of the water, and the great difficulty of managing the ship when in or near the mud. To succeed in my object, I was obliged to run the ship a short distance above the batteries on James River, in order to wind her. During all the time her keel was in the mud; of course, she moved but slowly. Thus we were subjected twice to the heavy guns of all the batteries in pasing up and down the river, but it could not be avoided. We silenced several of the batteries, and did much injury on shore. A large transport steamer alongside the wharf was blown up, one schooner sunk, and another captured and sent to Norfolk. The loss of life on shore we have no means of ascertaining.

While the Virginia was thus engaged in getting her position for attacking the Congress, the prisoners state it was believed on board that ship that we had hauled off; the men left their guns and gave three cheers. They were soon sadly undeceived, for a few minutes after we opened upon her again, she having run on shore in shoal water. The carnage, havoc and dismay caused by our fire compelled them to haul down their colours, and to hoist a white flag at their gaff and half mast, and another at the main. The crew instantly took to their boats and landed. Our fire immediately ceased, and a signal was made for the Beaufort to come within hail. I then ordered Lieutenant-Commanding Parker to take possession of the Congress, secure the officers as prisoners, allow the crew to land, and burn the ship. He ran alongside, received her flag and surrender from Commander William Smith and Lieutenant Pendergrast, with the side-arms of those officers. They delivered themselves as prisoners of war on board the Beaufort, and afterwards were permitted, at their own request, to return to the Congress, to assist in removing the wounded to the Beaufort. They never returned, and I submit to the decision of the Department whether they are not our prisoners. While the Beaufort and Raleigh were alongside the Congress, and the surrender of that vessel had been received from the commander, she having two white flags flying, hoisted by her own people, a heavy fire was opened upon them from the shore and from the Congress, killing some valuable officers and men. Under this fire the steamers left the Congress; but as I was not informed that any injury had been sustained by those vessels at that time, Lieutenant-Commanding Parker having failed to report to me, I took it for granted that my order to him to burn her had been executed, and waited some minutes to see the smoke ascending from her batches. During this delay we were still subjected to the heavy fire from the batteries, which was always promptly returned.

The steam frigates Minnesota and Roanoke, and the sailing frigate St. Lawrence, had previously been reported as coming from Old Point; but as I was determined that the Congress should not again fall into the hands of the enemy, I remarked to that gallant, young officer, Flag-Lieutenant Minor, "that ship must be burned." He promptly volunteered to take a boat and burn her, and the Teazer, Lieutenant-Commanding Webb, was ordered to cover the boat. Lieutenant Minor had scarcely reached within fifty yards of the Congress, when a deadly fire was opened upon him, wounding him severely and several of his men. On witnessing this vile treachery, I instantly recalled the boat and ordered the Congress destroyed by hot shot and incendiary shell. About this period I was disabled, and transferred the command of the ship to that gallant, intelligent officer, Lieutenant Catesby Jones, with orders to fight her as long as the men could stand to their guns.

The ships from Old Point opened their fire upon us. The Minnesota grounded in the North Channel, where, unfortunately, the shoalness of the channel prevented our near approach. We continued, however, to fire upon her until the pilots declared that it was no longer safe to remain in that position, and we accordingly returned by the south channel (the middle ground being necessarily between the Virginia and Minnesota; and St. Lawrence and the Roanoke having retreated under the guns of Old Point), and again had an opportunity of opening upon the Minnesota, receiving her heavy fire in return, and shortly afterwards upon the St. Lawrence, from which vessel we also received several broadsides. It had by this time become dark, and we soon after anchored off Sewell's Point. The rest of the squadron followed our movements, with the exception of the Beaufort, Lieutenant-Commanding Parker, who proceeded to Norfolk with the wounded and prisoners, as soon as he had left the Congress, without reporting to me. The Congress having been set on fire by our hot shot and incendiary shell, continued to burn, her loaded guns being successively discharged as the flames reached them, until a few minutes past midnight, when her magazine exploded with a tremendous report.

The facts above stated, as having occurred after I had placed the ship in charge of Lieutenant Jones, were reported to me by that officer.

At an early hour next morning (the 9th), upon the urgent solicitations of the surgeons, Lieutenant Minor and myself were very reluctantly taken on shore. The accommodations for the proper treatment of wounded persons on board the Virginia are exceedingly limited, Lieutenant Minor and myself occupying the only space that could be used for that purpose, which was in my cabin. I therefore consented to our being landed on Sewell's Point, thinking that the room on board vacated by us could be used for those who might be wounded in the renewal of the action. In the course of the day, Lieutenant Minor and myself were sent in a steamer to the hospital at Norfolk.

The following is an extract from the report of Lieutenant Jones, of the proceedings of the Virginia on the 9th:—

"At daylight on the 9th, we saw that the Minnesota was still ashore, and that there was an iron battery near her. At eight we ran down to engage them (having previously sent the killed and wounded out of the ship); firing at the Minnesota, and occasionally at the iron battery. The pilots did not place us as near as they expected. The great length and draught of the ship rendered it exceedingly difficult to work her; we ran ashore about a mile from the frigate, and were backing fifteen minutes before we got off. We continued to fire at the Minnesota, and blew up a steamer alongside of her; and we also engaged the Monitor, sometimes at very close quarters; we once succeeded in running into her, and twice silenced her fire. The pilots declaring that we could get no nearer the Minnesota, and believing her to be entirely disabled, and the Monitor having to run into shoal water, which prevented our doing her any further injury, we ceased firing at twelve, and proceeded to Norfolk.

"Our loss is two killed and nineteen wounded. The stem is twisted, and the ship leaks; we have lost the prow, starboard anchor, and all the boats; the armour is somewhat damaged, the steam pipe and smoke stack both riddled, the muzzle of two of the guns shot away. It was not easy to keep a flag flying; the flag-staffs were repeatedly shot away; the colours were hoisted to the smoke stack and several times cut down from it.

"The bearing of the men was all that could be desired; their enthusiasm could scarcely be restrained. During the action they cheered again and again. Their coolness and skill were the more remarkable, from the fact that the great majority of them were under fire for the first time; they were strangers to each other and to the officers, and had but a few days' instruction in the management of the great guns. To the skill and example of the officers is this result in no small degree attributable."

Having thus given a full report of the actions on the 9th and 9th, I feel it due to the gallant officers who so nobly sustained the honour of the flag and country on those days, to express my appreciation of their conduct.

To that brave and intelligent officer, Lieutenant Catesby Jones, the executive and ordnance officer of the Virginia, I am greatly indebted for the success achieved. His constant attention to his duties in the equipment of the ship; his intelligence in the instruction of ordnance to the crew, as proved by the accuracy and effect of their fire—some of the guns having been personally directed by him—his tact and management in the government of raw recruits, his general knowledge of the executive duties of a man-of-war, together with his high-toned bearing, were all eminently conspicuous, and had their fruits in the admirable efficiency of the Virginia. If conduct such as his—and I do not know that I have used adequate language in describing it—entitles an officer to promotion, I see in the case of Lieutenant Jones one in all respects worthy of it. As flag officer I am entitled to some one to perform the duties of flag captain, and I should be proud to have Lieutenant Jones ordered to the Virginia as Lieutenant-Commandant, if it be not the intention of the Department to bestow upon him a higher rank.

Lieutenant Simms fully sustained his well-earned reputation. He fired the first gun, and when the command devolved upon Lieutenant Jones, in consequence of my disability, he was ordered to perform the duties of executive officer. Lieutenant Jones has expressed to me his satisfaction in having had the services of so experienced, energetic, and zealous an officer.

Lieutenant Davidson fought his guns with great precision. The muzzle of one of them was soon shot away; he continued, however, to fire it, though the wood-work around the port became ignited at each discharge. His buoyant and cheerful bearing and voice were contagious and inspiring.

Lieutenant Wood handled his pivot gun admirably, and the executive officer testifies to his valuable suggestions during the action. His zeal and industry in drilling the crew contributed materially to our success.

Lieutenant Eggleston served his hot shot and shell with judgment and effect; and his bearing was deliberate, and exerted a happy influence on his division.

Lieutenant Butt fought his gun with activity, and during the action was gay and smiling.

The Marine Corps was well represented by Captain Thom, whose tranquil mien gave evidence that, the hottest fire was no novelty to him. One of his guns was served effectively and creditably by a detachment of the United Artillery of Norfolk, under the command of Captain Kevill. The muzzle of their gun was struck by a shell from the enemy, which broke off a piece of the gun, but they continued to fire as if it was uninjured.

Midshipmen Fouts, Marmaduke, Littlepage, Craig, and Long rendered valuable services. Their conduct would have been creditable to older heads, and gave great promise of future usefulness. Midshipman Marmaduke, though receiving several painful wounds early in the action, manfully fought his gun until the close. He is now at the hospital.

Paymaster Semple volunteered for any service, and was assigned to the command of the powder division, an important and complicated duty, which could not have been better performed.

Surgeon Phillips and Assistant-surgeon Garnett were prompt and attentive in the discharge of their duties; their kind and considerate care of the wounded, and the skill and ability displayed in the treatment, won for them the esteem and gratitude of all who came under their charge, and justly entitled them to the confidence of officers and crew. I beg leave to call the attention of the Department to the case of Dr. Garnett. He stands deservedly high in his profession, is at the head of the list of assistant surgeons, and there being a vacancy, in consequence of the recent death of Surgeon Blackhall, I should be much gratified if Dr. Garnett could be promoted to it.

The engines and machinery, upon which so much depended, performed much better than was expected. This is due to the intelligence, experience, and coolness of Acting-Chief-Engineer Ramsey. His efforts were ably seconded by his assistants, Tynan, Campbell, Herring, Jack and White. As Mr. Ramsey is only Acting-Chief-Engineer, I respectfully recommend his promotion to the rank of chief; and would also ask that second Assistant-Engineer Campbell may be promoted to first assistant—he having performed the duties of that grade during the engagement.

The forward officers, boatswain Hasker, gunner Oliver, and carpenter Lindsey, discharged well all the duties required of them. The boatswain had charge of a gun, and fought it well. The gunner was indefatigable in his efforts; his experience and exertions as a gunner have contributed very materially to the efficiency of the battery.

Acting-Master Parrish was assisted in piloting the ship [by pilots Wright, Williams, Clark, and Cunningham. They were necessarily much exposed.

It is now due that I should mention my personal staff. To that gallant young officer, Flag-Lieutenant Minor, I am much indebted for his promptness in the execution of signals, for renewing the flag-staffs when shot away—being thereby greatly exposed—for his watchfulness in keeping the Confederate flag up; his alacrity in conveying my orders to the different divisions, and for his general cool and gallant bearing.

My aid, Acting-Midshipman Rootes, of the Navy, Lieutenant Forrest, of the Army, who served as a volunteer aid, and my clerk, Mr. Arthur St. Clair, Junr., are entitled to my thanks for the activity with which my orders were conveyed to the different parts of the ship. During the hottest of the fight, they were always at their post, giving evidence of their coolness. Having referred to the good conduct of the officers in the flag-ship, immediately under my notice, I come now to no less pleasing task, when I attempt to mark my approbation of the bearing of those serving in the other vessels of the squadron.

Commodore Jno. R. Tucker, of the Patrick Henry, and Lieutenants-Commanding J. N. Barney, of the Jamestown, and W. A. Webb, of the Teazer, deserve great praise for their gallant conduct throughout the engagement. Their judgment in selecting their positions for attacking the enemy was good; their constant fire was destructive, and contributed much to the success of the day. The "general order," under which the squadron went into action, required, that in the absence of all signals, each commanding officer was to exercise his own judgment and discretion in doing all the damage he could to the enemy, and to sink before surrendering. From the bearing of those officers, on the 8th, I am fully satisfied that that order would have been carried out.

Commander Tucker speaks highly of all under him, and desires particularly to notice that Lieutenant-Colonel Cadwallader St. George Noland, commanding the post at Mulberry Island, on hearing of the deficiency in the complement of the Patrick Henry, promptly offered the services of ten of his men as volunteers for the occasion, one of whom, Geo. E. Webb, of the "Greenville Guards," Commander Tucker regrets to say, was killed.

Lieutenant-Commanding Barney reports "every officer and man on board of the ship performed his whole duty, evincing a courage and fearlessness worthy of the cause for which we are fighting."

Lieutenant-Commanding Webb specially notices the coolness displayed by Acting-Master Face and third Assistant-Engineer Quinn, when facing the heavy fire of artillery and musketry from the shore, whilst the Teazer was standing in to cover the boat in which, as previously stated, Lieutenant Minor had gone to burn the Congress. Several of his men were badly wounded.

The Raleigh, early in the action, had her gun-carriage disabled, which compelled her to withdraw. As soon as he had repaired damages as well as he could, Lieutenant-Commanding Alexander resumed his position in the line. He sustained himself gallantly during the remainder of the day, and speaks highly of all under his command. That evening he was ordered to Norfolk for repairs.

The Beaufort, Lieutenant-Commanding Parker, was in close contact with the enemy frequently during the day, and all on board behaved gallantly.

Lieutenant-Commanding Parker expresses his warmest thanks to his officers and men for their coolness. Acting-Midshipman Foreman, who accompanied him as volunteer aid, Midshipman Mallory, and Newton, (Captain's clerk,) Bain, and Mr. Gray, (pilot), are all specially mentioned by him.

On the 21st inst. I forwarded to the Department correct lists of the casualties on board all the vessels of the squadron, on the 8th; none, it appears, occurred on the 9th.

While in the act of closing this report, I received the communication of the Department, dated 22nd inst., relieving me temporarily of the command of the squadron for the naval defences of James River. I feel honoured in being relieved by the gallant Flag-Officer Tattall.

I much regret that I am not now in a condition to resume my command, but trust that I shall soon be restored to health, when I shall be ready for any duty that may be assigned to me.

Very respectfully,

FRANKLIN BUCHANAN,
Flag Officer.

Hon. S. R. Mallory,
Secretary of the Navy.

THE man who outrages women is capable of every act. Though the world may shudder, it will not be surprised to learn that General Butler has just hanged a man with no further warrant than his order, and for no higher offence than hauling down a piece of bunting. In modern times such an offence has never been visited with such a punishment, nor has any commander, holding a commission from a civilized Government, been guilty of such a stretch of power in a conquered and peaceful city. The following is the order upon which the man Mumford was executed in New Orleans:—

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf, New Orleans,
June 5.—Special Order No. 70.

William B. Mumford, a citizen of New Orleans, having been convicted before the military commission of treason, and an overt act thereof in tearing down the United States' flag from a public building of the United States, for the purpose of inciting other evil-minded persons to further resistance to the laws and arms of the United States, after the said flag was placed there by Commodore Farragut, of the United States' navy,

It is ordered that he be executed, according to the sentence of the military commission on Saturday, June 7 inst., between the hours of eight a.m. and twelve a.m., under the direction of the Provost-Marshal of the district of New Orleans; and for so doing this shall be his sufficient warrant.

By command of,

Major-General BUTLER, General-Commanding.

Mumford exhibited little emotion, and comported himself with great coolness and self-possession.

THE North American's mails bring us a most interesting account from the Richmond papers of the recent foray of the Confederate Cavalry around McClellan's Camp. It is too late for insertion, and we can find space only for a brief summary of the results, in the words of a member of the dashing band:—

"What, then, was the general result?" asked we of a weary, dusty trooper, watering his jaded and faithful animal by a roadside spring. "The result," answered he, proudly, but much exhausted, "the result? We have been in the saddle from Thursday morning until Saturday noon, never breaking rein or breaking fast; we have whipped the enemy wherever he dared to appear, never opposing more than equal forces; we have burnt 200 wagons laden with valuable stores, sunk or fired three large transports, captured 300 horses and mules, lots of side arms, &c., brought in 170 prisoners, four officers and many negroes; killed and wounded scores of the enemy, pleased Stuart, and had one man killed—a poor Captain Latane; This is the result, and 3,000,000 dollars cannot cover the Federal loss in goods alone. As to myself," said he, mounting and trotting away, "I wouldn't have missed the trip for 1,000 dollars—history cannot show such another exploit as this of Stuart's!" He spoke the truth, honestly and roughly, as a true soldier serving under an incomparable leader. More words are not needed—the whole country is astonished and applauds—McClellan is disgraced—Stuart and his troopers are now for ever in history."

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEED AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDIN AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rufford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C. S. A.
Represented by
Jos. T. Robinson & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDGAR IRON WORKS.
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BENSLEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Byrom's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States, Commission-ers for books and papers of all kind, under then on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES;
Their Origin and the Remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: HORTON, New Bond-street.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDE-RICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published
the following Catalogues of their Stock:—
1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books—Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP-CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History,
Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign
Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., or Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and mischievous agents to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only hide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for its enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION
FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRES INTERNATIONAL DE BIENFAISANCE.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.

THE Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, in conjunction with the Third Session of the Congress International de Bienfaissance, will take place in London from the 5th to the 14th of June.

The Departmental Meetings of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon, and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.
The Session of the Congress will be held in the Forenoon, in Burlington House.

A series of Soirées will be given during the period of the Meeting; and it is intended to provide for visits to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Members' Tickets, price One Guinea each (entitled to the volume of "Transactions"), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will admit to all the Meetings of the Association and Congress, and to the Soirées, &c.
Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C.; and 12, Old Bond-street, W.
As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions in aid of the local fund.
For every 4s subscribed to this fund, subscribers are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12 Old Bond-street, W., and at the City Office, Guildhall, E.C.; by Messrs. Ransom, Bouverie, and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Westminster Bank, Lombury, E.C.; the Union Bank,
Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Kennard, and Co., 4, Lombard-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George Ledger, 4, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, E.C.

GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen.
and Chairman of Executive Committee.
A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.
G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY, living with her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Élysées, offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after the second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice- President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,388,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.
A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 699,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 866,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS
Geo. Connolly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Poux.
C. Honold.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
B. P. Voornier.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,959 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 30th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 30th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after the 15th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRAIT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primage.

PARTIAL PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods, and parcels of 50 lbs. and upwards, will be freight free by the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail Steam-Parcel Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which is as follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship, or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, any goods, oil, or vitriol, gunpowder, or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same to be shipped, he shall for every such offence be liable to a fine not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

WE take pleasure in fully recommending to our Friends in want of a good Tailor, A. M. GAULTIER, 229, Regent Street, London (above Verrey's Restaurant) and 20, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris.

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum;
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to X. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

Is this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—the causes still remain a mystery and a fiddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST. E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Cran-cour, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—July 3, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 11.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JULY 10, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	161
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	163
Manchester Letter	163
THE TOBACCO MARKET	163
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Marriages and Deaths	163
Private Letters and Extracts	163
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	164
Charleston	164
Paris	164
EXTRACTS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS	165
LEADERS—
The West	168
The last Presidential Election in the United States	168
The Celestial Empire of the West	169
The Right of Interference	170
Editorials	171
REVIEWS—
Southern Statistics—
The Cotton Production	171
The Colonial History of Virginia	172
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR	173
COTTON	174
ADVERTISEMENTS	176

LATEST.

The following most important telegraphic despatches arrived at the moment of our going to press:—

(Per Etna, by Telegraph.)

NEW YORK, June 30 (Evening).

On the 26th inst. the Confederates, having been reinforced by Stonewall Jackson, attacked the right wing of the Federal army before Richmond with heavy force.

Severe fighting continued during two days, with heavy loss on both sides.

The Federals, by order of Gen. McClellan, receded several miles, hotly pursued by the Confederates. The Federals then made a stand, and held their position.

The Federals are stated to have retreated for a strategic purpose.

No official intelligence has yet been received. The fighting probably continues.

The telegraphic communication has been interrupted.

Information obtained from reliable sources leads to the belief that General Burnside was to attack the Confederate defences, near Richmond on the 28th inst.

JULY 1ST (Morning).

Fresh reports have been received of the late fight before Richmond, according to which General McClellan has contracted his lines and massed his troops between the Chickahominy and James River. The latter constitutes his base of operations.

White House has been abandoned, and the right wing of McClellan's army has been drawn across the Chickahominy.

On the 27th ult. the Confederates made an attack on the right wing of the Federals. The division of Stonewall Jackson attacked McClellan's division of reserves on the extreme right. After a fight of three hours Jackson was repulsed. The Confederates then made several attacks on the Federal right wing, and severe fighting ensued.

General McClellan then commenced the strategic movements for which he had been preparing; his whole right wing fell back, and crossed the south side of the Chickahominy in rear of his left wing. He afterwards made for James River.

The evacuation of White House was completed on Saturday afternoon, the Federals carrying off all their material.

The attack of Vicksburg by the Federal fleet is imminent.

NEW YORK, June 27 (Evening).

Generals Fremont, Banks, and McDowell's forces have been consolidated into one army, and General Pope has been assigned to the chief command.

It is officially stated that General McClellan has been largely reinforced since the Battle of Fair Oaks. General Pope will also operate against Richmond.

The steamer Lempis, from Nassau, has run the Charleston blockade.

Federal accounts state that the Federals attacked James Island, near Charleston, on the 14th inst., and were repulsed after four hours' hard fighting, with a loss of 650 killed, wounded, and missing. The Federals were obliged to retreat under cover of their gunboats.

Gold, 9½ per cent. prem.

NEW YORK, June 28 (Morning).

It is stated that the Federal General Benham will be court-martialled for disobedience of General Hunter's orders in attacking the batteries before Charleston.

General Fremont asked to be relieved from his command, because General Pope had been appointed over him. President Lincoln has acceded to General Fremont's request, and appointed General Rufus Klig to take his place.

Southern papers state that great efforts are being made to hold Vicksburg.

President Lincoln has sent to the Senate a treaty, made by the American Minister, loaning to Mexico $11,000,000.

At New Orleans the Federal surgeon Biddle, having taken a slave to be his servant, the owner of the slave retook him from Biddle. The owner was thereupon condemned to two year's imprisonment in the parish gaol, it having been decided that the Federal army must have everything it requires for its use.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

CHARLESTON is honoured by the special hatred of the North. The Federal press and mob threaten that city and its inhabitants with ferocious vengeance when the fortune of war places them in the power of the invaders. Charleston is to be made the example of Federal retribution. It will tax the inventive faculty of the North to devise greater barbarity than has been practised in New Orleans, but we doubt not that there will be a sensational display of savageness if Charleston is conquered. The Confederates, however, determine that the city shall not be an easy prey.

A battle took place on the 16th of June, on James Island, five miles from Charleston. The North at first announced it as "a bloody battle, with heavy loss on both sides." As no result was given, it followed that the North was defeated, and a few days afterwards it was intimated that "the Confederates claimed the victory in the battle fought near Charleston on the 16th"—a very delicate way of proclaiming a Federal defeat. No Northern account of the engagement has been published, but some particulars have appeared in the Confederate papers. It appears the battle commenced by five Federal regiments, supported by a battery of Parrot guns, attacking the batteries at Secessionville. Col. Lamar commanded the Confederates, who were very inferior to the enemy in numbers. The Federals were assisted by their gunboats. The Confederate troops engaged consisted of a battalion from the 47th Georgia (H. Good's) Regiment, Lamar's Battery, and a detachment of the Chatham Artillery of Savannah. The 47th New York (Highlanders) displayed great gallantry. Three times they assaulted the Confederate batteries, the last time with empty muskets; and when they were driven back they succeeded in carrying off their wounded, but left fifty of their number dead in the ditch. The Federals then tried a flank movement, and were completely defeated.

The Confederates buried 140 of the enemy's slain, and it is computed that the total Federal loss was 400, including 40 prisoners. The Confederate loss was 40 killed and about 100 wounded. The loss amongst the officers was heavy. Captains Reed and King, and Lieutenant Edwards were killed. Colonel Lamar was among the wounded. Generals Evans and Pemberton praised the Confederate troops for their bravery in facing the terrible fire poured forth from the heavy field artillery and the gunboats of the enemy, and for the alacrity with which they opposed the desperate attacks of superior numbers. The Generals also complimented Colouel Lamar.

Whether Charleston has continued, and will continue, unconquered, we know not, but if it falls it will not fall ingloriously. If the stone fleet sunk by the Federals should prove an effective hinderance to the advance of their gunboats, Charleston will have a better chance of keeping out the enemy than has fallen to the lot of other river cities. The Battle of James Island teaches us that powerful artillery, even when supported by great bravery, is still inferior in a contest with men who are fighting for liberty and the sanctity of home. The formidable Parrot guns are not invincible.

No one can justly accuse General McClellan of ingratitude. When his forces are repulsed, when his stores and men are captured, when his tents are burnt, instead of expressing any regret or annoyance he is greatly obliged to the Confederates for giving him the opportunity of writing a despatch, and announcing one of those peculiar Federal victories which the obstinate Confederates and the unenlightened European nations will insist upon calling Federal defeats.

In a despatch dated June 26, "Young Napoleon" gives a remarkable instance of his invincible gratitude. He expresses great delight that the Confederates have allowed him to occupy "a swamp with thick underbrush, beyond which is an open country." If the occupation of this desirable ground increases the sickness and mortality of his army, General McClellan's gratitude will be enhanced.

The Young Napoleon is said to be sick, and General McDowell has been put hors de combat by a fall from his horse. These circumstances, it is said, were the cause of Mr. Lincoln's visit to General Scott, accompanied by General Pope, who, perhaps, carried with him in his pocket the 10,000 prisoners whom, according to General Halleck, he captured from General Beauregard's army.

The Jacob Bell, a gunboat, ventured up James River to reconnoitre; she got aground near Turkey Island, and did not get off until she had been severely punished by a Confederate battery of field-pieces, which opened on her with rifle guns, throwing shell and solid shot. The Northern account admits that the Jacob Bell "was considerably damaged."

It is reported that another attempt has been made on Fort Darling, and that the Federals were repulsed. It is said that the Government suppressed the publication of the news.

General Jackson is still master of the position in the Shenandoah Valley. He has been considerably reinforced, and the Mobile News, of June 14, states that General Lawton, with a Georgia brigade, 6000 strong, had left to join him.

General Beauregard and his staff, according to the Grenada Appeal, of June 18, had arrived at Montgomery, en route for Richmond. The command of the army opposed to General Halleck had been confided to General Bragg.

The official report of Colonel Fitch of the engagement on the White River, near St. Charles, is very meagre. It admits the loss of the enemy was unknown, that the Mound City was disabled, and that it was considered prudent to withdraw the rest of the gunboat fleet out of the range of the Confederate batteries. The Confederate fort, after repulsing the fleet and making a gallant defence, was taken by the Federal land forces, under Colonel Fitch; and from the report of killed and captured, we presume that the fort was taken after it had been evacuated. The steam drum of the Mound City was perforated by a ball from a siege gun, and out of a crew of 175 only 23 escaped scalding. According to Northern accounts, the Confederate forces under Colonel Frye did not exceed "400 to 500 men," and probably they were much less numerous. From the same sources, we learn that 100 Federal sailors were killed and 20 missing—the missing are those who jumped into the water when scalded. Colonel Fitch does not state whether the captured guns were spiked; but if not, it was still a dearly-bought victory.

It was rumoured that the Federal mortar fleet had left New Orleans for Vicksburg, for the purpose of making another effort to reduce that place.

Although General Halleck is not going to give us any more pen and ink victories during the warm season, it appears that he does not intend to discontinue the preparation of comic despatches. We give the latest received in its entirety:—

Unofficial information has been received that White River has been opened for 170 miles, and that Governor Regan and the Rebel Government have fled from Little Rock on a flat-boat for Fort Smith.
H. W. HALLECK.

The Governor and the Government escaping on a flat-boat, is a pretty specimen of the circumstantial romance. It is a pity the unofficial report does not give the dimensions and tonnage of the flat-boat.

The best commentary on the war prospects of the North is the offer of two dollars premium, and one month's pay in advance, to all recruits. Perhaps these terms may attract a host of foreign mercenaries, but it is evident the Northerners themselves are reluctant to fight their own battles for the conquest and spoliation of the South. What are we now to think of the boasted enthusiasm and fighting proclivities of the United States' native citizens? Men are urgently needed, and although the country is in a state of financial collapse, an additional 100,000 men cannot be procured without the offer of a bounty and pay in advance. We also perceive in this call for more men a confession on the part of the Washington Government that the invading force has been greatly reduced by sickness and by the enemy, and that the present army is not large enough to subjugate the South. Bankrupt nations have ere this carried on wars, both defensive and aggressive, when the Government has been aided by the determination and voluntary efforts of the people; but it looks serious when a bankrupt nation is obliged to bribe its citizens to enlist. Recruiting for the "magnificent navy" that is to blow up, and smash up, and annihilate the navies of England and France before the fastest talker can say "Jack Robinson," is more difficult than recruiting for the Federal army; and as yet no plan has been discovered to use a fleet without men.

General Butler is no longer alone in his infamy, but it is shared by the Government and people of the United States; for the former has not visited it with condign punishment, and the latter have approved the several acts of disgraceful tyranny that have been perpetrated in New Orleans since the Federal occupation, even the execrable edict that has startled Europe by its malignity and unheard of atrociousness; and the New York press denounces in unmeasured terms the indignant censures of the British Parliament. General Butler revels in barbarity and lawlessness. The climax of his savage rule was giving his soldiers license, by an edict and by an explanatory letter, to treat the ladies of New Orleans as harlots. Compared with this, all other crimes are venial; for no other crime is in itself so loathsome or necessitates such deadly vengeance. And speaking of vengeance, we should regret exceedingly to hear that his life had been taken by the incensed and outraged people. Better he should live as the exponent of Northern character and Northern sentiment towards the South. But though General Butler cannot exceed the infamy of his conduct towards the ladies of New Orleans, he takes care to let the world know that he, the representative of the United States, is not satiated with a single enormity. Last week we recorded the murder of Mr. Mumford. We deliberately use the word "murder," for the execution of the unfortunate gentleman cannot be justified by any law of any civilized, or, as far as we know, any uncivilized nation. There was a drunken brawl in the streets of New Orleans, and in the midst of the disturbance the United States' flag was lowered by some person or persons unknown; for Mr. Mumford, who met his cruel fate with the utmost fortitude, solemnly swore with his dying breath that he did not lower the flag. If he had done so, would that have called for a mock trial, or no trial, and a hurried execution? If General Butler is not guilty of the wilful murder of Mr. Mumford, then there has been no murder since the days of Cain.

The appetite for blood is fearfully stimulated by the taste of blood. Mr. Mumford being butchered, his murderer looked round for more victims. Accordingly, four persons were charged with obtaining money under false pretences, and getting into dwelling-houses under false pretences, and stealing therefrom. The accused were hurried to the gallows via a hurried and delusive trial. If anything would add to General Butler's gratification at seeing four victims swinging simultaneously, it was that one of them was an Englishman.

The English, at present, are without any consular protection and assistance, not that consular assistance avails much with General Butler:—

The acting British Consul Coppell having asked for information concerning the oaths to be administered to foreign residents, General Butler replied that no answer would be given until Mr. Coppell's credentials and pretensions were recognized by the British Government and the Federal Executive. All attempts at official action on Mr. Coppell's part must cease, his credentials having been asked for, but not exhibited.

It must be remembered that General Butler was a lawyer of the genus "Pettyfogger" before he entered the army. But we must proceed, for we have not yet gone through the last received list of General Butler's tyrannical acts.

One Alderman and the Chairman of the Ladies' Relief Committee have been condemned by General Butler to hard labour, with ball and chain, in Fort Jackson; that is, for some political offence, real or imagined, these gentlemen—citizens of the highest respectability—are treated worse than any European convicts, by being condemned to convict labour in chains. Amongst those who have been consigned to shameful imprisonment is Dr. Stone, the eminent surgeon. His loss is serious. Perhaps General Butler finds hanging too expeditious, and intends convict labour and chains as the slow and lingering substitutes for the quick death of the gallows.

General Butler has refused to allow the shipment of sugar bought and paid for by British, French, and Greek merchants, because the money given for the sugar aided the Confederates in purchasing arms!

Another consular controversy has risen in reference to the administration of an oath to foreigners:—

The Spanish, French, Italian, Greek, and Swiss Consuls have unanimously protested against the oath demanded by General Butler of foreigners. The consuls stated that since the commencement of the war they had remained neutral, and as neutrals they could not be treated as the conquered population. A conquered people might be submitted to exceptional laws, but neutral foreigners have a right to be treated as they have always been by the Federal Government.

General Butler replied that the oath was declared necessary to meet the cases of foreigners who had meddled in the affairs of the rebellion, many of whom also had concealed the fact of their naturalization.

General Butler, in an elaborate argument, endeavours to prove his proclamation perfectly legal, and says:—

"That all rules and regulations are made to restrain bad men, and not good men. Foreigners can refuse to take the oath, but still live quietly and happily in New Orleans, and receive protection from personal violence. If foreigners do not like Federal laws, they have an effectual remedy, alike pleasant to themselves, and to the Federal authorities. That remedy is to go home at once. Such foreigners came without invitation, they will be parted from without regret. But foreigners must not commit crimes against the Federal laws, and expect to go home to escape punishment. Consuls are requested not to send argumentative protests in a body. If any Consul has anything to offer for consideration, he can easily learn the proper mode of presenting it."

We call the attention of our readers to the words we have printed in italics. We publish to-day a leader showing some points of resemblance between the Chinese and Federal Governments. We ask, in all seriousness, whether General Butler's insolence to foreigners is not ultra-Chinese? We cannot say how much longer European nations will submit to such treatment, but we should think the limit of forbearance is nearly reached.

The Bank of Louisiana has been ordered to pay specie for deposits of Confederate money. General Butler forbids the issue of the Confederate notes which the bank received on deposit, and insists on the bank paying in currency not so received.

The example of General Butler is being followed. General Lew. Wallace has assumed military command of Memphis. His first official act was to take possession of the Argus, a Confederate paper, and place its articles and all papers published in the city under the censorship of two members of the New York press. The Provost-Marshal has issued instructions to the guard to shoot any one attempting to haul down the Union flag, or offering insult or molestation to citizens who manifest their devotion to the Union.

The war against the Southern ladies is to be rigorously waged, as we gather from the following paragraph:—

A house has been fitted up in Louisville for the imprisonment of women who do or say anything to incite to rebellion.

As the municipality of Norfolk could not be cajoled or frightened into taking the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government, martial law has been proclaimed.

The State of Illinois has adopted resolutions denying the right of suffrage to negroes, and prohibiting them from holding office. Negroes are also excluded from coming into Illinois. What would become of the poor negro if he had not a refuge and a home in the South?

The financial news may be effectively given in a single sentence. At the latest dates gold was 9½ premium.

In consequence of the siege of Richmond, the interest of the Virginia State debt, due here on the 1st inst., has not been paid. The interest on the bonds of the South Carolina Railway Company is also overdue. The Northern invasion, and not lack of funds, is the cause of these disappointments.

Both Houses of Congress have passed the Tax Bill. The tax imposed upon cotton amounts to 3¢. per lb.

A Committee of the House of Representatives has passed an amendment authorizing the issue of $150,000,000 demand-notes, with the privilege to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue notes of less value than $5. This privilege will enable the Government to circulate the "shin plasters" amongst all classes. It is reported that "green backs" are being extensively forged, and the reduction in value will make it easier to pass forged notes.

In the Senate, on June 24, the report of Judge Holt and Robert Owen, Ordnance Contract Commissioners, laid before the Senate, shows that Senator Simmons received two notes of $5000 each for his services in obtaining a musket contract for a Providence (R.I.) house. The office of United States' Senator must be very lucrative, though not quite so lucrative as General Fremont's fort building.

The distress in the manufacturing districts increased during the past week. The most gloomy anticipations are entertained of the coming autumn and winter.

General Prim is in London, but it is understood that his visit is unofficial.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, July 9, 1862.

Our last report left the market in a very excited state with Middling Orleans at 16½, and Fair Dhollerahs 13½ to 14d. On Thursday there was no abatement in the buoyancy, and prices advanced another ½d., but on Friday the announcement of the week's business attracted considerable attention and caused a temporary pause. Out of the enormous sales of 155,000 bales, it was discovered with surprise that the trade had only got 24,000 including 3000 Surats, and the estimated stock of East India cotton in the port was made in consequence nearly double what most persons had expected it to be. This unlooked for result was found on enquiry to proceed from the large resales by spinners of cotton they had bought before. The advance in price was so enormous, that many of them were tempted to realize the profit instead of spinning it into cotton yarn, at a comparative sacrifice. No allowance had been made for this disturbing cause before, but the lingering brokers this week made returns in such a shape as to set off the previous purchases, which had been resold, against the amount actually taken this week. The amount, however, sent down for resale by spinners is known to be so very large that it is not probable the figures have been sufficiently rectified even yet; and there is good ground for supposing that the stock in the port, especially of Surats, is considerably larger than the estimate. The check produced by this discovery was only momentary, and as the day wore on a good business was again done at full prices for New Orleans and long-stapled cotton, but Surats were difficult of sale. On Saturday there was no material change in the tone, but in the afternoon some little anxiety was shown to realize, especially in Surats, and sales were made at a ½ decline.

On Monday the Africa's news were to hand, reporting cotton at New York 36 per cent. or 4 per cent higher than the previous quotation, while the passage of the second 150,000,000 currency bill had put the premium on gold up to 9½ per cent and ex to 120. The general aspect of warlike operations was also most unfavourable to peace. Our market received a strong stimulus from this news, and was also supported by large export orders from the Continent. In Havre the excitement had been even wilder than here, and Middling Orleans had reached there on Friday, 19d., and good Timoreely Madras 16d. per lb., nearly 2d. higher than those grades were in Liverpool, at the same date. Our market, in consequence, was very strong, the demand chiefly running on American and long stapled cotton; and prices of those grades advanced nearly ½d., putting Middling Orleans at 17½d. Surats recovered the previous decline and were firm at the highest prices touched; and a large business was done to arrive at 13½d. for April Broach; 13½d. for Omrawuttis; and 13d. for Dhollerah. May and June shipments sold at ½d. less. Yesterday the tone of our market still continued good, and prices of American cotton hardened under the export demand, Middling Orleans reaching 17½d.; but Surats were dull and in little request. To-day, however, there is a more decided feeling of quietness than has been yet experienced, and the sales only reach 8000 bales. American cotton remains steady, but Surats are freely offered, and can be bought in some cases at a full ½d. decline. The market for East India Cotton is considerably damped this afternoon by the arrival of the mail from Bombay, reporting enormous shipments of cotton for Great Britain. The clearances in the last fortnight, ending June 11, reach the extraordinary amount of 150,000 bales, or double what they were ever known to be before in a similar space of time. As the bulk of this cotton probably does not stand to sell more than 8d. or 8½d., showing a margin of 4d. or 5d. on the current prices paying for arrival, it is likely that it will be offered freely, even at a considerable reduction in price. It may be added in explanation that this enormous shipment is chiefly owing to the pressure exerted to get the vessels cleared before the monsoon; and as freight had fallen to a very low point, it is probable that comparatively little more remained to be shipped.

The amount of Surat cotton afloat for Liverpool is now about 375,000 bales, or sufficient to give us fully 30,000 bales per week for the next three months, and it is very unlikely that the trade and export demand will take off that amount, so that there is room for the stock of Surat cotton to increase materially, while it is quite probable that the total in the port may remain without much damage for three or four months.

Great anxiety is now felt to get later news from America. Rumours are flying about of the defeat of McClellan before Richmond, but nothing authentic is known. Our quotations this day for Middling American may be given as 17½d. for Orleans, 17½d. for Mobiles, 17½d. for Bowd Fair Dhollerah, and Omrawutta worth nominally 13½ to 13½ cents per lb.

MANCHESTER, July 8, 1862.

During the past week our market has been very much excited, owing to the great advance which has taken place from day to day in the price of the raw material.

The manufacturers in Germany, who are very bare of stocks at present, seeing no possibility of obtaining yarns at anything like a low rate by waiting longer, but rather the reverse, are coming forward en masse and placing orders in the hands of their agents here at prices considerably in advance of what they have paid previously, but which are still below what spinners will take, and they have only been enabled so far to place orders for 20s. water, 40s. mule, and 28s. to 40s. twist cops, because their limits for those numbers were sufficiently liberal as to put their friends in a position to meet the spinners' demands.

There has been a considerable business done in shirtings, jacquets, and print cloths, the two former having attracted the attention of speculators, who have picked up large quantities at a price scarcely exceeding that of the cotton from which they are made, intending to bring these on the market again for resale, in some cases, as soon as they can obtain a profit of about a shilling per piece; and, in others, where they look for a larger profit, when the demand arises subsequent upon the seriously diminished amount of production, and the better advices from India in response to the excitement here.

To-day the market has been very irregular. For yarns, the advance asked has been, in very many cases, from 3d. to 4d. per lb. upon the prices of last Tuesday; but sales have been effected only at an advance of 1½d. to 2d. per lb.

Many of our leading yarn agents assert that the only sales they have effected to-day have been for account of manufacturers, who prefer reselling what they bought within the last few days, at a profit of 2d. to 3d. per lb., to making it into cloth, with the almost certainty of having to sell it at a loss; in other words, choosing to close their establishments rather than manufacture cloth on speculation.

The German buyers are writing their friends for a further extension of limits, as they cannot otherwise execute orders, their offers being at the quotations of three or four days back.

Seven lb. shirtings are worth, to-day, 10s. 6d.; 8½ lbs. shirtings, from 12s. 6d. to 12s. 9d.; 16 by 16 printers, 21½d. to 22d. per lb., and 72 reeds, 2s. per lb. Some of the best makers are holding for 2s. 2d. per lb.

THE TOBACCO MARKET.

LONDON, July 8, 1862.

The markets here and in Liverpool gain strength weekly. Considerable business has been transacted this week in all descriptions of American growth at hardening prices.

The home trade evince anxiety as to supplies of stemmed and of Missouri leaf to take the place of Virginia. They seem inclined to increase their stocks, and there are indications of operations for resale. A large business has been done in manufactured twist as well as Cavendish, at very full prices.

The latest accounts from America show active markets and advancing prices.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

MARRIAGES AND DEATHS.

MARRIED.

On May 22, in Charleston, by the Rev. C. P. Gadsden, Captain G. L. Buist to Martha Allston, eldest daughter of Alonzo T. White, Esq., all of Charleston.

On May 20, at the residence of Mr. S. A. Atkinson, Richmond County, Georgia, by the Rev. Dr. Wilson, Mr. J. Frazer Sheart, of Charleston, S. C., to Miss Maria E. Erickson, of the former place.

DIED.

At Richmond, on the 15th of May, after a short illness of six hours, Theodore Zacharie, in the 21st year of his age, first Lieutenant of the Orleans Cadets, and son of James W. Zacharie, Esq., of New Orleans, La.

Blaize Cenas, son of Dr. Cenas, of New Orleans, and also a son of Mrs. Grimshaw, of New Orleans, were killed at Shiloh.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

Sacred to the memory of Columbus C. Hayne, a private member of the Silverton Artillery, Lamar's Regiment, who ceased with all terrestrial troubles at Camp Ancon, James Island, S. C., on the 22nd inst., after a short illness of two days, produced by congestion of the brain, aged eighteen years.

Whereas, It has pleased by Omnipotent God, in His allwise providence, to remove from our midst, in this day of trouble, our highly esteemed and beloved brother soldier. We deeply mourn our loss, for he was among the first to respond to his country's call, and died a true patriot at his post. As a soldier, he was surpassed by none; and as a citizen all who knew him could but love him. Yet, when he was summoned, like all others, he had to submit himself in the arms of one who doeth all things well. It is sad for us to lose of our band, when far away from home, yet we resign and grieve not; for blessed are they who die in the Lord.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

Extract from a letter from a lady to her husband in Europe, dated at Greensborough, North Carolina, May 26:—

"We left Richmond with very great regret, though I am very sure it was right to do so. Not that I for one moment apprehend the surrender of our capital; on the contrary, all those best qualified to judge of such matters are perfectly confident that the city will be defended, and our army gloriously triumphant. If, however, in the chances of war, with such immense disparity of numbers, as exists between us and our enemies, victory should happen to attend their efforts, Richmond will be a second Moscow—it may be burned, but it will never be surrendered. Charleston, too, will certainly be burnt if it cannot be successfully defended; and you may be assured that there is now no more prospect of the South being subjugated, than there was after the battle of Manassas. Indeed, I am convinced that we are now a more determined, a more united, and stronger people than we were a year ago. For those you are most interested in, I can truly say that we have never had braver hearts, or more abiding faith, in the justice of our cause."

Extracts from a letter from a young lady to a near relative now in England, dated at Richmond, Va., May 13:—

"* * * Again an opportunity offers of sending letters to you, and most gladly I avail myself of it, even though conscious that there are many chances against its ever reaching you. — wrote you a few days since, and, I presume, gave you a sketch of our wanderings and of the various incidents connected with our 'refugeeing.' We are now more comfortable and more homelike than we have been since we left — Valley. We would all be only too glad to remain here; but as all the efforts of the Yankees are now directed towards the taking of this city, we can only feel ourselves birds of passage. Of course we outsiders can know nothing positive of the policy of our Government; but it is generally believed, and I think with ground of information, that Richmond will be defended to the last man—and even though it should fall, and we are obliged to concentrate our forces within a narrower sphere, yet no one fears the ultimate success of our cause. As the clouds grow darker and more lowering, our hearts grow braver and stronger, and each one feels more determined to resist the invader. We have glorious accounts of the spirit of the people of the — Valley: the ladies never appear upon the streets but from necessity, avoid all communication with the mercenaries, and when its forced upon them, boldly avow their undying allegiance to the South. After the Yankees got possession they rejoined intercourse with Baltimore, they filled the towns with merchandises which the citizens refused to buy, even the children refusing to accept oranges, lemons, &c., that were offered to them, till they wasted in the shop windows, and had to be thrown away. And these are the people they have undertaken to subjugate. The women of Winchester have behaved most nobly. We hear that our dearly-loved home has been entirely destroyed, not burnt; the wretches said "burning was too good for that old rebel's house," but cutting the woodwork to pieces, knocking the doors and windows out, and completely ruining the place; the amount of damage done we cannot exactly find out, but we are assured that everything is ruined. I am so glad that you were spared the pain I know it would have occasioned you, in the packing up of all we valued, and turning our backs upon the home we loved so well; but we must expect to make great sacrifices, and I try not to allow myself to grow homesick; yet, since we left home, we have met with unvarying kindness; and since we came to Richmond we have been much gratified by the kind reception extended to us by all, but especially by your friends, who seem to consider it a privilege to be able to extend kindness to us, and thus serve you."

We possess a great advantage in Richmond that we cannot have at any other point—that of seeing many friends who are constantly passing through.

We were much amused by one of the trophies sent North by the Yankees. Our old pet cat and a young family of kittens were sent off as a part of "—s family goods;" pieces of the woodwork were made into silk-winders, combs, &c., and sent North as trophies. Could anything be more childish and perilous?

RICHMOND, May 23.

Extract from a letter addressed to a Southern gentleman in London:—

"* * * The portion of the State occupied by the Yankees has been reduced to a most deplorable condition."

My old father is not permitted to mount a horse without consent of the Commanding-General. I mention him only as a sample of what is going on with the whole community. All intercourse between neighbours is restricted or entirely cut off. The churches have never been opened since the advent of the Yankees. Not a single disloyal clergyman of any denomination has been found; all are fugitives, and many of them are in the ranks with the musket on their shoulders. The ladies and women of all conditions and all classes show the utmost aversion and contempt for the invaders. Every man capable of bearing arms has joined our army from the country that is overrun, and notwithstanding the defection of so many counties in North-Western Virginia, we have more men under arms than the whole number of qualified voters in the State. I wish I could write to you fully the real facts as to the Battle of Williamsburg. The Yankees state that our numbers were 30,000 in that battle; our real strength was Longstreet's division of about 9000 men. He fairly whipped three times that number of Yankees. Killing and wounding, according to their own admission, 3000 of their men. Our badly wounded were taken prisoners, only because the battle occurred on the retreat which Longstreet was covering, and when the Yankees were repulsed, he had to follow after our main army, or the whole of McClellan's force would have been upon him.

The Yankees plunder and steal everything they want, and destroy a great deal of property wantonly. They take bacon, corn, beef, mutton, poultry, all the products of the dairies and the gardens, and their line of march is marked by the destruction of enclosures and perfect devastation of the country.

I saw a man from Winchester, who left there on May 5; he reports that, so far as he could see, no tree or fencing of any sort was left in or near the town. He said the basement of Selma was used for stables, and that the house was very much defaced, and the outhouses and enclosures all consumed. Colonel McDonald was served pretty much in the same way; all the magnificent trees destroyed, &c., &c.

We have no traitors among us now, we are all of one heart and one mind; our people are enduring every hardship and sacrifice with cheerfulness and alacrity; and with the blessing of God we will drive back the detested Yankees. The poor negroes who have marched off in crowds are many of them returning, and many of them have evinced the same contempt for the invader with the white race. Many of them confer freely with their masters as to what should best be done for the common defence, knowing that they can leave at any moment; not only remaining voluntarily, but showing the utmost solicitude as to the common danger.

Here is the point of the greatest interest now, and of course I can give you no particular information. I can only say, in general terms, that although this city is beleaguered by the enemy, that at some point he is in great force, within five miles of us, and McDowell is threatening us with heavy columns from Fredericksburg, no panic exists here; our citizens and soldiers are in the highest possible spirits, and look forward to the result of the battle which is every day expected with the highest spirits. The more timid of the citizens went away some time ago. The men and women of Richmond who remain behind have spoken out to the authorities, demanding the shelling and sacking of the city rather than its abandonment, and all are ready for the sternest and deadliest resistance.

Probably before this hastily written note shall reach you the great struggle will have passed into history; but no matter how the battle here may end, I feel confident that it will be signalized by courage, endurance, and heroism on the part of our army, equal to any that has ever been exhibited.

NEW ORLEANS, May 15, 1862.

Since my last, great and unfortunate changes have taken place here, New Orleans being at present in the hands of the Federals, and subject to the good pleasure of General Butler. Now that we can see of what stuff the army of our enemies is composed, we are more than ever convinced that in a land attack they never could have succeeded; they prudently had recourse to their gunboats, and even then were held in check for many days and nights. A belief has prevailed in some quarters, that another defence of the city might have been made at the fortifications of Chalmette; against land forces, it might have been done, but against a fleet of steam-vessels the attempt would have been absurd. But what New Orleans could do, and has really done, has been to show the conquerors that they had made but a barren conquest, and accomplished no results of a permanent character. Strictly speaking, the city has not surrendered; being defenceless, it was occupied by the enemy, and its subsequent conduct has, in every point, been consistent with this fact, as a most complete line of demarcation separates our population from the invaders. Nowhere, literally speaking, have the officers been received, and several of them who in former years had been welcomed with open arms in our families, have found themselves excluded from the clubs and from all society; such is the case of young Duncan (son of the head of the firm of Duncan, Sherman, and Co.), whom you, perhaps, saw here two or three winters since. The most intimate family relations, the ties of relationship, marriage engagements (as known cases prove), nothing, in fact, has been able to close the vast gulf which separates the two races now in presence within our walls. The men show some moderation in the expression of their dislike, but the women, unable to restrain themselves, give no rest to the unfortunate officers, gathering their skirts as they pass them, as if to avoid the foul contact, and leaving en masse the omnibuses when an officer enters. To such an extent was this carried that the officers of a French gunboat which we had here were obliged to modify their city uniforms in order not to be mistaken for Yankees.

A few evenings since a picket of Federal soldiers paid a domiciliary visit at the house of Mrs. H.—in search of her son-in-law, who had temporarily left his regiment to come to the city; on being informed of the presence of the soldiers, Mrs. H.—left her room, went down stairs, and gave such a reception to the officer in command, ordering him to leave her house, that he obeyed, and left without accomplishing his mission. You must not believe that the native population, blacks as well as whites, are the only ones that show their dislike and contempt for the Yankees; the same feeling is shared by strangers of all nations, but especially by the English, the French, and the Spaniards.

The first have recently shown their sympathy for the South, by the act of a British military company, which had had Enfield rifles sent to it from England, and which, on learning of the approach of the Federals, sent all its arms and equipments, and even its uniforms, to our army at Corinth. General Butler has sent several members of this company to Fort Jackson, for the above reason, to the great indignation of the other British residents, all of whom are furious that there should be neither vessel-of-war, nor even a Consul, to protect them, Mr. Mure being absent since last year, and having left in the interim, as his successor, a very young and very incompetent man—at least, in the present state of affairs. As to the French and Spaniards, who were already little friendly to the Yankees, they are still less so since General Butler showed an inclination to violate at a single blow the consular domicile of both nations, situated in the Old Canal Bank, on Magazine-street. This locality was selected by the Consuls on account of the facility offered by the vaults for keeping objects of value deposited by their countrymen. General Butler suspected (without the least ground, in my opinion) that some of the bank specie had been deposited in those vaults, in order that he might not get it; and accordingly, by his orders, on Saturday at nightfall, the house was surrounded by a body of soldiers, and Heaven knows what might have happened had not the General very soon, on a formal summons from the Consuls, determined to withdraw his troops, who retired amid the hisses of a constantly increasing crowd, mostly composed of Frenchmen. Next day Captain Clouet, of the gunboat Milan, called on General Butler, and declared to him, in very severe language, that he must take good care to avoid the repetition of a similar outrage. Worthily following in the footsteps of his chief, General Butler hastened to write a letter of apology to the Consuls, giving, as it were, a miniature edition of the Trent affair.

Unfortunately, the Consul of the Netherlands had no war vessel to protect him; hence the unparalleled outrage committed the same day against his office and his person, of which you have undoubtedly heard. The stolen money was taken from his consulate, and transferred to the custom-house or elsewhere—the Dutch flag no longer waves over the consulate.

Whilst awaiting the results of these high-handed acts, it is now clear as daylight that the famous Union feeling, by the pretended existence of which Northern Democrats attempt to palliate their infamous apostasy, has so far been conspicuous as non est.

Butler has surrounded himself with a regular espionage, composed of foreign Jews, but that is not the surest means of restoring a fallen Government; and it is not less true that if, before the capture of this city, any one could doubt of the final triumph of the Southern cause, such doubt is no longer admissible. The country will yet have to undergo many trials and much suffering. The famine, which recently threatened us to such a point that bakers no longer made bread through absolute want of flour, and meat of inferior quality rose to $1 per lb.—the destruction, already in part accomplished, of all the present cotton crop, and the suppression of a great portion of the next crop to make room for corn supplies—the financial ruin which will follow hence for many persons,—these, and many other miseries, constitute, perhaps, a higher price than some people would at the beginning have consented to pay for the independence of the South—that is, for the triumph of right against might; but the higher the cost, the greater the value that will be set upon it.

General Butler has not yet carried out his idea of prohibiting Confederate currency, so that Yankee officers may actually be seen buying and paying with our paper. As to the United States' Treasury Notes, our merchants will not receive them, and in many cases, especially in the beginning, they have refused to sell to the Yankees, although exposing themselves to a forcible taking of their goods. It is needless to say that business is completely at a stand, except as regards city supplies, which come by special permits from Mobile, Red River, or Attakapas. Our river steamers have all taken refuge in inaccessible places. With the exception of a few bales, all the cotton which was in the city was burned on the approach of the Federals. A great part of that which had been brought down and stored on the sugar plantations of the neighbourhood has also been destroyed. The destruction has extended up as far as Vicksburg, and has not even spared Red River, where the Yankees have not yet penetrated. At Clinton, and other places of the interior, the same thing has occurred. This is to be regretted, because these sacrifices are useless, unless so far as they go to prove that in this phase of the struggle for independence the South is terribly in earnest.

It is now taken for granted in commercial circles here that the next cotton crop will be a very feeble one. "Supplies, supplies!" Such is the general cry in the South. What a singular revolution all this will make in the direction of the commercial current between Europe, the North, the West and ourselves! Peace or no peace, that revolution is a settled fact, especially for the West, whose blindness throughout this war has been little short of miraculous.

I have just room enough to mention that the officers of the Federal gunboats all declare they have no desire to interfere with our institutions, and that their only wish is to restore the Union, and then fall upon England.

Foreign Correspondence.

NEW YORK, June 20, 1862.

Exchange and gold are, with fluctuations, substantially on the rise; the new issue of 150,000,000 dols. with a supplement of 25,000,000, of one's, two's and three's, will end in a catastrophe. The object now is, on the part of the Administration, to carry the fall elections, by flooding the country with money; flush times come back; everybody is to have a Treasury note in his pocket. All the New England States are hauling in Treasury notes—I won't call them money—by the handful, in exchange for manufactures of all sorts; but the notes won't be paid, and there will be a crash, the like whereof has never been seen before. All the middle classes speak of repudiation without disguise. The fact is, the debt cannot be paid; the Western States will not stand taxation; and we shall have the same excuses as were made at the end of the Revolutionary War, viz., that the Government paper was depreciated and then bought by speculators; and no possibility of detecting genuine from spurious notes. All the signatures to the notes now issued are engraved, not signed, and there is no possibility of telling good from bad.

As for expecting any sensible views just now, that is out of the question; the people are either infuriated against the South, or they are in a state of supreme indifference as to results. I had no conception this country could be brought to such a depth of degradation, and in one short year.

CHARLESTON, June 2, 1862.

For the last two weeks there have been several encounters with the Yankees on Jones and James Islands, which they shelled from their gunboats coming up Stono River (Inlet?)

Our harbour has been put, as people say, in an excellent state of defence, and will resist, it is believed, any attack.

As regards obstructions in the water, I do not know how effective they may be, because I always see steamers running the blockade in and out; last week we had the arrival of three in two subsequent nights, and a fourth one had to be run ashore to save her from capture. The cargo has been saved.

Sailing vessels do not run the risk so frequently, as the blockaders have become more watchful, and, of late, quite a number of captures were made.

Charleston is now very dull, most of the families have left the city, with all they could take away. Soldiers are encamped on the battery, on the wharves, on City Hall Park, on Citadel Green, and on many other places.

PARIS, July 8, 1862.

At this particular moment, when public attention is so deeply engrossed with the American war—when the commercial transactions of the whole Continent have been brought to a dead stand by the egotistical obstinacy of the Washington Cabinet—when the cotton stock of each and every European market is on the eve of complete exhaustion, threatening by its fearful and constant decrease to enforce the closing of all the cotton mills and to throw millions of operatives of all nations out of employment and upon public charity—I must call your especial attention to the most significant articles of the Patrie of the 6th, and of the Constitutionnel of the 7th inst. Whether they were inspired by the Government or not, whether they express the sentiments of the French Administration or not, I will not pretend to say, nor is it material to inquire. Whatever be their source or origin, they clearly indicate this all-important fact, that public opinion is getting more and more weary of the abnormal condition of affairs, which is the immediate consequence of the wild policy pursued by the Government of the United States towards the neutral Powers of Europe; and profoundly disgusted with the savage brutality which is resorted to by the Federal Generals to resuscitate Union sentiments in the South.

"We speak advisedly," says La Patrie, "and hope the Americans may hear us; we ignore and wish to ignore what political combination is best calculated to change the actual situation; we do not desire to foresee, much less indicate, the terms upon which a mediation might bring about a necessary solution. But it is our bounden duty to say, because it is a truth too palpable to be denied, that the American war is no longer possible. The general condition of affairs, the interests which link nations together, their mutual intercourse, imperiously command its cessation."

"The Emperor Napoleon III. has taken but fifty days to defeat the Austrian army and conquer the Independence of Italy. The United States should not be allowed any greater length of time."

"A few years ago," says the Constitutionnel, "an Austrian General was dragged under the ban of European opinion because of his flogging women and shooting men; and outraged, struck, he was pursued in the streets of London by the brewers who had expelled him from Elkin's house. Had Haynau committed any atrocity but what has been surpassed by Butler? No; and yet he will, no doubt, be exalted by some of the newspapers who pretend to Liberalism, because he has treated a lady of New Orleans as a prostitute, for having looked with contempt upon one of his hirelings, and inflicted upon a man who had put down the flag of the oppressors of his countrymen the penalty usually applied to the lowest class of criminals."

The news which has reached us from America, last Monday, seems to forebode that the time of chastisement is near at hand. Who knows but what an invisible hand has not written upon the walls of the White House, as it did of old upon those of the Palace of Belshazzar, Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin; and that, awe-struck, Lincoln has not been driven by the same invisible power to seek the aid of General Scott. Does it not look as though Divine Providence, avenging the wrongs inflicted upon the South, was rigorously pursuing its ruthless invaders? Where is the Federal General, whose heart, burning with the pure fire of patriotism, has accomplished one of those noble and daring deeds of valour which inspires an army, and leads it to victory? Where is the Northern General who can grasp the Union flag and rally around it on the battle-field one single regiment determined to crown it with glory or die under its folds? Where is the would-be young Napoleon, and his princely staff officers, who are said to have aided him in maturing his plans of campaign, that in this hour of danger Lincoln is made to undergo the keen humiliation to bend down to the once old Hero, who now lingers unto death, with the remorse of having ordered the foreign hirelings of the United States to march into and overrun his own native State, the glorious and chivalrous State of Virginia?

I was told that at a certain Northern banking house of Paris some serious uneasiness was felt with regard to the steady increase of the premium on gold, and the rapid progression of the rate of exchange. Indeed, great misgivings were said to be entertained there about the probable causes which necessitate a modification of the Cabinet.

It may be that Mr. Chase has been driven from the Treasury department by his incapacity to meet the specie payment of the semi-annual interest, due on July 1, upon the bonds of the United States, as he had pledged the faith of the Government to do. Perchance, it may be, that, not unlike the little animals which, lest they should get drowned, invariably abandon a rotten ship when it is near sinking, the Republican Cabinet has thought prudent to retire to avoid being buried under the ruins of their tumbling Government.

From another Correspondent.

PARIS, July 8, 1862.

The two great events of the week are, the speech delivered by M. de Montalembert at the solemn annual meeting of the French Academy, and the death of the Duke Pasquier. M. de Montalembert's discourse, which is the topic of all conversation, is, as a matter of course, appreciated by the journals according to the political opinion they severally represent. While it is the subject of the highest commendation on the part of the Ultramontane press, it is bitterly criticised by the Imperial papers, and violently attacked by the organs of the Republican Party. Whatever be the different opinions entertained upon the political creed of M. de Montalembert, he has the great and very rare merit, now-a-days, to be sincere and true to his political and religious doctrines, and is undoubtedly one of the most talented and gifted orators of the present century.

The tendency to transform the French Academy into a political club is, however, deeply to be deplored. The elections to that body have, of late, lost their literary character to assume the worst features of party contests. To become one of its fortunate forty members, a candidate has no chance of being admitted into the sanctum if his literary works are not accompanied by incontrovertible proofs of strong partizanship.

The Duke Pasquier, who was buried on Monday last, with all the honours due to the elevated rank he held in society, was one of the few survivors of the Revolution of '93. Born in 1767, he was ninety-five years of age. Successively member of Parliament, with his father, under Louis XVI.; incarcerated during the Reign of Terror; Councillor of State and Prefet de Police under Napoleon I.; Deputy; President of the Chamber of Deputies; several times Minister; then Peer of France, under the Restoration; finally, President of the House of Peers under Louis Philippe, who elevated him to the dignity of Chancellor of France, and gave him the title of Duke in 1844. M. Pasquier was, besides, a member of the French Academy. The Duke's long public career will furnish his successor with ample matter for political allusions, of which the learned academicians seem to have become so fond.

The marriage of the King of Portugal with Princess Pie of Savoy, daughter of King Victor Emmanuel, is now official. The royal wedding is to take place at Turin, next September. The Princess was born on October 16, 1847, and is said to be remarkable for her beauty.

The politicians will see the hand of the Emperor in this marriage, which he is supposed to have brought about to make Spain feel his displeasure at her course in Mexico. The importance of the military preparations making for Mexico are far from corroborating the statements published about the safety of the troops under the command of General de Lorencez. I hear it positively asserted that his communications with Vera-Cruz are not quite as free as might be desired. All the iron-cased vessels, with the exception of La Gloire, have received orders to get ready to proceed to Vera-Cruz at a moment's warning.

I have been shown a letter, dated Washington, June 20, which contains the following paragraph:—"Fort Darling was again attacked on Tuesday last by the United States' fleet, and although the Associate Press telegraphs to-day the fact of its mortifying repulse for the second time, the authorities have suppressed its publication. Our friend —, read the despatch an hour since, and knows of its subsequent suppression. This you may rely on. Hence this steamer will not take out this news!"

Among the bills passed at the last session of the Corps Legislatif are to be found several laws of a very important character, inasmuch as they relate to the construction of the new railways. One of the systems adopted will, I think, prove extremely advantageous both to the Government and to the companies charged with their building. I allude to the law which authorizes the Government to give out the work instead of accomplishing it itself, and to convert into a cash payment the amount generally granted as a subsidy.

The Government, thus intervening to diminish the capital required by the company of all the amount of the subsidy, is enabled to control their tariffs, and reduce them precisely in the same proportion, with the difference of the amount to be actually disbursed by the company. The real cost of the railroad being thus considerably reduced, the company will, as a matter of course, require a much smaller revenue for the payment of the interest of its bonds.

Four of the railroads to be built under that new system, are destined to place La Rochelle in direct communication with Napoleon-Vendée, and to make of the town of Saintes the converging point of the embranchements of Contras, Rochefort, and Angoulême, all leading to and connecting with the Orleans and Bordeaux Railroad.

In compliance with the preference manifested by the Corps Legislatif, these four roads, running over a distance of 226 miles, have been made the object of a single concession, to be given out by way of adjudication. The Government has fixed the sum of 22,000,000 francs as the amount of its subsidy, and the firm of Guilhaud Jun., and Co., having offered the lowest bid by 1,505,000 francs, were a few days ago declared the legal grantees thereof.

The entire cost of these railways being valued at the sum of 64,000,000 francs, it will be perceived that both the Government and the company derive an immediate advantage from the application of this new system. While, on one hand, the Government realizes at once the difference between the amount of the subsidy granted and the cost of the railroad, on the other hand, the capital required by the company diminishes of all the amount of the subsidy, and brings down the interest upon the bonds to fully one-third of what it should otherwise be.

The company to which this concession has been made is by no means unexperienced in such matters. It has already successfully built several railways, principally in Spain, where it enjoys a reputation equal to that of any of its competitors.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, June 24, 1862.

SIR,—The foreign bankers [in Wall-street have at last taken fright at the condition of financial matters in the Northern States of America; when the crash comes, they will be the heaviest sufferers. The incorporated banks have managed to take care of themselves; in their bank books and on their checks are inserted the words, "payable in current funds," so they can readily settle with their depositors and note-holders by United States' notes. Not so with the foreign bankers, importing houses, and commission merchants, whose aggregate floating indebtedness to Europe is rising $200,000,000; they are obliged to receive Mr. Chase's issues, but as they will not pass current at any of the money capitals of Europe, and as they will not be able to get gold or Bills of Exchange, there will be a stop to commerce. Already it has become very difficult to purchase gold, and the premium is daily advancing. The precious metals that came by the last Californian steamer, are retained by the consignees; the banks will not part with that which is in their vaults at any premium just now. Why should they, for United States notes that may become worthless if McClellan is defeated? The United States have had a great advantage over the Southern States in money matters, by their connection with Europe; their floating indebtedness has been obscured from view by the ramification of commerce, but it will soon be seen, as it is now being felt, they have paid annually the interest to Europe on commercial balances, $10,000,000 to $12,000,000, but they waived out this amount in the shape of credits to other sections of the late Union, and have received, therefore, $20,000,000 to $25,000,000, to say nothing of the large commission on the business attracted thereby. When the bubble bursts, Wall-street being the financial centre, and consequently the endorser of Mr. Chase's schemes, will be the greatest loser. Almost any mail will give you advices of a grand explosion. The English holders of American securities seem to be taking time by the forelock, as each steamer brings out large orders to sell.

The Morrill tariff has been greatly increased, in order to compensate the Yankee manufacturers for the direct taxes with which they are assessed. No relief, however, is given to the Western States; they are not only to pay the taxes, but these additional duties, none of their products being benefitted in the slightest degree by the system of imposts, as hogs, cattle, and provisions are never brought from foreign countries. But these taxes never will be collected; indeed, I am assured by some of the members of Congress that voted for the bill, that they merely wanted to get the matter out of the way, and were in hopes that the passing of the act would enable the Federal Government to make large sales of its paper in Europe, and thus ward off the pressure that is now weighing so heavily upon the North.

The premium on gold was held back by the operation of the "bears" in the precious metals, who made large sales some weeks ago to deliver abroad at four per cent., so they are saddled with a heavy loss; in fact, it is supposed that some of them will be "cornered," the banks keeping a tight grip upon what they hold.

GUN BOATS.

The following interesting letter is from the Richmond Dispatch :—

Headquarters 1st Division Reserve, near Richmond, June 2, 1862.

SIR,—The panic caused by the enemy's gunboats is not, perhaps, unreasonable, considering the manner in which their deeds have been trumpeted and exaggerated; but it is very absurd and needless. I will state a few facts. Horizontal, or rather direct shell firing, as from Dahlgren or rifled pieces, is destructive only to shipping or buildings. It has very little effect upon batteries either with or without parapets, or upon troops deployed. This is due, I think, partly to the difficulty of causing the shell, even if well directed, to explode exactly at the object, but chiefly to the great velocity of the missiles, which carries the fragments after explosion beyond the point of bursting. Mortar firing, or vertical fire, as it is called, is, well managed, much more destructive and dangerous in that the velocity is small and the explosive force has full play. I have never known a shell from the gunboats exploding over an open battery or group or line of men to do any harm.

Last winter a portion of my command, under Captain Probel, was exposed to frequent day and night shell firing of 11 and 9-inch Dahlgren and rifled shells. The camp was shelled repeatedly, and fire started in it once by some camphene contrivance in the missile. We had but one casualty.

During the same time the enemy's gunboats fired between 100 and 200 heavy shell at a single picket station on the Potomac, without either hurting a man or driving off the guard.

The gallant Major Walker, of the artillery, unlimbered his battery in the open field, and for several hours engaged the Pawnee, Live Yankee, Anacostia, and a tug, at long range, without a single casualty, compelling the boats to retire. They were commanded by a brave officer of the United States' Navy, Captain Rowan, who is reported to have lost an arm in the fight.

The battery at Aquia Creek was shelled for three days last summer by the Potomac fleet, one vessel alone expending several hundred shell with no other effect than a scratch on one man's hand, and the killing of a trooper's horse in the rear of the battery.

Major Walker was over twelve times last winter, and fell under fire of 9-inch Dahlgrens from gunboats with his battery, without a casualty.

Lieutenant-Colonel Stephen Lee, of the Hampton Legion Artillery, now commanding the artillery of this division, twice engaged them—fired his battery against 9-inch shells—without a casualty.

When the Evansport batteries were opened on the Seminole and Pocomantas, even in the very imperfect condition of these batteries at that time, the enemy's fire inflicted no damage whatever.

At Yorktown, although the gunboats fired a great deal into the town, and at Gloucester Point, both of which were full of tents, hospitals, store-houses, wagons and troops, but no man was killed at Yorktown, and nobody hurt at Gloucester Point.

The other day, at the engagement between a part of my command, and the enemy at Eltham's Landing, near West Point, one of the enemy's gunboats opened upon a position from which a few moments before Lieutenant-Colonel Lee and Captain Reilly had in vain endeavored with four pieces to reach the transports; and though the boat got the range with great accuracy, and burst her shells directly over the heads, and within a few feet of the 6th North Carolina Regiment, commanded by Colonel Pender, but one man was hurt; and although their gunboats shelled the woods in which Hood's brigade and the Legion were drawn up, after the enemy were driven out, not a man was touched by them.

I can vouch for most of the above circumstances from personal knowledge and observation. Officers of my command attest all I have not seen myself.

At Port Royal and Hatteras, the result was due partly to overwhelming force, and partly to inexperience on the part of the gunners. It is said—and I have no doubt of it—that many guns were dismounted by the recoil, owing to the eccentricities having been carelessly left in gear when the pieces were fired, while others were spiked and rendered useless by the priming wires being left in the vent while the charge was rammed. Our firing was also bad. Yet, at both these places the loss of the garrison was trifling, when compared to the weight and length of the enemy's fire.

At Donnellson, by Commodore Foote's own showing, the gunboats were fairly whipped and withdrawn. Gunboats had nothing to do with the taking of Fort Pulaski. At Island No. 10 they failed. Forts Jackson and St. Philip surrendered from treachery and mutiny, and that alone. Fort Macon was taken by land batteries.

Let our men stand to their guns and fight them as the officers and men of our army did the other day at Drewry's Bluff, and there are few rivers in this country in which the Yankee gunboats will venture far—certainly not the James, the Cape Fear, or the Southern inlets below Charleston.

I hope the above statement will cool somewhat the excitement produced by the name and approach of gunboats. As far as our side is concerned, there can be no doubt as to the accuracy of the above statements. What effect we may have produced on the enemy, there is no means of ascertaining. In time, however, from the false and contradictory statements they are compelled to make, the truth is gradually sifted. Thank God, our leaders are not obliged to lie, either to keep our courage up or to satisfy our Government or people.

Very respectfully,

W. H. C. WHITING,

Brigadier General Commanding 1st Division of Reserve,
Army of the Potomac.

The Montgomery Advertiser furnishes the following list of gentlemen that the Lincolnites have in prison in Huntsville, Alabama:—Dr. Thomas Ferns, ex-Governor R. Chapman, Bishop H. C. Lay, George P. Beirac, E. q., William Acklen, Samuel Cruse, William McDowell, A. J. Withers, G. L. Martin, J. G. Wilson, Wilson Harris, Wm. H. Moore, T. J. McCally.

THE STRUGGLE FOR RICHMOND.—WEST TACTICS AND COMMON SENSE.

The Richmond Examiner, of Friday, thus comments upon the situation of the hostile armies now encamped before the Confederate Capital:—

McClellan can operate against Richmond in two ways. He can come up the banks of the river, with his flank covered by his boats, bring with him his siege trains, and, if not attacked, do here for the second time what he has already done once with unmolested ease and success at Yorktown. Or he can reach his army up the Northern banks of the Chickahominy through Hanover, get troops between Anderson's army and Richmond, and when he has done away with it, form a union with Banks and McDowell at leisure. The Chickahominy furnishes an excellent defensive line for our army, but as McClellan is on the other side of it, it defends him too while occupied in these comfortable arrangements.

Of course, if he is allowed to take his own time and do all he wants over there; if the Confederate commanders are going to sit down and twiddle their thumbs till he condescends to begin with them; if his hauling of heavy guns and digging of trenches is to be repelled by the hauling of other guns and the digging of other trenches; then the end of it is certain. Nothing is more mathematically proven than the plans of attack taught to the boys of West Point and other academies, provided armies can be reckoned into blocks of stone, which will stand still to be measured, weighed, calculated, and then one to be lifted over another as if by cranes and pulleys. The attacking army, given the requisite time, transportation and numbers, will always get the defending army in such a fix that it is bound to retire or be cut to pieces; and up to this time our defensive army has regularly retired in compliance with the principles of Jomini. Such has hitherto been the history of our war. But such is not the history of war in general, and it cannot always continue to be so here. There are such things as bravery, enterprise, invention, quickness of movement, determination of purpose, which have had much to do with the military results in every other age and country, and they will sooner or later make their way over all the precedents of the late army of the United States.

It is easy to repeat the cackoo song that war is a science, that no one knows it but those who have passed a life pretending to study it, that generals have done so, newspapers have not done so; that it is impossible to deliver battle to superior forces in unassailable positions; that our generals offer battle to McClellan he will not accept it, &c. But an appeal from common conceit to common sense and to history is always justifiable. The greatest masters of the military profession have left on record this unambiguous judgment, that war is an art, not a science, much less a mystery; that it cannot be taught or reduced to rules; that success in it depends upon mother wit, not study; that quick perception, strong sense, courage, enterprise, and general mental resources are the qualities that make a commander; that the worth of an officer is to be tested by his success, and the merit of a campaign is to be estimated by its results, and not by the opinions or criticisms of persons having military pretension. Now, what have been the results of the campaign in Virginia? The war has lasted a year. Many battles have been fought. In every one of the battles fought in Virginia, with the exception of Cheat Mountain and Roanoke, the Confederate soldiers have had the advantage; yet the Confederate armies have been always in retreat, never in advance, abandoning position after position, according to rule and square, till now the State is nearly all swallowed by the enemy, its fields desolated, villages deserted, farm-houses sacked, the slaves wandering in troops, the people a nation in exile, and the capital still safe only on the supposition that the precedent of the past shall here be abandoned. It is time to put in a protest against precedent, and to give a solemn warning to all those, if any there be, who propose to continue the campaign in Virginia as it has been commenced.

But our generals have often "offered battle." McClellan would not accept it. Therefore, they could not fight him. On this point we would refer to a memorable piece of military history. When the great general of the civil wars of Rome was engaged in his campaign against Publius Silo, a distinguished commander of the other party, he bothered him much with his trenches and slow advance. Silo often led out his legions in choice positions, "offering battle," which Caius Marius would never accept. At last Publius Silo resorted to this expedient:—He sent a herald in the lines of his adversary to make him this speech: "O, Caius Marius, if you are indeed a great general, why do you not come out of your ditches and fight me a battle?" Marius sent back his own herald to make this reply: "O, Publius Silo, if you are a great general, why do you not make me come out and fight you a battle?"

The advertising columns of the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin of the 20th June, contain the following special orders from General Butler:—

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, May 16, 1862.

SPECIAL ORDERS NO. 39.

I. The New Orleans Bee newspaper having published an elaborate, though covert, argument in favour of the cotton burning mob, is hereby suppressed. No publication of any description will issue from that office until further orders.

II. The New Orleans Delta newspaper having, in an article of to-day's issue, discussed the cotton question in a manner which violates the terms of the Proclamation of 1st of May inst., from these headquarters, the office of the paper will be taken possession of, and its business conducted under direction of the United States authorities.

By command of Major General Butler.

GEORGE C. STRONG, A. A. General.

GENERAL ORDERS, NO. 29.

I. It is hereby ordered that neither the city of New Orleans, nor the banks thereof, exchange their notes, bills, or obligations for Confederate notes, bills, or bonds, nor issue bill, note, or any obligation payable in Confederate notes.

II. On the 27th day of May inst., all circulation of or trade in Confederate notes and bills will cease within this department; and all sales or transfers of property made on or after that day, in consideration of such notes or bills, directly or indirectly, will be void, and the property conferred to the United States—one-fourth thereof to the informer.

By command of Major General Butler.

GEORGE C. STRONG, A. A. G. Chief of Staff.

The banks, in consequence of the foregoing order, gave notice to their depositors to withdraw their deposits of Confederate notes, prior to the 27th, else they will be held at their own risk.

The foreign Consuls have protested against that proclamation of General Butler in regard to the suppression of the Confederate currency.

Orders have been issued by General Wool prohibiting the sale or distribution of newspapers in Norfolk or the surrounding country; prohibiting the transportation there of supplies of merchandise of any kind, whether by sutlers or otherwise; and prohibiting officers, soldiers, and citizens from visiting the city, except on business connected with the troops belonging to the Department of Virginia.

THE WAR ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

The latest papers that we have received from Vicksburg are those of Wednesday the 21st June; the news is very interesting. The Vicksburg Citizen announces the arrival of General Lovell, but is not advised whether he comes to take command of the post. General Ruggles had also arrived. The Vicksburg papers publish the following correspondence:—

U. S. Steamer, Oneida,
Below Vicksburg, May 21, 1862.

Sir,—It becomes my duty to give you notice to remove the women and children beyond the range of our guns, within twenty-four hours, as it will be impossible to attack the defences without injuring or destroying the town—a proceeding which all the authorities of Vicksburg seemed determined to require. I had hoped that the same spirit which induced the military authorities to retire from the city of New Orleans, rather than wantonly sacrifice the lives and property of its inhabitants, would have been followed here.

Respectfully yours,

S. PHILLIPS LEE, U. S. N.,
Commanding Naval Advance Division.

To L. Lindsey, Esq., Mayor of City of Vicksburg.

Mayor's Office,
Vicksburg, Mississippi, May 21, 1862.

Sir,—Your communication of this date was handed to me at a late hour this evening—too late to give public notice to the women and children. In consequence thereof, I shall date your twenty-four hours' time from to-morrow morning, the 22nd inst., at eight o'clock, a.m.

Respectfully, L. LINDSEY, Mayor.

To S. Phillips Lee, U. S. N.,
Commanding Naval Advance Division.

Mayor's Office,
Vicksburg, Mississippi, May 21, 1862.

TO THE CITIZENS OF VICKSBURG.

I call the attention of the citizens to the correspondence between the Commander of the Advance Naval Division of the United States' fleet, and myself. The reply to my communication may be expected by nine o'clock to-morrow morning. The citizens must govern themselves accordingly.

L. LINDSEY, Mayor.

The following reply was received by the Mayor on the morning of the 22nd:—

U. S. S. Oneida,
Below Vicksburg, Mississippi, May 22, 1862.

Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of yesterday evening, and in reply, have to state that my communication of yesterday, in relation to the removal of the women and children, was for the purpose of placing it at my option to fire or not, as I think proper, at the earliest moment upon the defences of the town, without producing a loss of innocent life; and to that determination I shall adhere.

Respectfully yours,

S. PHILLIPS LEE, U. S. N.,
Commanding Naval Advance Division.

To L. Lindsey, Esq., Mayor of the city of Vicksburg.

SITUATION OF AFFAIRS AT VICKSBURG.

Our latest papers from Vicksburg, Mississippi, are those of the 21st May. The Yankee gunboats were then still anchored just in sight of the town. The women and children were leaving the place. Constant skirmishing was kept up between marauding parties from the gunboats and our guerrillas. The following correspondence had passed between the enemy and the city authorities:—

U. S. S. Oneida,
Near Vicksburg, May 18, 1862.

TO THE AUTHORITIES OF VICKSBURG.

The undersigned, with orders from Flag-Officer Farragut, and Major-General Butler, respectively, demands, in advance of the approaching fleet, the surrender of Vicksburg and its defences, to the lawful authority of the United States, under which private property and personal rights shall be respected.

Respectfully yours,

S. PHILLIPS LEE, U. S. N.,
Commanding Advance Naval Division.

T. Williams; Brigadier-General.

Mayor's Office,
Vicksburg, Mississippi, May 18, 1862.

Your communication of this date, addressed "to the Authorities at Vicksburg," has been delivered to me. In reply, I will state to you that, so far as the municipal authorities are concerned, we have erected no defences, and none are within the corporate limits of the city.

But, sir, in further reply, I will state that neither the municipal authorities nor the citizens will ever consent to surrender the city.

Respectfully, L. LINDSEY, Mayor.

To S. Phillips Lee, Commanding Advance Naval Division.

Mayor's Office,
Vicksburg, Mississippi, May 18, 1862.

Sir,—As your communication of this date is addressed to the "Authorities of Vicksburg," and that you may have a full reply to said communication, I have to state that Mississippians don't know, and refuse to learn, how to surrender to an enemy. If Commander Farragut, or Brigadier-General Butler, can teach them—let them come and try. As to the defences of Vicksburg, I respectfully refer you to the reply of Brigadier-General Smith, commanding forces at Vicksburg, herewith enclosed.

Respectfully,
JAMES L. AUSTRY,
Military Governor and Commandant Post.

S. Phillips Lee, Commanding Advance Naval Division, U. S. N.

Headquarters Defences, Vicksburg, Mississippi,
May 18, 1862.

Sir,—Your communication of this date, addressed to the "Authorities of Vicksburg," demanding the surrender of the city and its defences, has been received. In regard to the surrender of the defences, I have to reply that, having been ordered here to hold these defences, it is my intention to do so as long as it is in my power.

[Signed]

M. L. SMITH,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

To S. Phillips Lee, U. S. N., Commanding Advance Naval Division.

GENERAL BUTLER'S DESPOTISM.

From the Morning Post.

From New Orleans General Butler continues to supply food for comment. It that city military despotism, in its most unmitigated form, now reigns supreme. Women are outraged under official sanction, and men are murdered or sent to prison after being forced to submit to the mockery of a trial. The execution of an unfortunate gentleman accused of having in a street tumult hauled down the Federal flag calls for some investigation on the part of the Government at Washington. We can scarcely hope, however, that an Executive which could connive at the most wanton outrage ever offered to the females of a conquered city will trouble itself much about an act which will be attributed to intemperance zeal. With the instinct of his old profession, Gen. Butler seized with avidity an opportunity of practically illustrating the subtleties of the law of treason, and by hanging Mr. Mumford for pulling down a flag in a street row, established a precedent which may be subsequently referred to in determining what shall be considered overt acts. It is true Mumford protested his innocence of the alleged crime, and most probably told the truth; but a striking example being deemed necessary, General Butler was not deterred by any fears about hanging the wrong man, from furnishing another proof to the citizens of New Orleans of the vigour with which he intends acting in support of "law and order." Since then he has summarily committed to Fort Jackson an alderman and the chairman of the Ladies' Relief Committee, and left them, in the intervals of hard labour with the "ball and chain," opportunities for reflecting on the inestimable advantages of living once more under the mild and paternal Government of the United States. To us it seems perfectly inconceivable how the Government at Washington can leave in military command at New Orleans such a man as Butler. Not merely for the sake of consistency with their oft-repeated declarations, but for their own interests, we should have supposed that they would have made the position of the citizens of captured towns as little disagreeable as possible. Had a forbearing and temporizing policy been pursued at New Orleans, the rancour existing between the North and South would have been much diminished, and a foundation might possibly have been laid for an amicable compromise. But now every day widens the breach. The most wavering, the most timorous of Southerners are being rapidly converted into implacable enemies. Formerly they repelled the advance of the Northern forces, because it threatened their political independence; but now they see themselves compelled to fight in defence of their women's honour and their own lives. If the circumstances under which New Orleans surrendered were not those which could insure the favourable treatment of the inhabitants, then under none could any other city hope to meet with more consideration. Had General Butler left the maintenance of order in New Orleans to the municipality and the police, and had he refrained from trying the citizens before drum-head courts-martial, the Federal cause might have been materially benefited by the capture of Crescent City. Above all, had he abstained from outraging the susceptibility of every man and woman not utterly dead to the feelings of their nature by the publication of his too celebrated general order, the results might have been otherwise than they are. Now, however, the opportunity has been lost for ever. The mischief has been done; and never again, whatever may be the fortunes of their armies in the field, can the North and South exist under the same Government. The antipathy generated against Great Britain during the War of Independence has not, after a lapse of eighty years, entirely died away; but the animosity which has during the present war sprung up between the inhabitants of the rival States, and which is still further excited by the systematic commission of gratuitous outrages, will need the lapse of centuries before it is entirely extinguished.

The Citizen says that arrivals of steamboats from above continue, regular trips being made. This indicates popular confidence in the strength of the defences of the river. The burning of cotton was still going on in that section of country. We get the following additional items of interest from the Citizen:—

The gunboat fleet still occupies the same position, not having changed any since yesterday morning. They lie just inside the bend about six miles below, and in view of the city.

About twelve o'clock to-day one of the boats moved up towards our batteries a considerable distance in advance of the others. She now lies at anchor not far below the lower wharf boat. The balance of the boats appear to be making ready to follow their more adventurous leader. They still keep beyond the reach of our batteries.

The land forces of the enemy are estimated at 3000 or 4000 and it is believed will venture a land attack. If so, we do not fear the result.

It is reported that parties from the Federal transports below this city have landed in the swamp on the Louisiana shore, and that they are at work on the timber. What they are doing is not known; but it is supposed by some that they were constructing pits for the purpose of bringing their artillery up to some point immediately opposite the city. Our scouts ought to contrive some plan to discover what is going on. Nothing in the world is more feasible than to scour the Louisiana swamp with dugouts manned with sharpshooters.

The gunboat Mobile came down yesterday to take a "place in the picture" when the bombardment commences. If the iron-clad ram could be got ready she would prove very serviceable.

GENERAL JACKSON'S OPERATIONS IN THE LOWER VALLEY.

(From the Richmond Whig.)

A LETTER FROM AN OFFICER IN THE IRISH BATTALION TO A STAFF OFFICER IN RICHMOND.

Camp Winchester, May 26, 1862.

DEAR UNCLE,—A series of successes have crowned our efforts. We first drove the enemy from Front Royal, defeating and capturing about 600 prisoners—besides a very large quantity of stores of all kinds. Immediately after we got possession of the place, a train loaded with coffee came in, which is a perfect God-send to us, as rations of that article have been stopped for some days. We then drove the remaining portion of the enemy towards Middletown, where we captured a large portion of their waggon, containing a little of almost everything. From thence we wended our way towards Strasburg, where all of their waggon fell into our hands. We left our camp, which was about two miles beyond Luray, and marched twenty-seven miles to Front Royal—this was on Friday—we marched all day and night Saturday, and reached Winchester yesterday (Sunday), about five o'clock, or about daybreak.—The engagement lasted one hour and a-half, but it was a terrific one, short as it was. We were stationed just under the brow of a hill to support the Rockbridge artillery, which was on the left. We were not in the engagement, but were exposed to the enemy's fire the whole time. I have the mark on my pants where a piece of shell passed me and struck one of the men on my left on the arm, which was taken off.

General Sewell commanded the right wing, General Winder the left, and General Jackson the whole. The force of the enemy was about 15,000, but there were not more than 5000 in the fight yesterday. Their force was repulsed and scattered, and, after once getting on their seat, we did not let them rest. In the three days we have captured about 1500 prisoners. That I can safely say, but I think it will exceed that number, as they are still coming in. A squad of fifty-eight has just passed our camp. This does not include the negro women our men bring in with them. Sometimes we see a group of a dozen or more prisoners with three or four negro women. By the way, while here, three of the Yankees married negro wenches. We are still pursuing the enemy, but it is the general impression that they will not stop this side of the Potomac. General Shields left Winchester on Wednesday, crossing the mountains, but what course he took I have not learned. The rascals fired all the houses here filled with medical and quartermaster's stores, but the citizens put the fire out; so we save enormous quantities of everything—stores enough for our army for twelve months. All our men supplied themselves with clothes, shoes, blankets, and even shirts, socks, drawers, gloves, and everything a soldier wants or needs.

I am highly pleased with my position, but the marching nearly kills me. Our loss in the last three days, killed, wounded, and missing, will not exceed 200. Colonel Campbell, who commands our brigade, was wounded—so, also, Adjutant-General Hale and several other officers whom I do not know. General Jackson had his war-look on yesterday. He was so fatigued that, after the fight, he actually went to sleep on his charger. He rode about the battle-field regardless of shot or shell, and looked as if nothing was going on. I was not half so much alarmed as I thought I would be, it being my first appearance on a battle-field. I met with many narrow escapes, as did all of us, for which I am truly thankful. I never felt so proud as when we marched victoriously through the town of Winchester in pursuit of a fleet-footed army. Thanks to the Most High for his protection to our brave and gallant army. Just think of marching twenty-seven miles and fighting two hours. The men all call themselves Jackson's foot cavalry.

THE SYSTEM OF CONQUEST AS PURSUED BY THE NORTH.

The Richmond Examiner says:—

A few facts concerning the machinery employed by the Federal Government to render Maryland powerless to effect her own disenthralment, or aid in the Southern cause of independence, will serve to show the worse than Austrian tyranny of the Lincoln dynasty, and to discover to Virginia what surely awaits her people in the event of the occupation of her soil by the Yankee army, and the abandonment of it by her own.

In 1860 the Legislature of Maryland appropriated money for the purchase of arms for the arming of the State militia, which was done. After the events of April 19, 1861, and the invasion of the State by Federal forces, Governor Hicks called on the various military organizations to deliver up the arms. In a few instances the call was complied with, but the majority refused, and several companies crossed into Virginia, carrying their arms. A regular order for the seizure of all arms was then issued, which was followed by a general secretion of them on the part of the State militia and citizens. Armouries were forced open and searched, as well as private houses. No old fowling piece, rusty pistol, or outlass was harmless looking enough to save it from deposition at the great array of the Provost Marshal. They were brought forth from every imaginable place of concealment. Recently the Provost Marshal, learning that there were numerous arms buried in unknown places, issued an order reiterating the call for their delivery, and secretly offered a bribe to such as would betray the whereabouts of the weapons. In this way numbers of guns, varying from one to a dozen, have been unearthed in various parts of the city.

Squads of Yankees roamed the counties gathering up the arms of the country militia and raising Union flags. Threats, arrests, and even tortures, were resorted to to compel citizens to disclose where their arms were concealed. In St. Mary's County a German who had hidden his arms was seized and hung up by the heels until, like the inquisitors of old, they extorted their places of concealment. Instances of female devotion and fearlessness in their repulse of the Yankee intruders are related. Two Yankee soldiers, with bayonets fixed, stopped at the residence of a Marylander, now in the Southern army, and demanded any arms that might be in the house. His wife replied that she was exceeding sorry, but her husband and two sons had just gone off to the Southern army, taking all the arms with them. The Yankees "retired in good order." Another lady upon her husband's arms being demanded, produced a toy gun belonging to her son, and begged them to take it as the most destructive weapon she could give them.

But, notwithstanding the success with which these seizures have been conducted, we have the best evidence for knowing that the number captured bears but a small proportion to those hid away, but within the grasp of eager sturdy hands. There may be a day of resurrection coming. It may be far off, and yet it may be very near. Maryland is a disarmed and conquered State. Too much distrusted by the Federal Government to share either its confidence or its patronage, and yet too fully imbued with the Southern spirit to array herself in arms with the North against Virginia and her sisters. Maryland to day occupies a position in which no other State is to be found—a position at once equivocal to herself and humiliating to the Federal Government.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN AND THE BATTLE OF WILLIAMSBURG.

(From the Richmond Whig.)

LYNCHBURG, May 25, 1862.

To the Editor of the Whig:

I have just seen a despatch from General M'Clellan to Lincoln's Secretary of War, stating that at the fight at Williamsburg, General Hancock had taken two redoubts and repulsed my (Early's) brigade by "a real charge with the bayonet."

I wish to state, through your paper, that this assertion of Lincoln's Commander-in-Chief is utterly without foundation. When my brigade, or rather two regiments of it, attacked Wheeler's battery of six pieces and some other pieces from another battery, which were supported by Hancock's brigade, one or two redoubts, unoccupied by our troops, had been taken possession of by Hancock's brigade, and his artillery, supported by infantry, had been advanced from one of the redoubts to a position near some farm-houses. My brigade, which had been ordered up from the rear, advanced through a thick wood to the attack of this position; and the 24th Virginia Regiment, single-handed, assailed and drove back the battery and the infantry to the cover of the redoubt, and the woods near by, and a fence. The 5th North Carolina Regiment came down from the extreme right to the support of the 24th, and gallantly attacked the battery in their new position; and had these two regiments been sustained, they would have captured the battery and driven Hancock's brigade from the field. As it was, they only retired from the field, under orders from Major-General Hill, I having been previously disabled and compelled to retire. In falling back, about 140 men from these two regiments got, by mistake, too far to the left in re-passing through the woods, and were taken prisoners by a regiment of the enemy stationed there. Hancock's brigade did not charge bayonets, or make any pretence of doing so. It did not even attempt to pursue my two regiments as they fell back, and the prisoners taken were taken by the mistake above mentioned. The 24th Virginia regiment carried from the field some twenty-five or thirty prisoners taken by it.

Respectfully,

J. A. EARLY, Brigadier-General.

THE BADGE OF HONOUR.

In the following orders, General Beauregard announces that hereafter the merits and gallantry of those true heroes of the war—the private soldiers of the Southern army—are to be recognized and recorded:—

Head-quarters, Western Department, Corinth, Miss., May 18, 1862.

GENERAL ORDERS No. 43.

I. To do full justice to the private soldier, who is seldom accorded his meed of praise, and who rarely receives full credit for his gallant deeds; and to place him, in this respect, more nearly on an equality with the commissioned officer, the commander of the forces has determined to distribute a badge of merit, in person, in presence of the troops, to every officer and every private soldier who shall greatly distinguish himself in any engagement with the enemy.

II. The badge will have inscribed upon it the name of the battle in which it was won. During war it will be a proud testimonial of the wearer's heroism, and will place his name upon the list of those entitled to promotion in the army; and when the invader is driven back, and our independence secured, it will gloriously prove his title to the gratitude of his countrymen, and to the highest civic honours.

III. Commanders of corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, and companies, will, immediately after each engagement, carefully report their bravest men to a military commission, to be appointed for the purpose, upon whose report that their conduct has been preeminently brave, they will receive this reward of patriotism and courage from the hands of their general.

G. T. BEAUREGARD, General Commanding.

YANKEE RULE IN NEW ORLEANS—HOW THE LADIES ARE TREATED.

The Mobile Advertiser contains the statements of a lady just from New Orleans, which confirm other accounts, and the tenor of Butler's orders, to the effect that the conquerors are making the unhappy citizens feel the iron heel of their power. Every day the military surveillance becomes more rigid, and the regulations more stringent. Butler, as the most infamous of his orders indicates, is levying fierce warfare upon the ladies. They grievously offended his Yankee Highness by wearing as trimmings of their bonnets, &c., semblances of the Confederate flag, and the Southern colours, red and white. Picayune ordered them to indulge no more in such demonstrations of rebellious sentiment, under penalty of condign punishment. Mrs. J. B. Walton, the lovely and accomplished lady of Colonel J. B. Walton, of the Washington Artillery, is now in close confinement, because she refused to remove the little flag which formed part of the trimming of her bonnet. It is thus that the valorous Picayune avenges so much of the rout at Bull Run as was due to the well served guns of the Washington Artillery. Persons were being arrested and consigned to dungeons at the whim of the Yankee despot. 50,000 men had been landed in the city, and were now quartered within and about it, and garrisoning the works of the coast, lakes, and rivers. A great deal of sickness, and of a very fatal type, was prevailing among the unacclimated Yankees of New England, and seventy dead invaders were carried out from one hospital and buried during a single night. Large numbers of buildings are being converted into hospitals for the accommodation of the great number of sick, who, if they do not die from actual disease, probably do from fear, their imaginations being tormented with terrible visions of Yellow Jack. It was common talk among the Yankee officers that Mobile would soon be attacked, and they said that the city would be shelled without hesitation if resistance was made after their gunboats were in range. When the lady applied to the Yankee Provost Marshal, she tendered a Confederate note in payment of the fee exacted. The official took it and hurried it violently back into her face. Obtaining other money, she paid the amount.

DEATH OF A YOUNG PATRIOT.

Died in this city, on the 8th inst., of typhoid fever, and at the twenty-eighth year of his age, Henry J. Nott, son of Dr Josiah C. and Mrs. Sarah Nott, of Mobile.

This amiable, ingenuous, and noble youth adds another name to the roll of the dead, whose lives have been sacrificed in this unholy war of Federal invasion. Born in Mobile, on January 18, 1838, carefully nurtured and educated by fond parents, he grew to manhood the pride of his family, and beloved by his friends and associates. Four years ago this month he accompanied his brother to Europe, to perfect their education in the professional walks of life they had respectively chosen. When they learned that Federal power had declared war upon their native South, both brothers abandoned their studies abroad and came home to take part in the struggle. Both of them joined the 22nd Alabama Regiment, commanded by their uncle, Colonel Zack C. Deas, and both passed, unhurt by the missiles of the enemy, through the two bloody days of Shiloh. But, alas! the precious young life which death had spared on the battle-field it reserved for its shaft sped by painful disease. His friends, aware of the delicate constitution of the young soldier, dreaded the exposures and privations to which camp life would subject him. He, too, was conscious of it, but his brave spirit would brook no argument that kept him out of the ranks of his country's defenders. The malady which terminated his life, after a protracted illness of twenty-nine days, was contracted in camp and developed itself on the day after the Battle of Shiloh. It steadily ran its fatal course, defying all that medical science and tender nursing could interpose to check it, and terminated in the death of the young patriot on the afternoon of Thursday. Last week, while prostrate with his final illness, he received a commission of appointment to the Second Lieutenant of Company C in his regiment—a promotion from the rank of Sergeant-Major, recommended by General Bragg, and earned by gallant conduct on the field of Shiloh.

Such are the sacrifices that parents, friends, and country, are called upon to make, in the providence of God, in this war of Independence. It is a hard and bitter trial to yield up the jewels of their brave and manly youth. It is hard when death seeks its "shining marks" among the young, the amiable, the educated, and polished of our young patriots. But it is the will of Heaven, and it is only from Heaven that consolation for the afflicted can come. Earth contains no balm to heal such cruel wounds as these.—Mobile Register.

The Knoxville Register has the following about Nashville:—

The ladies of Nashville are as vindictive as ever against the Federals, and the men quite as far from being friendly. The Northern soldiers freely express their disappointment and surprise at not being more cordially welcomed by the oppressed and terrorized Union element they came to liberate. Several brigades, from different free States, disgusted with the imposition practised upon them in this respect, and with the representations made to them, that the rebellion would be ended in thirty days, that the capture of Nashville would immediately bring Tennessee back to its allegiance, &c., did demand their discharge and refused to fight longer against the South. They were disarmed, but as there were too many of them to think of hanging, and too many to hold in Nashville as prisoners until they could be reduced to subordination, they were all sent northward under guard. This probably gave rise to the rumour we heard some time ago about the evacuation of Nashville.

The rumours we have had of the demoralization of the invading army are not exaggerated. The deserters from Nashville number fifteen or twenty daily. A Michigan regiment applied to a lawyer to get a writ of habeas corpus to claim a discharge from service on the ground that they were induced to enlist by false pretences; that they came South to fight for one object, and found that the war was prosecuted for a different object. Upon applying to the commanding officer to know if the writ of habeas corpus would be respected, his reply was that it would not, and, if taken out, he would shoot every man of them for mutiny. These facts Andy Johnson's vigilant censorship of the press has prevented from becoming generally public.

The Tax Bill passed by the Lincoln Congress has created much excitement among such of the troops as are small property holders. They swear they never can pay it, and that their property never shall be sold for it. They intend to return home to resist it, and, if the war is not ended in thirty days, they will lay down their arms.

COLONEL MORGAN AND THE FEDERAL SOLDIERS.—At Cave City, Morgan made a dash on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, intercepting a freight train loaded with provisions, which he destroyed. After while he was informed of the approach of another train. He then stationed his men to await its arrival. It turned out to be an express and passenger train. Having captured it also, and made prisoners of the officers and men, he took possession of the money on board—a large amount of Federal Treasury notes. Morgan paroled the men, after receiving their signatures and paying them off with the Treasury notes the amount due to them by their Government, and retained the officers as prisoners. The women became dreadfully frightened on finding they were in the power of the terrible Morgan. Drawing up in line before him, they made a touching appeal to him, asking mercy. Morgan listened very attentively, and told them they had reason to expect harsh treatment at his hands, in return for the course pursued by the Federals to our women and children. He, however, was a Confederate officer, and a gentleman, and would assure them that they and their baggage should remain inviolate; that he had determined to destroy all the property in his hands, but would reserve a locomotive and a freight car to take them back to their homes in Louisville. A young and handsome wife of a Federal officer, one of Morgan's prisoners, then addressed Morgan, saying that as he had shown so much magnanimity towards the ladies, she would intercede for her husband, and ask for him lenient treatment at his hands. Morgan, touched by her appeals, and struck by her beauty, asked her to point out her husband—who was standing with the other officers, crest-fallen, dejected, and sad picture of despair. On being pointed out to him, Morgan scanned him from head to foot, and turning to his pretty wife, replied: "Well, madam, if he can be of any use to you, take him back to Louisville; I have no use for him." Charleston Mercury.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 20s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JULY 10, 1862.

The West.

In speaking of the American combatants it is usual to designate them as the North and the South, because these are the familiar and well-defined expressions for political, social, and geographical distinctions that have existed since the formation of the Union. Within the last fifteen years, however, a third section has grown into a distinct Power, with interests differing alike from those of the North and of the South. This section is composed of the grain-growing States along the banks of the Ohio, the Upper Mississippi, and the Great Lakes. This section, like the South, is purely agricultural, and therefore has no commercial interest in common with the manufacturing and trading States of the Atlantic seaboard. Morrill Tariffs are as much a tax to this section as to the South, though its capacity for consumption of imported commodities is much smaller. The restrictions upon foreign shipping, which enrich the shipowners of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, bring no benefit to the West. On the other hand, the antipathy and positive hatred to the aristocratic planter is a more deeply-rooted, and we may add, a more conscientious feeling with the small farmer of the West than with the manufacturer and merchant of the North proper. Thus it is, that while the North wages war against the South, from the powerful motive of self-interest which it has to recover these rich tributary regions, the West has waged the war from an honest fanaticism. Thus far the West has borne all the burden of the contest, while the Atlantic States have reaped all its profits. The West has furnished the largest and most effective contingents to the army, and has achieved almost all the successes of which the Washington Government can boast. It had no shipping to which the war could give profitable employment, no manufactures or amassed capital with which to wax fat by lucrative army contracts. The millions which are daily lavished by the Federal treasury, never find their way into the pockets of the West. So long as these millions consist only in promises to pay, the West might remain contented; but when the time comes to make them good, and it is called upon for its share, the question assumes a very different aspect.

Those best acquainted with the condition of American affairs have always foreseen in this one of the chief obstacles to peace. Though it would be ruin to go on with the war, it would be equally certain ruin to stop short. With the end of the war would come the day of reckoning, and the West would be sure to repudiate the portion of its public indebtedness. The day that the hope was abandoned to reconquer the South, a further disintegration would become an absolute certainty. A common hatred alone binding North and West together, the last tie between them would snap when its gratification was no longer possible. Triumphs, real or imaginary, are indispensable to prolong the alliance. But for a month past, even the imaginative geniuses of the Federal War Department have not been able to manufacture triumphs. There is a pause in the din and smoke of conflict, and already we can hear the first angry mutterings of another storm gathering in another quarter of the horizon. The Western States are preparing to make good their threats to resist the payment of the taxes, which indeed they have not the means of paying. In Indiana the Governor raises a note of warning against treasonable combinations, which he declares are forming all over the State. In Illinois the Supreme Court has declared the issue of inconvertible paper by Congress an unconstitutional act, and therefore not binding upon the citizens of that State.

These are only symptoms, but they are infallible ones. If the 4th of July could have been celebrated in Richmond, or amid the smoking ruins of Charleston, the West might forget its discontent, and submit for a while even to the tax bill. But before Richmond McClellan's great army wastes away from fevers; before Charleston the Federal arms have just suffered a severe check. The only possible successes that the most sanguine hope can dream of, as a conclusion to the spring campaign, consist in the long-expected and still delayed fall of the two isolated cities of Vicksburg and Mobile. Even if this hope were realized, it would be a poor compensation for the bitter disappointment, if not despair, which manifests itself in the dark rumours of disasters which overshadow the land, the loss of confidence in civil and military authorities, the rapid rise of gold and of exchange.

When the South withdrew from the Union, the North had still an immense territory, a well-organized Government, defective but yet liberal institutions, a well supplied treasury, a flourishing commerce. By conceding to the withdrawing partner his just rights, it might still have obtained from him the most important of those many material advantages which it hoped to wrest from him by force. The war has cost it its commerce, its liberties, its wealth, and now, before it is yet ended, threatens to cost it the greater part of its territory as well. We look upon the further disintegration of the United States as the certain result of peace, unless, indeed, that peace were obtained by the complete conquest of the South. Except on that condition, the West will be compelled in very self-defence to imitate the example of the South. The Pacific States, in all probability, will form still another political organization.

This partition has been often predicted as the ultimate fate of the American Union, though no one, perhaps, thought it so near fulfilment. It is, in fact, the partition which Nature decreed in the geographical formation of the American continent. Each part would still have a territory of no moderate extent, confined within natural boundaries, a climate, productions, and population distinct from those of the others, and all the resources of a self-sustaining nation.

The Last Presidential Election in the United States.

THE election of Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, to the Presidency was the signal for the disruption of the American Union; and the bloody war by which that disruption is being consummated. It was the signal, but not the cause, though in the first surprise at the unexpected catastrophe which ensued, the public opinion of Europe almost unanimously so considered it, and wondered at its obvious disproportion to the effect. In superficial parlance, this election—itsself the resultant of many deeper and more potent agencies—may still be termed the cause, but, historically or philosophically speaking, this is as incorrect as to call the Rape of Lucretia the cause of the overthrow of Royalty in Ancient Rome. The portentous significance of Mr. Lincoln's election is not yet generally understood in Europe. Many minds, even at this day, can see in it nothing more than the success of one political party over another, in which it was the duty of the vanquished, as good citizens, to acquiesce, as had been the case in all previous elections. A knowledge of the history of the last Presidential election in the United States, and of the exceptional issues which it involved, must tend to modify this opinion, and to that extent throw light upon the true causes of the great event which now absorbs so large a share of the world's attention. Towards this it is our object to contribute, though the vastness of the subject forbids more than a brief sketch of the most essential outlines.

We have before adverted to the very prevalent error that, under the laws of the United States, the President is elected by the popular vote. A few details under this head may not be inappropriate here. The chief clauses of the Constitution, relative to the election of the Federal Executive, read as follows:—

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress. . . . The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President. . . . The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed. . . .

In 1860, at the period of the ensuing quadrennial election, the number of States composing the Union was 34, of which 14 composed what, in the vocabulary of American politics, has always been termed "The South," and 19 what, by contrast, has always been called "The North"—these terms designating the two great rival Powers whose conflicting views, interests, and institutions are the key to the otherwise hopelessly intricate maze of American politics. The number of electors to be appointed—constantly varying with the number of States and their relative populations—was at that period 303, of which 187 fell to the States of the North, and 116 to those of the South. The number of votes required to elect a President, according to the clause of the Constitution which we have quoted was therefore 152 (the majority of 303), or 36, more than the South could give, while the North might waste 37 votes, and still carry its candidate, despite the unanimous opposition of the South.

Let us pause an instant over these figures, for they are more eloquent than volumes of rhetoric. They prove that the South had not the power, even if it had the wish, to impose upon the North a Chief Magistrate hostile to Northern interests, since it must gain for him Northern votes to the number of more than one-third of its own electoral strength, or one-fifth of that of the North, before he could be elected. The North, then, had nothing to fear from the South. The South, on the other hand, had no safety except in the sense of justice of its rival, or rather foe. So long as that sense of justice was believed to exist, there were "Union men" at the South, and they were earnest and zealous in their appeals to that supposed sense of justice. How the North responded to the appeal, all the world knows; but even had the Northern States made a more moderate and less unjust use of their power, Southern men might well ponder over the degradation of their section to a helpless inferiority at the mercy of a former equal, and cast about for a remedy. But where was the remedy to be found? Every decade of years added to the North the population of a good-sized kingdom, through the constant agency of foreign immigration; while the South, though not inferior in the natural increase of its population, depended upon that natural increase alone. Thus New York had come to be the third largest German city of the world, its German population being inferior only to that of Vienna or Berlin. Whole States, such as Wisconsin and Michigan, had been built up by the foreign element. Each new State thus added, each vote thus added to an old State, diminished the power of the South, not relatively merely, but absolutely. Great as was the disparity in 1860, it would be much greater in the next Presidential election, for the new apportionment consequent upon the decimal census would deprive the South of nearly a score of its present 116 votes, and add them to the 187 of the North. Evidently the partnership between the two had lost its original character, and though entered into expressly for the common benefit, was rapidly working out the destruction of one of the partners.

Had the United States been a nation, either in theory or in fact, instead of being an association of States, this constant shifting of the political centre of gravity in the same direction might not have disturbed the national equilibrium. Even had the States not been leagued into two distinct and hostile camps, the day of disruption might have been long delayed, perhaps averted. But the terms "North" and "South" were no arbitrary designations. They meant populations differing in their political views, in their social institutions, in their commercial interests. With the transfer of the whole political preponderance to one section, these differences also widened. The influx of the foreign element rendered the North more radical, more fond of change, more ultra-Democratic, while the South clung to the political traditions and the institutions of the fathers of the Republic.

Social distinctions necessarily widened; also, as the ingredients, as well as pursuits, of the population of the two sections became more different. Commercial interests, though often bartered away by the South for political advantages, began to assert their influence with the greater force now that it had become apparent that their surrender could no longer purchase anything in return. The North, having become the political as well as commercial centre, naturally had everything to gain by consolidation and a concentration of the powers of Government. The South saw in the rights and privileges of the State organizations, the sole remaining barrier against the encroachments of its rival.

Thus the Southern States entered upon the unequal contest for the election of a Chief Magistrate of the Federal Government, in 1860. The Northern States had the power to destroy for ever, without hope of future redress, or the accidents of fortune, their political influence as members of the Union; to subvert the very foundations on which their social institutions rested, and to drain them of their wealth by still more onerous burdens in the shape of Morrill Tariffs. Men and nations sometimes console themselves by political gains for losses of a more substantial nature; more often they prefer material prosperity to political splendour. But the South was not even to be left this choice, if the North so willed it; and whether it did so will it the election of 1860 was to decide. No earthly power within the Union could ever reverse the decision, for at the next election, the triumph of the North would be still easier, and the North would then be able to change the Federal compact itself, without consulting the other party to it. By the letter of that compact the votes of two-thirds of the States were competent to make any fundamental alteration. Only three more States were needed to the North to make up the required number, and thus elude the spirit though obeying the letter of the instrument, and that number of organized territories, chiefly peopled by foreign emigrants, were actually preparing for admission as States, so soon as it might suit the North to consummate the contemplated wrong upon its former partner.

Although the vote for President is, as we have seen, cast by electors appointed by the several States in such manner as the Legislatures thereof may determine, yet it has been the American practice, almost since the formation of the Federal Union, for each political party to announce the candidate of its choice, and on such occasions to issue a manifesto declaratory of its principles and objects. The electors of each of the States are always committed beforehand to the support of one or the other of these candidates, and thus the appointment of the electors practically decides the result long before they have, after the delays and in the form prescribed in the Constitution, cast their votes. Down to the election of Mr. Pierce in 1852, there were in the United States but two great political parties, the Whigs and the Democrats, into whose respective party creeds we need not here inquire, except to warn the reader that the name of either affords no clue in these creeds. The one had a majority of adherents in the North, the other in the South, but each alike was a "national" party (to use an adjective of quite recent origin in the United States); that is, each claimed to be earnest in the promotion of the common interests of both North and South, and to have the weal of both equally at heart. The alternate successes of either were acquiesced in by the vanquished party without so much as a thought that it would be a justification of any civil disturbances. In the election of Mr. Buchanan in 1856, a third party had sprung up, whose avowed object it was to assert to its utmost extent the political power which increase of population had then bestowed upon the North. This party, exclusively in the interests of the North, and having no advocates or avowed adherents at the South, was justly designated as a "sectional" party, against the formation of which every American statesman, since Washington, had solemnly protested, and the success of which all men of all former parties regarded as the unfailing symptom that a further continuance of the Union between North and South was no longer possible. No such party had ever held the helm of the Federal Government, no such party, according to the warning of the fathers of the Union, could ever hold it. Though polling a large popular vote in the Northern States, this party, in 1856, failed to secure a majority of the Electoral Colleges; but its success, however incomplete, was sufficient to encourage a greater effort at the next trial of strength. During the four years of Mr. Buchanan's Administration, many things occurred to widen still further the already irremediable breach between North and South, and to distract the counsels of those who still hoped against hope to preserve the Union. Thus, in 1860, this new party once more selected a candidate—an obscure man of less than humble antecedents—and declared principles even more offensive to the South than four years before. Offensive as these were, they might be considered conciliatory, compared to the sentiments expressed by its recognized leaders, orators, and presses. The masses of the North were taught to believe that the South was too weak or too cowardly to resist or resent the open attempt upon its liberties, its institutions, and its wealth. The innate hatred of the Northerner against the Southerner was kindled into a furious flame, and on the 6th day of November every Northern State appointed electors committed to vote for Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, the candidate of the North. It is needless to say that not a vote was cast for him by the South. Even then there were men who, seeing the danger, hoped to avert the catastrophe by appealing to the electors to exercise their constitutional privilege of selection, and agree upon a compromise candidate who might be, if not acceptable, at least less obnoxious to the South. But it was too late. The votes of the Northern States were cast as the mob had dictated, and Abraham Lincoln was declared the elect Chief Magistrate of the American people, though a whole section of that people, occupying one-half of the territory of the Federation, had declared, as one man, that they would receive this election as a challenge to defend to the last extremity their civil and political rights, their social institutions, and their property.

As had been predicted by the wise men of the Union, since its formation, the Sectional President never ruled over the whole of the Union. When he took his oath of office, seven of the States had already declared the Federal compact annulled so far as they were concerned, and seven more were preparing to follow their example. As though history were determined to leave no doubt as to the animus of the Northern people in taking this fatal step, it records that a national candidate was offered to their votes, a candidate of Northern birth and antecedents, a candidate whom the majority of the Southern people suspected of undue Northern proclivities; but whose election would not have been deemed a just cause for disunion. And history further records that the only State whose electoral vote was cast for this candidate was one of the fourteen States of the South. When it is asserted that the Southerners destroyed a magnificent political fabric, and plunged a continent in blood, for no better reason than a factions opposition to a constitutionally elected Chief Magistrate, let the candid student of history keep in mind that this election was an event unprecedented in the history of the American Union, and against which its statesmen, with one accord, had raised their voices, as the reef against which it must inevitably wreck; that this event was a challenge, so intended by those who gave it and so understood by those to whom it was given, to defend all that freemen hold sacred; that the Southern people acted as a unanimous people, through their State organizations, and neither as an insurrectionary mob, nor as a political party; that finally, after having exhausted every means of warning before the wrong was done, they exhausted every means to avert its dreaddest consequences; that the war was forced upon them when they were almost defenceless, and, so to speak, taken by surprise; and that throughout, to their bitter cost, they have scrupulously confined themselves to the defensive, eager at any moment to embrace peace when the invader abandons his criminal attempt at their subjugation.

The Celestial Empire of the West.

His Imperial Majesty of the Vermilion Pencil is more than an Alexander in the multitude of his victories. Daily and hourly yellow couriers announce at Peking the destruction of a rebel army, the death of ten Tae-ping generals by strangulation, and the restoration of vast provinces to order amid the shouts of grateful millions. Yet the revolt continues, as though Kublai Khan himself, with woe in his rear and panic in his front, were at the head of it. Half the immense empire is a mass of blood-stained anarchy; a mighty tumult wanders incessantly between the Great Wall and the Great River; cities are taken and retaken; the earth is saturated with carnage; but the chiefs of legions protest that their still-beginning, never-ending work is flourishing gloriously. Some of this spirit appears to have infused itself into the Federal American character. Surely those huge battalions that are always conquering, and never losing a man, must be costumed in Tartar mail, with dragons breathing fire upon their shields, and emblems of slaughter on their boots; else how should we hear of these more than Napoleonic triumphs over an enemy whose peculiar vice it is, like the Englishmen at Waterloo, not to know when he is beaten? The North, however, cannot exist without bulletins which, of course, are ordered in the immortal Chinese fashion: the foe routed—park of artillery captured—field covered with hostile dead—1000 standards taken—camp encumbered with prisoners: one man killed, and a horse lamed, on the side evidently favoured by heaven—and sun going down upon General McClellan gazing upon the ruins of the misguided Confederate army. This pattern despatch is of a strictly Oriental texture. It was Pao-hing of the Green Button, assuredly, who originally suggested the organization of a Victory Department at Washington; where the name of a creek, two or three commanders, and a small supply of local colour by telegraph being ready, a crowning triumph could be manufactured in half-an-hour; whereupon the Mandarins of the Capitol would salute the clouds with thunder, thank God for His grace, kill a few thousands in a public proclamation, and prophecy the final termination of the struggle in a fortnight. Thus does Ki-Chan report, once a month, that the last of the insurgents in all Nankin has been decapitated; whereupon ten myriads of the ill-conditioned malcontents, who decline to be dead in obedience to an official epitaph, rise up, and Ki-Chan, if not beheaded, sneaks off to a neighbouring province. Where is that grand army of the Potomac, which was to sweep like a hurricane through the South? It lies, and bleeds, a skeleton and a specter, in the midst of the land which, not long ago, was to be trampled into submission, to be starved and pauperized into a humiliating dependence on the North. A Northern garrison melts away at New Orleans; Northern columns are wasted by fruitless campaigning in a far interior; yet McClellan, true to his mandarin instinct, sends home exulting despatches, and vaunts as though he had fought the Solferino of the war. At one moment this illustrious student of Middle-Kingdom eloquence recounts how he drove the enemy from his position, and took 500 prisoners. Great is the joy at New York. Therefore, emboldened by praise, he corrects himself in presence of the sovereign people, and his prisoners become 2000 instead of 500. An air of grandeur pervades the rotund statistics of the youthful hero; he sees the entire strength of a regiment cut to pieces on every field; the captives dragged after his chariot are ranked in whole phalanxes; but when will he fight and win a pitched battle without the aid of gunboats? When is the avalanche really to overwhelm the South? When is the thunderbolt to be hurled and the general smash-up effected? It is all very well in China to tell the Emperor that he has a million of soldiers prepared to conquer or die, with fleets of junks renowned for their superiority over the war-steamers of Great Britain; but His Majesty, were he not an Asiatic, might ask, why is no barbarian man-of-war towed up the Peiho as a prize, and why his warriors contented themselves with dancing on one leg when the Armstrong guns were pelting them? The Federal commanders, no doubt, are covered all over with glory, and yet they want success. Halleck victories without a casualty—one gun-carriage splintered, and one bullet through a cocked hat; total, nothing—are strangely barren of results; but resemble rather the triumph described by General San-ko-lin, to “the Majesty of Haughty China.” “The white devils were utterly defeated by the valour of the Imperial troops, yet they persisted in advancing, though the noise of the gongs and the cries of the warriors must have struck terror into their hearts.” Just so. There is a good deal of gong-beating in the North, and the News Department at Washington and at New York, under the plastic hand of a State Secretary, is a Palace of the Beatitudes on a magnificent scale. For, even if a military failure be announced, so unmistakable and glaring that it cannot be concealed, straightway the poet of the department is called in to imagine, in his aërial, Homeric way, a victory with which the public is consoled. When McClellan breaks down, Halleck is rumoured to have come down upon the rebels somewhere, and emblazoned the Federal flag. This Halleck, indeed, is a man of unprecedented genius; he far surpasses Cæsar, for he does not come, he does not see, and yet he conquers. Sir Charles Napier, as Lord Palmerston records, once took a town in Spain with a letter; General Halleck hears that a certain stronghold is obstinate; forthwith he sits down, and has the honour to report, for the information of the Government and eagle-bearing people, that he captured it yesterday; which, after all, is better than bloodshed. This is eminently Chinese, reminding us of the Imperialist army which fired at an English ship for an entire day, killed one of its own officers, and went off shouting in triumph because the vessel did not sail after them over the land. The military mandarins of the Federal Power treat Mr. Abraham Lincoln as though he were only a Chinese Emperor, which he may be, for anything we know to the contrary, and which, if it be the fact, would explain why this Chinese fit is upon men and things in America.

For years past the great insurrection in China has been constantly proclaimed as nearly, if not wholly, extinguished. Again and again has the Government at Peking been congratulated upon the complete overthrow of the rebel forces. Yet these forces collect half the taxes of the empire; hold the navigation of large rivers; occupy hundreds of important towns, are formidable, not only in the distant interior, but on the coast also, and frequently defeat the Mantchu armies. Every now and then, to keep the Brother of the Sun in good humour, and prevent him from strangling his generals in an impatient mood, or ordering them to perform the “Happy Despatch,” he receives a bulletin imploping him, of his endless benignity, to learn how his slave, the never-defeated Sse-ma-Korung, on such a day did frighten 100,000 of the insurgent imps with drums, so that they fell upon their faces; whereupon, with more drumming, waving of banners, and gallant caracoling, the Celestial Host went on, decapitated the enemy to the last man, and would transmit the heads to Peking without delay. Precisely so has it been with more than one captain of credit and renown in the glorious Federal ranks; he skirmishes, and instantly despatches from his bivouac in the midst of the empurpled field, a battle-piece in lurid prose, suggestive of nothing less than Eylan or Lodi; he arrives at a town, which the enemy, for strategic reasons, have evacuated; with magical alacrity, at once he pens his description of a victorious army surging on, of broken legions in full retreat before him, of roads strewn with cannon, baggage, dead, wounded, and missing; and there is a general flare-up of artillery to celebrate a day’s march—and nothing more. What the Federal Government may gain in its own territory by these puerile and paltry tricks we know not; but of this we are sure—that the bulletins of its commanders have become the laughing-stock of all Europe.

Let no one suppose that we intend merely a bitter jest. The features of resemblance between the Celestial Empire of the East and that of the West are only too many and too real. They are not confined to the rhetoric of Fourth of July orations and military bulletins; they exist in that monstrous over-estimate of self, which causes both nations to think themselves the centre of the universe, and to treat all the rest of mankind as outside barbarians. Like the Chinese, the Americans glory in an isolation, which is not the less perfect as regards manners and habits of thought, because, unlike the Chinese, they still condescend to hold communion with the rest of the world. They honestly believe themselves, not only the bravest and most powerful, but the most moral and enlightened nation of the earth. In their own eyes, they stand upon a pinnacle which the less favoured of human creatures struggle in vain to reach. The laws of Political Economy, ay, of justice and humanity, are not the same for them as for the “effete despotisms” of the Old World. That these “effete despotisms” are still permitted to encumber the progress of American civilization, is owing to the forbearance and magnanimity of the people which could sweep them from its path with the mere wave of its mighty hand. It is this fatal delusion which causes them to consider it their right and their duty to subjugate 8,000,000 of their former fellow-countrymen, in the name of “manifest destiny.” It is this which causes them already, before that difficult work is done, to meditate vengeance against all nations who could not see their acts in the light in which they view them. And if, in the inscrutable plans of Providence, it was decreed that they should succeed in their work, they would undoubtedly make their reconstructed empire the China of America. Why should not they? They would have their India and their Australia within their own doors. What need have they of foreign commerce when they control the two chief staples of the commerce of the world, and when their very coasting trade means the circumnavigation of a continent? With two great oceans for their boundaries, one hand resting upon the Frozen Zone, and the other stretching to the Tropics, with the monopoly of cotton and tobacco, with a closed market for all they need to buy, and a closed market for all they have to sell, with a territory ample for 300,000,000 of inhabitants, with internal navigation of thousands of miles—who, they argue, shall dictate terms to them, or who venture to dispute the terms which they may choose to dictate?

The Right of Interference.

In discussing American topics, we are obliged again and again to revert to the commonplace axioms of International Law, Social Science, and Political Economy, because Federal policy and Federal conduct are direct violations of those first principles upon which the whole social fabric rests. We cannot avoid this course in the present article, in which we propose to point out some of the actions of the Federal Government calling for foreign interference.

Individual liberty is limited and circumscribed both by human and Divine law. Not only is it unlawful for a man to invade the rights of his neighbour, but he is not permitted to do exactly as he likes with his own. He must not set his house on fire, because it endangers the property of others. Freedom of speech and publication does not include the freedom to utter or print obscene and immoral thoughts. A man may, as far as possible, isolate himself, to the detriment of his own happiness, from his fellow-creatures, but whenever he does come in contact with society, either directly or indirectly, he must submit to the laws of society. In short, a person is not at liberty to make an unlawful use of his property or his privileges. And this principle is applicable to States as well as to individuals, and is the foundation of international law. If nations were not allowed to band together as a police for the protection of national rights, there would be an end to commerce, to the progress of civilization, and order would be succeeded by universal anarchy. The right of interference is a very solemn responsibility, and ought not to be exercised except upon a clear, defined, and unmistakable necessity. Is European interference with Federal America imperative, and therefore a duty?

Let us glance, for the hundredth time, at the position of the belligerents. We need not enter into the question of the constitutional right of Secession. Although Europe was convinced of the right of the sovereign States to go out of the Union, it decided that that fact did not justify an intervention to prevent the Federals trying to bring back the seceded States by the agency of the sword. But we contend the actual state of affairs, as between the North and South, calls at all events for so much interference as is involved in the recognition of the Confederate States. The war has been going on for a year and a half, and so far from the Confederates being subdued, the Federal Government is demanding more soldiers. Of the unanimity of the 8,000,000 of Southerners inhabiting, be it remembered, a territory distinct from the territory of the United States, we have the most convincing proofs. Surely 8,000,000 of people, inhabiting a large and distinct country, resolved to be independent, and for a year and a half successfully maintaining that independence against the gigantic efforts of the North to crush it, constitute a nation. And if the Confederate States of America are a nation, why not recognize them as a nation? Why ignore a fact? But recognition has little to do with the right of interference, for the refusal to acknowledge a de facto nation is as much an act of interference as the refusal to acknowledge it.

The way in which Europe has been treated by the Federals justifies interference, independent of the claims of the Confederate States to be recognized as a nation. We do not speak of the tariff devised to impair the trade of England and France. We do not speak of the tax to be levied on cotton. Such a commercial policy is foolish, self-destructive, and spiteful; but even if it would permanently injure us it does not justify interference. To impose a liberal and prosperous commercial policy on the United States would be an infringement of international law. If a man chooses to shut up his shop, or refuses to transact business with his best customers, he ought to be at full liberty to do so. But the insults offered to foreign Consuls, the seizure of money belonging to Messrs. Hope and Co., the refusal to allow goods to be shipped which have been paid for, on the plea that the payment was used for an unlawful purpose, not only authorizes a demand for reparation, but justifies Europe in insisting upon the observance of more courteous and lawful conduct for the future.

The bitter hostility of the United States to England demands attention, since the threats of the Federal press and people have been endorsed by the Federal Government. It is not disputed that the increase in the navy, and the establishment of naval depôts and yards on Lakes Erie, Michigan, and Ontario, is intended as a demonstration against this country. If a great nation suffers herself to be insulted with impunity, she not only sustains a loss of prestige, but encourages and fosters the spirit of aggression. If England had been less forbearing in times past, if she had insisted upon ample apology for the Trent affair, if she had resented the gratuitous insults offered to her flag, Federal hatred would not have obtained its present dimensions.

But if the Federal Government had not violated the law of nations, if England had not been insulted and threatened, if the ruler of France and France herself had not been subjected to gross abuse, if we had no other acts to complain of than those committed within the territories of the United States, there would be no lack of reasons for prompt and decisive interference. That the North is prosecuting a bloody, wicked, and, as it must turn out, profitless war, is bad enough; that in the name of the Constitution she is seeking to trample on the rights of other people, is bad enough; that the citizens of the United States should heedlessly load themselves with debt, and give up their political liberty without a sigh, is bad enough. But these things are not the worst. Witness the rule of the Federals in the Confederate cities that have fallen into their power. Was ever military despotism so harsh and unrelenting?

Look at New Orleans. Could matters have been worse if the veritable Nana Sahib had been the Federal commander? There is no longer a pretence for saying that General Butler has acted without, or contrary to, orders; his conduct has been approved by the Federal press and sanctioned by the Federal Government. The Times of yesterday remarks that the state of affairs had been aggravated "by the fact of the Washington Government and the Northern press having virtually approved and identified themselves with the act by which General Butler, at New Orleans, had placed himself out of the pale not only of civilization, but of human kinship, whether savage or civilized." This is strong language, but not too strong, for it is impossible to invent terms of opprobrium adequately to denounce an edict by which a commander licenses his soldiers to treat the ladies of a city under his jurisdiction as harlots. The infamy perpetrated by General Butler, and shared in by the Government and people of the United States, intensifies the horrors of war. We cannot blame the men of the South for seeking deadly vengeance by all means in their power. Not satisfied with this crowning atrocity, General Butler continues to outrage civilization. He accuses a gentleman of hauling down a Federal flag, and forthwith hangs him. He condemns some of the first citizens of New Orleans to be loaded with chains and kept at convict labour on account of political differences. He has lately hung four men, one of them being an Englishman, upon charges of theft. Nay, he takes upon himself to regulate prayer, and to control the solemn offices of religion.

Will Christian, civilized nations permit such enormities? We trust not. And yet if, under such circumstances, Europe does not interfere, she virtually sanctions the crimes at which she shudders.

WE desire to direct attention to the following graphic summary of American affairs, which appeared in the Times' City Article yesterday. It shows that the truth is no longer disguised by Federal fabrications and loud boastings:—

The commercial advices from New York this week are of especial importance, since they comprise not only the resolution of Congress for an additional issue of £30,000,000 of convertible paper, but also the passage of the Tax Bill and the Tariff Bill, which aims a further blow at trade, and includes an attempt to levy new duties on goods already in bond in the New York warehouses. One journal, with a degree of boldness which may perhaps draw down Government vengeance, has pronounced the latter a shameful proposition, and a deputation of merchants and bankers have proceeded with a remonstrance to Washington, where they will probably receive a military reply that will remind them of the nature of the power under which they now exist. It was expected that Congress would adjourn in the course of a fortnight, and in the interval an attempt was to be made to repeal the Act lately passed "to prevent and punish fraud on officers intrusted with making of contracts for the Government." This Act was originally pronounced to be a terror to public plunderers and thieves, but, like most other contrivances for making people honest against their inclination, had resulted, it is believed, in inconveniencing only those who were not of the class to disregard its provisions. Already it appears that the payment of the direct imposts levied in the new Tax Bill will be openly resisted by organized combinations in some of the leading Western States. In the important State of Indiana, the Governor had called attention to associations of this nature, which were "increasing rapidly;" and, as he took occasion to intimate that all who joined them would be guilty of treason, and be "dealt with in the most rigorous manner," there seems a prospect of a number of small civil wars being carried on simultaneously with the larger one. In Illinois, also, the Supreme Court, in dealing with the question of taxation, had declared the act of Congress unconstitutional in making Federal Treasury notes a legal tender, and a detachment of the army may therefore be required in that State to enforce a correct reading of the statutes. In the general contest, however, between the North and South, and the Northern States individually against the despotism at Washington, the Fine Arts were not neglected, and it is intimated that "a large number of workmen are now busily engaged in preparing for the placing on the dome of the Capitol Crawford's colossal statue of Freedom." Meanwhile the New York stock and money markets were in a state of intense susceptibility beyond anything yet known since the commencement of the war. It was no longer doubtful that there had been a deplorable loss from fever in the army before Richmond, and this, coupled with the critical position of Generals Banks and Fremont, the unfavourable accounts from Florida, and the fact of President Lincoln having passed hastily through New York on a visit to General Scott at West Point, enabled the operators, from hour to hour, to influence prices by the fabrication of alarming reports. Just before the departure of the present steamer it was believed that the Federal forces had made another attack on Fort Darling and been repulsed, and also that they had again been compelled to evacuate Winchester. "Still," it is said, "the more disastrous the struggle becomes so does the determination of the North to subjugate the South increase in intensity;" while, on the other hand, the Southern hatred is stimulated to a point that seems to render the contest dependent on the extermination of the entire people. All attempts at mediation, and especially from England, it is said, would be received only with insult. The feeling against England is described by the most temperate and friendly observers to be stronger than ever. "It is not confined to the multitude, but prevails equally among the higher classes," and it is added, "if there were but a fair chance of success, nothing would be more popular than a war with your country." This state of affairs had apparently been much aggravated by the fact of the Washington Government and the Northern press having virtually approved and identified themselves with the act by which General Butler, at New Orleans, had placed himself out of the pale not only of civilization, but of human kinship, whether savage or civilized.

OUR readers will find elsewhere a most interesting and instructive article from the Times of India of June 12, just received from Bombay. We claim no merit for the close agreement of this high authority with the views previously expressed by us in these pages, for no one, not wilfully blind to the truth, or persistently ignorant of the facts, could well arrive at any very different conclusions.

WE noticed last week the prevalence of the German element in the Federal army. The following from the New York Tribune shows that even ignorance of the English language is not a disqualification for command.

Prince Salan, a Prussian nobleman, who joined the United States' army a year ago, and has since held the position of Colonel on General Blenker's staff, has been appointed to the command of the Garibaldi Regiment. Colonel Salan is an experienced and gallant officer, and has done active service on several occasions with the army in Virginia. Up to a recent time his want of familiarity with our language prevented his assuming direct control of a regiment. The vacancy in the command of the Garibaldi Guard, which is composed mostly of foreigners, has now obviated the difficulty.

IMPORTANT FROM ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO. ANOTHER CONFEDERATE VICTORY.

The Jackson Mississippi of the 17th inst. learns, from a passenger just from Texas, that an engagement between 1700 of General Sibley's brigade and 2300 Federals, occurred on the 10th ult., at Glorieta Canon, New Mexico. Colonel Scurry, commanding, had his men posted in the Canon, through which the Federals were compelled to pass to communicate with Fort Craig. About 600 of the enemy were killed and wounded, and less than 100 of Scurry's men—among whom, however, were Majors Raguet and Shropshire killed, and Lieutenant-Colonel Sutton mortally wounded. General Sibley's aid-de-camp, Captain Ochiltree, who was bearer of despatches from General Sibley, reported to our informant that the result of the great Battle of Glorieta would be the surrender of Fort Craig to our forces, and the occupation of all New Mexico and Arizona by the Confederates.—Charleston Mercury, May 24.

Reviews.

SOUTHERN STATISTICS.

II.—THE PRODUCTION OF COTTON.

CONSIDERING the mighty interests involved, it is not at all surprising that the question of the supply of cotton should have been discussed very fully and continually by English manufacturers and English statesmen, and that it should have commanded very general attention. If we peruse what has been said and written on the cotton question, we cannot fail to be struck with the mass of statistical information that has been brought forward. We defy any one to point out a detail that has not received the most painstaking consideration. How, then, does it happen that there is such a diversity of opinion, or rather, such a general uncertainty, as to the conclusions to be derived from statistics of which no one doubts the authenticity and reliability, and which are in themselves singularly consistent. We think the anomaly can be readily explained. Instead of looking at the whole question, it has been studied in parts; and statistics, instead of being treated as indexes to the truth, have been compiled and made use of to support particular theories. Moreover, there has been a disposition to eschew experience, to calculate on the possible and the probable, and to draw conclusions from facts without making allowance for opposing facts. For instance, because India has an immense area suitable for the cultivation of cotton, it has been assumed that India might supply us with the quantity of raw material we have obtained from America. The calculations based on this hypothesis are very attractive and plausible, but it has been quite forgotten that India cannot produce cotton to compete with the American cotton in the European markets either in quality or price. It has been stated that the want of capital has been the cause of India not producing cotton enough to make us independent of the American supply. Yet India does produce very largely for her own consumption, and for the Chinese market; and let it be remembered, that the capital invested in cotton cultivation in the Southern States was not collected in Europe, or rained down from the clouds; but it is the accumulated profits of cotton cultivation. But India produced cotton from time immemorial, and she exported large quantities when, in 1784, eight bags of American cotton were seized in England, on the ground that so much cotton could not possibly have been produced in the United States. How is it, with such a start in the race, India has not been able to accumulate capital enough to increase her production of cotton? We can conceive no other answer than that India cannot grow cotton at so cheap a rate as the Southern States. Besides, there has been no lack of capital for the development of other Indian products, such as indigo.

Under present circumstances, we think it may be useful to give a brief account of the growth and progress of cotton cultivation in the Southern States, and simultaneously glance at the statistics of the Indian cotton trade, as far as possible, leaving our readers to draw their own conclusions from the figures we submit.

To thoroughly appreciate the rapid increase of the American cotton produce, we must notice that it has grown up in less than seventy years. In Mr. Simmond's edition of Ure's "Philosophy of Manufactures," published last year, is the following anecdote:—

Many years ago, the senior editor of one of the leading American papers was informed by his venerable friend, Samuel Maverick, Esq., of Pendleton, that, when a boy, as clerk in the house of his uncle, Mr. Wm. Turpin, of Charleston, he assisted in packing the first bag of cotton ever sent to Liverpool from the United States. Mr. Maverick is still living, and America now exports some 2,000,000 of bags of cotton every year. That packed by Mr. Maverick was put up in the seed! This was long before Whitney's invention of the cotton gin. The consignee of this lone bag of cotton informed the house of Wadsworth and Turpin that he could not sell it! that it was valueless! and advised them to send no more.

Farther, that we may observe how the progress of the English cotton manufacture has been concurrent with the production of American cotton, we will quote the state and value of our cotton trade in 1787. In that year there were in England and Scotland:—

143 water mills, valued at	£715,000
550 mule jennies, of 50 spindles each, valued at	19,250
20,070 hand jennies, of 80 spindles each	140,490
Buildings, carding machines, &c.	123,260
	£1,000,000

The number of persons employed in spinning was about 60,000. The imports of the raw material into England for that year were 22,600,000 lbs., from the following places:—

British Islands	6,600,000
French and Spanish Settlements	6,000,000
Dutch Settlements	1,700,000
Portuguese Settlements	2,500,000
East Indies	100,000
Smyrna and Turkey	5,700,000
22,600,000lbs.

Not a pound from the United States, and the East Indies contributing only a 226th of the entire quantity. Even allowing for the then circumscribed dominion of British India, it must be confessed it was a very small portion. It seems as if it had not been possible for India to compete for the supply of European markets even before America stepped in; and that, instead of checking, American rivalry has rather stimulated Indian production.

In 1790, Mr. McCulloch says, the export trade of the United States in cotton commenced, though it is known that small quantities were exported in previous years. The following admirably-arranged table, showing the growth, exports, and export value of the United States' cotton, from 1790 to 1835, together with estimates of the total cotton produce of the world, was communicated to the United States' Congress in 1836, by Mr. Woodbury, the then Secretary of the Treasury:—

GROWTH AND EXPORTS OF COTTON.
IN THE WORLD.		UNITED STATES.
Years.	Growth lbs.	Exports lbs.	Ex. value $.
1790 ..	—	1,500,000	250,000
1791 .. 490,000,000	—	2,000,000	280,000
1792 ..	—	3,000,000	143,000
1793 ..	—	5,000,000	500,000
1794 ..	—	8,000,000	1,667,000
1795 ..	—	8,000,000	6,000,000
1796 ..	—	10,000,000	6,000,000
1797 ..	—	11,000,000	3,500,000
1798 ..	—	15,000,000	9,000,000
1799 ..	—	20,000,000	9,000,000
1800 ..	—	35,000,000	17,000,000
1801 .. 520,000,000	—	48,000,000	20,000,000
1802 ..	—	55,000,000	27,000,000
1803 ..	—	60,000,000	41,000,000
1804 ..	—	65,000,000	38,000,000
1805 ..	—	70,000,000	40,000,000
1806 ..	—	80,000,000	37,000,000
1807 ..	—	80,000,000	66,000,000
1808 ..	—	75,000,000	12,000,000
1809 ..	—	82,000,000	53,000,000
1810 ..	—	85,000,000	93,000,000
1811 .. 555,000,000	—	80,000,000	62,000,000
1812 ..	—	75,000,000	29,000,000
1813 ..	—	75,000,000	19,000,000
1814 ..	—	70,000,000	17,000,000
1815 ..	—	100,000,000	83,000,000
1816 ..	—	124,000,000	81,000,000
1817 ..	—	130,000,000	95,000,000
1818 ..	—	125,000,000	92,000,000
1819 ..	—	167,000,000	88,000,000
1820 ..	—	160,000,000	127,000,000
1821 .. 630,000,000	—	180,000,000	124,000,000
1822 ..	—	210,000,000	144,000,000
1823 ..	—	185,000,000	173,000,000
1824 ..	—	215,000,000	142,000,000
1825 ..	—	255,000,000	176,000,000
1826 ..	—	250,000,000	204,000,000
1827 ..	—	270,000,000	204,000,000
1828 ..	—	325,000,000	210,000,000
1829 ..	—	365,000,000	264,000,000
1830 ..	—	350,000,000	298,000,000
1831 .. 820,000,000	—	385,000,000	277,000,000
1832 ..	—	390,000,000	372,000,000
1833 ..	—	445,000,000	324,000,000
1834 ..	—	460,000,000	384,000,000
1835 ..	—	—	61,000,000

It will be noticed how steady, as well as rapid, has been the increase in the exports. From 1821 to 1835, there was an uninterrupted annual increase. In 1790 the quantity of cotton consumed in the United States was 1,250,000 lbs., and in 1834, 70,000,000 lbs., being fifty-six times as much. The cotton export of the United States in 1790 was 270,000 lbs., and in 1834 384,000,000 lbs., being 1336 times greater. But in 1834 the cotton trade was still in its infancy. The exports were 384,000,000 lbs in 1834, and in 1849, 1,026,000,000 lbs., being nearly a threefold increase in fifteen years. Further, according to the returns of the United States' Treasury Department, the crop of 1850 was 2,796,706 bales, the quantity exported was 635,381,604 lbs., and the export value was $71,984,616; and in 1859 the crop was 3,851,481 bales, the quantity exported 1,386,468,542 lbs., and the export value $161,434,923. We should remark that the official export value is always below the actual value. But taking the returns as they are presented to us, they show that in nine years (from 1850 to 1859), the crop had increased 50 per cent.; that the exports had increased more than 100 per cent.; and that the export value had increased at a still greater ratio, and that was due to the price in 1859 being higher than in 1850. In 1846 it was generally asserted that the limit of the American supply had been reached, a prediction strikingly refuted by the above statistics. We are met with the same argument to-day when we speak of the Southern States being the cotton-field of the world, although but a twentieth part of the suitable land is under cotton cultivation.

The greater ratio of increase of the exports, as compared with the increase of quantities taken for home consumption, is an illustration of the soundness of the opinion that the Southern States can supply any demand for cotton. It is not that the Americans limit their consumption of cotton fabrics, or that they take back in fabrics what they send forth as raw material. Only a small per-centage of the cotton exported from the United States is returned to the United States in cotton manufactures; yet, if we add the imports of cotton fabrics to the cotton manufactures of the United States, we find that the home consumption of cotton per head of the population is as great, and rather in excess of the average consumption of civilized nations. The South has been able not only to supply the increasing demand of the United States, but the increasing demand of the world.

An inspection of the table we have given above will dissipate the impression, that the Southerners have enjoyed a monopoly of price. How could they? They could not regulate demand, and they could only compete with other markets by the quality of their material and its cheapness. In 1834 the quantity exported was twenty-three times greater than in 1800, while the export value was only tenfold. By comparing the estimates of the world's growth, and which are carefully prepared, it will be seen that the total increase of cotton production is from the Southern States, and that the rest of the world has remained nearly stationary. Not that in all other parts of the world there has been a lack of enterprise and capital, but that it was found impossible to compete with America for supplying the increased and increasing call for cotton. Cotton-growing countries have considered it cheaper to import fabrics of American cotton rather than increase the area of their own cotton culture. Before the introduction of American cotton the increasing demand was supplied from other places, as the following return of cotton imports into England shows:—

Years.	Imports.
1781 ..	5,101,920 lbs.
1782 ..	11,206,810
1783 ..	9,546,179
1784 ..	11,280,236
1785 ..	17,992,888
1786 ..	19,151,867
1787 ..	22,600,000

If the cotton-growing States of America were engulfed in the ocean, no doubt there would be an increased production of cotton in other places, because the article would then command a remunerative price, and would not be, after a year or two of higher price, depressed by the renewed and growing production of America. The cotton productiveness of America has checked the increased growth of cotton in other countries, and until the cause is permanently removed the check will remain.

We will supplement the table we have given from the official report of the United States' Secretary to Congress by a statement of the crops, exports, and export values, from 1836 to 1850—dates which embrace the most interesting period of the history of the American cotton trade:—

Years.	Crop in Bales.	Exports in lbs.	Export Value.
1836 ..	1,422,930 ..	423,621,367 ..	$71,284,925
1837 ..	1,801,497 ..	414,211,537 ..	63,210,102
1838 ..	1,360,532 ..	595,952,277 ..	61,556,811
1839 ..	2,177,835 ..	413,624,212 ..	61,338,982
1840 ..	1,634,945 ..	743,941,061 ..	63,870,107
1841 ..	1,683,574 ..	530,204,100 ..	54,330,341
1842 ..	2,378,875 ..	584,717,017 ..	47,593,644
1843 ..	2,030,409 ..	792,297,106 ..	49,119,086
1844 ..	2,394,503 ..	663,633,455 ..	54,063,501
1845 ..	2,100,537 ..	872,905,996 ..	51,739,643
1846 ..	1,778,651 ..	547,555,055 ..	42,767,341
1847 ..	2,347,634 ..	537,219,958 ..	53,415,847
1848 ..	2,728,596 ..	814,274,431 ..	61,998,294
1849 ..	2,096,706 ..	1,036,602,296 ..	66,396,967
1850 ..	2,355,257 ..	635,391,601 ..	71,984,717

In 1850, the value of the cotton exports of the United States was $71,984,717; in 1857, $131,575,859; and in 1859, $1,694,341,923—the increase in value in nine years being more than 100 per cent; but in 1850, the exports were 635,381,601 lbs., and in 1859 they were 1,386,468,542 lbs. So that the increase in quantity advanced with the increase in value. The crop for 1860 was 4,300,000 bales.

The British exports of cotton manufactures have been developed concurrently with the increase of the United States' exports of the raw material; but our exports do not afford an exact criterion of the increase of our manufactures, as our home consumption has become larger and larger, until it has been brought up to 9 lbs. per head of the population, whilst in France the consumption is 4 lbs. per head of the population. The declared value of our exports of cotton manufactures were:—

1820	£16,516,748
1834	20,513,586
1850	28,257,401
1859	48,208,444

We have seen that the increased production of cotton during the present century is from the Southern States, and that other countries have remained stationary. This great increase has only been limited by the demand; that is to say, the Southern planters have been conducting their operations legitimately, not increasing the growth on speculation, or seeking to glut the market. The Cotton Planters' Convention prepared the following interesting table as to production and consumption of cotton throughout the world.

Production.		Consumption.
Bales per annum.		Bales per annum.
Average from 1825 to 1830 ..	1,231,000 ..	1,187,000
" 1830 to 1835 ..	1,450,000 ..	1,540,000
" 1835 to 1840 ..	1,319,000 ..	1,943,000
" 1840 to 1845 ..	2,561,000 ..	2,414,000
" 1845 to 1850 ..	2,791,000 ..	2,869,000
		9,592,000	9,933,000

In twenty-five years the whole production was 49,760,000 bales, and the total consumption 49,765,000, being an excess of 5000 bales, equal to an excess of 200 bales per annum. So far from striving to discourage other growths by glutting the market, the Southern planters have always evinced an anxiety not to jeopardize prices by making the supply exceed the demand. Indeed, small crops have frequently yielded a better return than large crops; not that we would infer that small crops are therefore desirable, for cheapness and a fully satisfied demand encourages and increases consumption, and so ultimately benefits the producer.

(To be continued.)

THE COLONIAL HISTORY OF VIRGINIA.*

No. II.

We cannot, in the space of a review, or from the meagre hints contained in this "Calendar of State Papers," attempt to give a complete history of the establishment of the colony of Virginia. From first to last we meet with discussions between the Government and the Company in England, and with difficulties encountered by the colonists of Virginia. In forty years there were no less than twelve Governors, a pretty good proof of the difficulty of satisfactorily fulfilling the executive office. At that period England had not a Colonial Department of State; and, bad as it may be in the opinion of some persons, the administration of the Colonial Office is vastly better than that of the King and Council.

The Virginian planters, for many years, directed their attention almost exclusively to the cultivation of tobacco, notwithstanding the difficulty experienced in getting a remunerative price for the fragrant weed, the virtues of which were not generally appreciated 200 years ago. In 1634, in reply to a petition from the Governor of Virginia, showing that the planters did not realize more than a penny per lb. for their tobacco, and that the planters could not afford to sell under sixpence per lb. on the spot, and fourteen pence for the delivery in England, and that they needed a guaranteed annual consumption of 800,000 lbs., the King, who thought the demands excessive, appointed Commissioners to settle the matter, and John Stone was sent out as King's agent, and a councillor in Virginia, to treat for a yearly contract of tobacco, both as to price and quantity.

A law was passed forbidding the planting of English tobacco, and most rigidly enforced. To-day a similar law is executed with a like vigour, not to encourage the growth of Virginia tobacco, but for the sake of the revenue.

Governor Harvey turned his attention to lessening the planting of tobacco, and in one year Virginia produced 10,000 bushels of corn, and was enabled to assist New England with a supply of grain. "Virginia is now become the granary of all His Majesty's Northern colonies." Governor Harvey also reported plenty of beeves, goats, hogs, and all sorts of poultry, and that a beginning had been made of oranges, lemons, vines, figs, and all kind of fruit. An effort was also made to propagate the silkworm, and a present of silk was sent to the King. As soon as the colonists gave up the exclusive cultivation of tobacco their troubles abated.

There was a most jealous feeling with respect to the Dutch, and the colonists petitioned the King that the Dutch might not be allowed to trade with Virginia; and the King was pleased to comply with the prayer of the petition. We might smile at the young community being solicitous to have its commerce contracted, but that we remember, even now, in this enlightened age, there are people advocating the doctrine that the best way to promote the activity and prosperity of Commerce is to load her with chains,—that if you want a river to rise, the best course is to dam up the rivulets that feed the river.

* Calendar of State Papers, Colonial Series, 1574-1630. Preserved in the State Paper Department of Her Majesty's Public Record Office. Edited by W. N. EL SAINSBURY, Esq. London: Longman and Co.

Amongst the many curious documents referred to in Mr. Sainsbury's volume, is one in reference to the proposed emigration of Walloons and French.

Promise of certain Walloons and French to emigrate to Virginia. In the centre of a large sheet of paper is written in French:—"We promise the Lord Ambassador of the Most Serene King of Great Britain, to go and inhabit in Virginia a land under His Majesty's obedience, as soon as conveniently may be, and this to be carried out in the articles we have communicated to the said Ambassador, and not otherwise; on the faith of which we have unanimously signed this present with our sign manual." The signatures and the calling of each are appended in the form of a Round Robin, and in the outer circle the person signing states whether he is married and the number of his children. Endorsed by Sir Dudley, Carleton. "Signature of such Walloons and French as offer themselves to goe into Virginia."

When the Commonwealth was established, Virginia was conspicuous amongst the colonies refusing to own allegiance to the new form of Government, although the Council had ordered narratives of the Battle of Worcester, and the Act for the day of Thanksgiving, to be sent to the colonies. Captain Robert Dennis and three other persons were appointed Commissioners for reducing Virginia. Their orders were to conciliate, if possible, but if hostility was manifested they were instructed to raise forces, and to free the servants of rebellious planters who acted as soldiers for the Commonwealth. They were also to publish the Acts of Parliament against Kingship, the House of Lords, and for abolishing the Book of Common Prayer.

Judging from the terms of surrender, the Commissioners found their task of subjugation anything but easy. The first article of the compact is the most surprising. It stipulated that neither the Governor nor the Council should be obliged to take any oath to the Commonwealth, nor be censured for speaking well of the King for one year; that is, for one year the Governor and Council were to permissively abjure the authority of the de facto Government, and to talk as much treason against it as they thought proper. They also bargained that the Governor should be allowed to send a person to the King to give His Majesty an account of the surrender. Further:—

The present Governor and Council to have leave to dispose of their estates and go where they pleased. Debts due to them by Act of Assembly to be made good. The Governor to have leave to hire a ship to take their goods to England or Holland. The captain of the fort to be remunerated for building his house on Fort Island; and all persons in the colony who have served the King to be free from danger or punishment. An act of indemnity and oblivion to be issued by the Commissioners; that no justices in Virginia be questioned for their opinions in causes determined by them. The Governor and Council to have passes to leave Virginia any time within a year, and to be free from trouble or arrest for six months after their arrival in England.

To these conditions the Commissioners assented—conditions which made the surrender a triumph, rather than a defeat, to the loyal Virginians. No doubt the moment was opportune for a favourable compromise. The Commonwealth had too much at stake at home and in Europe to wage a distant war if it could be avoided. But though we might expect the colonists to make excellent terms, we do not less admire the unanimous determination not to humble to the successful power; the chivalry displayed, not only in refusing to take the oath of fealty to the Commonwealth, but in stipulating for a year's license to talk as they liked of the King; and the sense of order and duty that prompted the condition of sending an envoy to notify the surrender to His Majesty. This stipulation was fulfilled, as may be seen by Mr. Sainsbury's notes on some papers dated May 10, 1652:—

Petition of Colonel Francis Lovelace to the Council of State. According to articles for the surrender of Virginia, he was appointed by the Commissioners to repair to the late King of Scots, "wherever he were," to give an account thereof. Prays for a pass into France, where he supposes the King to be, or elsewhere.

Pass "in the name of the Keepers of the Liberty of the Commonwealth of England" for Colonel Francis Lovelace, with his servants and necessities, to repair to the late King of Scots. Signed by Richard Bennett and William Claybourne.

Surely the exiled Prince could not have received the homage of the representative of his faithful Virginian subjects without deep emotion.

It is curious that though Virginia was disaffected, and known to be the hotbed of royalty, the Council of State ordered "that the prisoners desired for Virginia, to the number of 1610, be granted unto them, as the committee shall think fit, upon giving assurance to give them Christian usage." The prisoners were captured Royalists, and to send them to "Church and State" Virginia was adding fuel to fire.

In 1637 the Governor of Providence Island was directed to send some of his negroes to Virginia, "where they may be put off to the masters' very great advantage." But, although Providence Island was supposed to have too many negroes, the slave trade was actively pursued.

We hope that this "Calendar of Colonial State Papers" will encourage the study and production of English colonial history, for modern colonization is grander and more useful, if not quite as patriotic and romantic as Greek colonization. And no part of our colonial history will prove more fascinating and instructive than that which relates to Virginia.

ALGERIAN COTTON SCHEME.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The debates which lately took place in the Corps Legislatif in relation to Algeria have disclosed the fact that the negotiations pending between the Algerian Administration and the Anglo-African Cotton Company have at last come to a successful termination.

A concession of 50,000 acres of land, situated in the province of Oran, has been granted to the English company upon the following conditions:—It is to pay 400,000 francs (cash) to the French Government; it binds itself to apply a further sum of 2,000,000 francs in improvements of all sorts upon the land conceded, and to devote its greater portion to the cultivation to the cotton plant.

On the other hand, the Government allows the company the exclusive privilege of using certain water-courses, and undertakes to pay the company a premium for each pound of cotton raised by them during the space of ten years; said premium to diminish by tenth from and after the first year.

I understand that the company is indebted to the exertions and influence of Mr. Cobden for this great victory over the bureaucracy of Algeria. Whether the founders of this company will have any reason to congratulate themselves on this treaty with the French Government, time alone can decide. But M. Mercier Lacombe, the Directeur-général des Affaires Civiles de l'Algérie, and the commissary of the Government, has made a few statements before the Corps Legislatif which I think worthy the close scrutiny of those who may hereafter feel inclined to increase the actual number of its stockholders. These official statements bear upon the scarcity of hands, the immense work to be performed to drain the lands conceded, and the price which Algerian cotton commands. These natural difficulties, coupled with the deadening obstinacy of the military Government of Algeria, forbode sad tidings for the 25,000,000 of English money about being trusted to the African soil. Indeed, it is but too well known to all those who have attentively followed the multifarious phases of that colony, that military jealousy has never neglected the occasion of smothering all commercial and industrial aspirations.

Upon this last point, however, it is to be supposed that Mr. Cobden has obtained, on behalf of the Company, the most positive assurance that it should not be interfered with by the Administration, else he could hardly have engaged his countrymen in a speculation otherwise so pregnant with misbaps.

Admitting that the climatic conditions of Algeria can be rendered propitious to the growth of merchantable cotton—a fact which past experience belies—whence is to come the labour capable of turning the waste land and pestiferous marshes of the province of Oran into rich and fertile cotton-fields? Is it to be found in Algeria? No; every one knows that, notwithstanding the kind, paternal, and praiseworthy endeavours of M. Mercier Lacombe to assimilate the Arabs, they will most ungratefully persist in their nomadic habits, and peremptorily refuse to perform any more work than is actually necessary to provide for the ordinary limited wants of an uncivilized people. They cannot, therefore, be made available; for the cultivation of cotton requires strong, steady, and industrious labourers.

European labour is not to be thought of, much less resorted to; for the scorching sun of Africa, and the deleterious miasma emanating from the marshes of Oran, would soon make of the Anglo-African cotton-fields an immense cemetery.

Is it to say that the Anglo-African cotton scheme is but an illusion of sensible minds? Such is not my opinion. On the contrary, I very earnestly think that it can be made just as advantageous to England as the cotton plantations of her Indian possessions, provided the proper labour can be procured.

This labour can be obtained. I hope the Abolitionist party and its prominent leaders, Messrs. Bright and Cobden, will thank THE INDEX for pointing it out to them, not only because the suggestion is calculated to forward the interests of their national enterprise, but also because it may afford them a splendid occasion of displaying before the world the sincerity of the doctrine they so warmly advocate, and enable them to prove that sincerity by putting into immediate practice the plans they have been so lovingly maturing for more than a quarter of a century.

There are now in the Northern States of America over 250,000 negroes entirely destitute of the very first necessities of life. In the very midst of their abolitionist friends, these poor blacks are literally starving; they owe their present pitiful sustenance to the Government's charity, and cannot hope to see that relief continued to them for any great length of time, if we are to judge by the sentiments expressed by the Dayton (Ohio) Daily Empire:—

Is it not a shame—a burning shame to Americans—that while the Administration is expending 100,000 dollars per day, in supporting the lazy, trifling negroes, the wives and families of the men who have volunteered should be suffering for the actual necessities of life—be forced to beg for enough to keep soul and body together? The amount spent daily on the negroes by those in power would be sufficient to alleviate the wants of most, if not all, of those in want. What better right has the negro to our bounty than our own race? What clause in the Constitution requires that negroes should be supported at the public expense, while the wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters of the American soldiers are left to suffer and to starve? Charity begins at home, and our first great duty is to see that our own flesh and blood is taken care of and protected. If, after doing this, we have means to spare, it will be time enough to seek outside among the negroes for objects of charity.

Now the most part of these negroes have been emancipated by the generosity of Southern planters; they are consequently familiar with all the minute requirements of a cotton crop; they fear not the African climate, and would, no doubt, heartily respond to the call of Messrs. Bright and Cobden, and emigrate to a country where, at least—in default of theoretical philanthropy—they would be sure to find friendly help and daily bread.

This plan is not likely to meet with any opposition either on the part of France or of the United States; the last would be but too glad to get rid of their black favourites, the first is too truly liberal to shut the gates of Algeria upon such a useful immigration. As to the noble Duke of Malakoff, he would surely consider himself happy to attach his already glorious name to the realization of a plan the success of which might secure the future prosperity of Algeria. And finally, were there any unforeseen difficulties in the way, they would vanish before the mighty power and influence of those who have been able to wrest from the Administration of Algeria a concession of 50,000 acres of land.

Another very important point, however, remains for the consideration of the future stock-holders of the Anglo-African Company.

It relates to the mercantile price of the Algerian cotton. M. Mercier Lacombe has officially declared it to be worth three francs per pound. I humbly suggest that this may prove the stumbling block of the whole affair. It must be clear to every cotton business-man of Manchester and Lancashire, that the future losses of the company will inevitably increase in direct proportion with the quantity of staple raised by them in Algeria; for if ever raised, which is more than doubtful, when brought to market that cotton will be unable to compete even with that coming from India. Messrs. Bright and Cobden deserve unlimited credit for thus attempting to make of Algeria a great cotton mart, capable of freeing English industry from its American dependence. But should their scheme prove successful, and Algeria be made to grow a cotton crop fully adequate to England's industrial wants, will not Great Britain, pushed by its ridiculous monomania of industrial independence, have jumped from the frying-pan into the fire?

The speech delivered on June 24, in the House of Commons, by Lord Palmerston, calling upon Parliament to aid the Government to place England in a proper state of defence, so as to assure her independence, must convince every thinking man that his lordship considers a foreign war as a thing certain, though, perhaps, not immediate.

If such be the case, would it not be more safe and, especially, more profitable for the manufacturing districts of England to use their means and influence with their Government to procure the reopening of the only true and natural source of their cotton supplies, than to lose their time, waste their energy, and squander their money upon the fantastical hope of succeeding in the attempt to render the laws of nature subservient to a whimsical fancy, which, after all, is but the offspring of an anomalous situation? *

Paris, July 1, 1862.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

July 8, 1862.

SIR,—In the letter from Paris dated July 1, which appeared in THE INDEX of the 3rd inst., your correspondent proclaims, on the part of the South, that "the Southerners have little cause to feel any especial friendship towards England, and that they may remember, to her cost, that in the rules of Political Economy, which govern commercial intercourse between nations, there are such things as differential tariffs."

In that Science which classifies the phenomena attendant upon the Production, Distribution, Interchange, and Consumption of Wealth, and which is called Political Economy, the effects upon the wealth and welfare of any nation which resorts to differential duties have been observed and examined, and they are universally found to be most detrimental to the well-doing of the nation itself. Of the truth of this fact the South at this very moment exhibits the most distinct proof which the world has ever yet seen. A Nation in itself—constituted a separate nation by the peculiar nature of its climate, productions, rivers and ports—wholly independent of every other nation in the world—it entered into a league in 1816 with a collection of political communities (with which it had not the slightest financial or commercial connection) directed against all the rest of the world, and especially against England, France, and Germany, who were the only consumers of its peculiar productions and almost the only suppliers of its general wants. It determined to levy a differential duty on all the produce of those nations which should come to its ports in ships owned by those nations, in favour of the same produce when imported in ships owned by its Northern colleagues; thus cutting off all direct communication between itself and its own purchasers. And not content with this act of suicidal folly, it consented to fine itself, additionally, 25 per cent. in the price of everything which it imported from Europe in exchange for its tobacco and cotton, for the purpose of enabling its colleagues of the North to manufacture the dry goods which it consumed profitably to themselves. Discovering what an error it had committed, it attempted in 1823 a partial correction of its blunder, but it found the North too strong in Congress to permit this; it made a further effort in 1832, when South Carolina demanded a change with arms in her hands; and finding, at last, all its effort vain, it separated politically from the North eighteen months ago; whose citizens are now murdering its men, insulting its women, laying waste its homesteads, and destroying its ports, for the avowed purpose of bringing it back to that state of commercial and financial vassalage from which it is now so justly seeking to emancipate itself.

It is impossible to conceive how this horrible condition of things could have been brought about but for this "differential tariff" which the South chose to adopt in 1816, and of which it is obviously the natural offspring. The South thereby encouraged the North to found manufactories of all sorts—the North has, during the last forty years, invested an immensity of capital in such establishments, which will not, and cannot, return any profit, unless the South shall continue to pay from 30 to 40 per cent. more for the articles produced by them than the price for which it can procure similar articles in England or France—the South very rightly refuses to submit any longer to this enormous annual sacrifice—the North has, consequently, no longer any market for its manufactures, and it is now savagely murdering and burning in all directions, with the unholy object of reducing the South to the necessity of re-submitting its neck to the Protectionist, or "differential tariff," yoke.

No one who will take the trouble to read my letters to Captain Maury, and those which I published in the Examiner, can doubt of the sincerity or of the earnestness of my good will towards the South. I readily allow that the sentiments of your Parisian Correspondent, who, I suppose, is a Southerner, are in this respect as strong, as deeply cherished, as vivid as my own, and certain am I they cannot be stronger. I earnestly appeal to him, and to every Southerner, not, in this supreme agony of the Southern crisis, to dally for one moment with the Siren—the mocking fiend—the betraying demon of Protection. "Let England remember that there are such things as differential tariffs." Let the South, I venture to say, remember this, and take warning. There are, indeed, such things as "differential tariffs," and the South adopted them, and by their adoption it has cut itself off from all direct intercourse with England, and the outbreak of the South found England entirely ignorant of everything that regarded the South—of everything regarding it which it was of the last importance to the South that England should feel and understand. How could it possibly be otherwise? By consenting to those "differential tariffs" in favour of the North, the South had constituted New York and the North its factor, its merchant, its banker, its carrier, its factotum, its representative, its vicegerent; and reduced itself, as far as England was concerned, to an abstraction. It gave us cotton, as the moon gives us light; but we knew little more about the inhabitants of the one than of the other.

This ignorance is, however, mutual. The South, by its action in 1816, has plunged England in darkness as to itself, and at the same time involved itself in the thickest darkness regarding England. I hear dropping from Southern lips such expressions as "the question is not so much whether you (England) shall acknowledge us, as whether we (the South) shall acknowledge you; we can do without you—can you do without us?" &c., &c. And your Parisian Correspondent imagines, in the same strain, that jealousy of France, and fears of French commercial rivalry, may be suggested as stimulating motives to the mind of England in favour of the South. I wish, indeed, as well for the sake of England as for the South, that this were so. But such expressions and suggestions imply the existence of underlying opinions that are wholly mistaken and erroneous; the Southern mind, had it ever come in direct contact with the English mind, would never have entertained them, and is now, and has been, leaning on a broken reed in counting upon them. The South and England have each to learn what the other is. What the South should have said to England and France in the beginning, eighteen months ago, and what it should say at this late hour, is simply and solely this: "We desire to sell our cotton and tobacco to you, please to send your ships to take these goods from us, for we have none of our own in which we can send them to you, and it is your interest to protect your own property against all who may attempt to interfere with you." Such an invitation would have come directly home to the understandings and interests both of England and France—both of these countries would have seen at once that the North had no right whatever to interfere with their long-established rights of purchasing Southern cotton, and would have refused to submit to the exercise of it.

By such a course the South would not have raised the confusing question of recognition. England and France would, practically, have been compelled to say to the North, "If, as you say, the sovereign States of Carolina, Alabama, Virginia, and Louisiana, are still integral parts of your Union, we have the right, by treaties and by long custom, to trade with them, and you, on your own very assumption, have no right either to deprive us of it, or to curtail it; if you choose to treat these States as rebels you must make war upon them in such a fashion as shall not interfere with our enjoyment of our rights, our title to which is absolute, whether as derived from custom and treaties with the United States, or as conveyed to us by the free action of those confederated States as sovereign and independent."

The action of the South towards Europe has been such as did not afford either to England or France this plain and simple standing-ground. It ostentatiously assumed that it had practically the power, by means of its cotton, to force England and France to act in the direction of its own wishes, irrespective of their opinions of what these nations might think just or expedient. It appealed, nakedly and somewhat cynically, to their mere pecuniary or mercantile interests. Your Parisian Correspondent is now appealing in a similar tone to the mercantile cupidity and jealousy which he assumes alone influence England with regard to France. Had not the South heretofore shut itself out from all opportunity of communing with the English mind, your correspondent would have felt and observed that such a manner of application was calculated rather to kindle our aversion than our sympathy.

During the last year the English have, for the first time, arrived at some knowledge of the character of their Southern relations, whom they are indeed proud agnoscere proceres; admiration, love, pity for them are spreading daily among us like a contagion, as do hatred and contempt for the brutal and hypocritical barbarians who are laying waste their homesteads, murdering their men, and insulting their women. Let not the South check this rising sympathy by silly threats about "differential tariffs" and commercial favours to be shown to one nation to spite another. The simple truths of Political Economy—if the South will but understand and adopt them—will give to the South the greatest amount of political power which it is really capable of acquiring. Let it institute no legislation, either for what is called protection to its own manufactures, or for exceptionally favouring or discouraging intercourse with any foreign nation whatever—not even with the Bostonians, New Yorkists, or Pennsylvanians. Let it merely lay ad valorem duties on all commodities it imports; and where any imported commodities compete with any of its own home products, let it impose an equivalent excise upon these last. So will it most certainly come to flourish in strength and wealth; and that the Almighty may bless its efforts speedily to free itself from its enemies is my earnest prayer.

JOHN W. COWELL.

41, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park.

COTTON.

From the Times of India.

I. Cotton: an Account of its culture in the Bombay Presidency, prepared from Government Records, and other authentic sources, in accordance with a Resolution of the Government of India. By WALTER R. CASSELS. Bombay, 1862.

II. Hand-book to the Cotton Cultivation in the Madras Presidency: exhibiting the principal contents of the various public Records and other works connected with the subject, in a condensed and classified form, in accordance with a resolution of the Government of India. By J. TALBOYS WHEELER. Madras, 1862.

III. Cotton Hand-book for Bengal: being a Digest of all information available from Official Records and other sources on the subject of the production of Cotton in the Bengal provinces. Compiled by J. G. MEDLICOTT, B.A. Calcutta, 1862.

The question of the Indian cotton supply furnishes the most prominent and remarkable illustration of our times, of the ease with which the popular judgment may be led astray by the representations of enthusiasts, or of interested men, when these representations chance to fall in with the general wish of the hour. With the experience of the last twelve months before us, we should hardly despair, under judicious agitation, of convincing the mind of Lancashire that supplies of cotton were to be obtained from the moon, or of getting up a sensation cry against the Government that refused to entertain the project of a celestial railway for the purpose. The hopes of Lancashire, in so far as they are directed towards India, are destined only to disappointment, and it is an infirmity of judgment alone, or something worse, that permits our public writers to tell them otherwise. What are we to think, for instance, of the conduct of the Cotton Supply Reporter, which, passionately reproaching the Indian Government as the cause of a state of matters stereotyped by nature, systematically excludes from the columns of the periodical all testimony adverse to the hopes of Manchester, while throwing them freely open to every assurance that ignorance or enthusiastic folly may contribute? Half a century of patient and uniformly unsuccessful effort has not sufficed to show the hollowness of the hope that India will ever render Lancashire independent of the American staple; but we are as eagerly engaged in discussing the chances of success to-day, as though the exhausted field of experiment were still untried. For the last twenty years, the cautious observer of these experiments must have felt that perseverance in them were but to hope against hope. The teachings of a practical philosophy in these circumstances have been neglected for the day-dreams of an idle fancy. Instead of forcing upon the Indian Government, twenty years ago, those great measures of improvement in the country upon which all reasonable hope of enlarged and improved supply of cotton rests, and freely offering her gold for the purpose, Manchester has been content idly to amuse herself with the flattering tales of the enthusiast, and to relieve her periodic fits of alarm upon the subject by frantic abuse of the Government whose hands have been tied, and are to this hour tied, by the folly of English statesmen.

That India does grow cotton and is capable of indefinitely extending its growth, is a question altogether separate and distinct from the question of her power to compete with America. This latter question, were not our national interests so mixed up with its settlement in the affirmative, would long since have been held to be finally set at rest. We are not blaming any who choose to persevere with the experiment; but we do blame and protest against the mischievous prominence this experiment is allowed, and ever has been allowed, to the neglect of those measures which, as practical ones, ought long since to have engrossed all our attention. If the Confederate States were to sink into the Gulf of Mexico, India would at once take the place of the first cotton-producing country of the globe; but while those States remain she never can do so, let the question of her subordinate supply be of what importance it may. On the other hand, if you will sink Bengal in the Indian Ocean, Brazil will at once take the place of the chief indigo producing country of the globe, and Sind or Chili of saltpetre. The hope of India's competition with America in cotton is based, as all experience of the century testifies, upon a hope of successful rebellion against conditions in the soil, or in the climate, of the two countries. You may produce pine-apples in an English hot-house of a finer flavour than the fruit of the West Indies, but you had better not try to compete with them in the market. And so it is possible that a few pounds of cotton, here and there, grown under conditions attainable nowhere in the country upon the field scale, may have been found equal to the New Orleans staple; and you may, if you please, upon the strength of these chance successes, persevere in experiment as widely as you please; but we insist upon it that you cease to pester the Government upon a subject on which, as practical men, we are bound to look as a hobby ridden to the detriment of the commonwealth, when you insist upon forcing the Government into the saddle.

No doubt, again, agriculture in India admits of great improvement, but it is downright folly to compare, as is constantly being done, the high farming introduced into Great Britain within the last few years with the rude husbandry of India, and then to pronounce a comprehensive anathema against the people that tolerate it. The only comparison that we can make of any practical value, is that between the agriculture of India and of other tropical countries. India not only holds her own against such countries, but successfully competes with them in all the markets of the world. In silk, coffee, tea, sugar, wool, seed, and a hundred other articles of produce, she is abreast of all; while she as easily distances the world in indigo and saltpetre, as she is herself distanced in the quality of her rice and cotton by South Carolina. But who dreams of attributing the inferiority of Bengal rice to the low condition of our agriculture? The truth is, that Indian agriculture is fully on a par with the general agriculture of nations; and to look for the high farming of a small part of Europe in this country, is as reasonable as to look for it in the backwoods of America, or in the heart of China. High farming is the result of high national cultivation and wealth, and in due course will doubtless reach this country; but to look for high farming in India, in its present condition, is as visionary as all the other expectations of these cotton supply reporting gentlemen. A comparison between the agriculture of India and that of a large part of America itself would, we are persuaded, be by no means to the disadvantage of the former. It is a curious and very suggestive fact, although we have never seen it noticed in print, that one of the commonest of our staples, linseed, is at times shipped in large quantities from India to New York, the rude agriculture of this country thus successfully competing at their own doors with the famed farmers of the North-Western States of America.

The preparation of these Hand-books forms a fitting close to the long series of Governmental efforts to determine this question. First in order of time comes Mr. Cassell's, and it is but just to add, first in order of merit also. But for Mr. Cassell's valuable work, the Hand-book of Indian Cotton would yet have to be written; the Bengal book by Mr. Medlicott being as loose and unsatisfactory an affair, as the Madras one, by Mr. Talboys Wheeler, is trashy beyond conception. As a sample of the slovenliness of Mr. Wheeler's execution of the task undertaken by him, we notice that whereas he was requested to supply us with the latest statistics of the trade and cultivation in the Madras Presidency, he gives us simply an old table of 1848 compiled by others. The only information this book contains upon half-a-dozen of the most important heads of the inquiry he was set upon, is a reprint from Dr. Royle just fourteen years old! The book contains not even an estimate of the cotton land of the Presidency. It supplies us with abundance of useless information at second-hand, as to rates of assessment, but nothing that we are interested in knowing. The work is disfigured, too, by a strong bias against the American planter (Mr. Finnie), whose conclusions Mr. Wheeler is himself obliged to adopt; and in dismissing the history of this gentleman's experiments, he descends to the level of a coarse calumny against the good faith of his service, upon random hearsay authority that any person of good sense would have discountenanced at once. Inconsistent and slovenly throughout, the only value of the book is the corroboration the author gives in his "Conclusions" to the comprehensive, careful, and elaborate summary of his collaborator, Mr. Cassell. It is not fitting that a work done so discreditably should be reviewed with the indulgence the general Indian press has shown it.

In striking contrast to this trashy affair of Mr. Wheeler's is the elaborate and scholarly book of Mr. Cassell's, produced months before it, of treble its bulk, and full of the most valuable analyses. To be simply just to Mr. Cassell, he has so completely distanced the other two works, that comparison with them is impossible. His handbook is a marvellous repository of facts and statistics brought down to the latest dates, and carefully analyzed and summarized. It is difficult to make the reader, who has not these books before him, appreciate the contrast they present. Indeed, it is, perhaps, unjust to Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Medlicott to measure their performances by so exceptional a standard as Mr. Cassell's book presents. From the nature of his work it is impossible to review it in the ordinary sense of the term; and we can do little more than give a rough summary of its contents. The first fourteen chapters are devoted to an exhaustive resume of the progress of the Indian Cotton trade, and of experimental cultivation of the staple in the various Collectorates of the Presidency. These are followed by three important chapters on the soils and climate of India, and its cotton culture. The 18th chapter is devoted to the subject of roads, the 19th to the vexed question of land tenure and assessment, and the last contains the conclusion of the whole matter. It must suffice that we say Mr. Cassell's work fulfils all the requirements of the task set by the Government Resolution which appointed it—and that it is the only work of the three that does so. These requirements were:—(1) That the handbook should contain a summary of all that had been done within the limits of each Government, by or with the aid of Government, in the way of experimental cotton culture; the history not to be confined, however, to the records of Government, but illustrated from as many sources as possible. (2) That it should relieve the future inquirer from the necessity of reference to official records in bulk or to previous publications. (3) That it should contain the latest statistics of the trade and cultivation, with maps illustrative of the cotton districts existing and possible, and their line of debouchment. (4) That it should be produced as rapidly as possible.

Produced months before the other two, Mr. Cassell's is the only one of the three, that fulfils these conditions, and it does so with a marvellous fulness of information. The book has but one defect, and that is the want of a copious index, which it would be well were Government to supply. And now, what is the result of all this analyzing and summarizing?

Let Mr. Cassell speak for himself:—

1. Exotic cotton cannot be successfully cultivated on a large scale in the Bombay Presidency, except in a limited portion of its southern districts.
2. Indian cotton may be improved in cleanness, and somewhat reduced in cost, but the general characteristics of the staple will not be materially altered.
3. In so far as this quality of cotton is serviceable to the manufacturers of England, India can compete with America; but if a finer description be required, India cannot adequately supply it.

4. Unless, therefore, such alterations in machinery can be devised as may render the manufacturer indifferent to length and fineness of staple—and of the probability of this others must judge—India is not likely to replace the United States.

5. It seems evident, then, that Indian cotton must continue to hold a subordinate place in European markets, and that there is a point at which its competition with other growths entirely ceases.

Substantially the same verdict is pronounced by Mr. Wheeler:—

Four general conclusions appear to have been established, viz:—

- 1st. American cotton can be grown, but the profit is questionable.
- 2nd. Indian cotton may be improved, but only to a degree.
- 3rd. American cotton must always command a higher price than Indian.
- 4th. The demand for Indian cotton must always depend on the supply of American.

Mr. Medlicott, whose works shows considerably more industry than Mr. Wheeler's, contents himself with the following hazy deliverance upon the subject:—

The balance of the evidence before us, and the confident assertions of many who have had the best opportunity of forming a correct opinion, agree in establishing the probability that Bengal could produce cotton for exportation to almost any desired extent; and of a quality which would, under favourable conditions, adapt itself to the requirements of the English market; it will scarcely be questioned that the fact of the ground being more profitably employed in raising other crops is, as above stated, a very sufficient reason for the neglect of this one.

So that the result of this inquiry is, that in so far as Bombay and Madras are concerned, the question of competition may be considered settled, and the utmost Mr. Medlicott will affirm of the chances of Bengal in the race, is the "probability" that Bengal may yet supply cotton "of a quality which would, under favourable conditions, adapt itself to the requirements of the English Market"—the conditions being all yet to be discovered.

We should trust that the publication of these hand-books will give the coup de grace to the agitation that has been carried on for so many years, against what the cotton supply reporting gentlemen call "the barbarous land tenures" of this country. It seems never to have occurred to any of these men as strange, that while the land tenures of India offer no obstacle to the growth of indigo, seeds, sugar, rice, or wheat, they should have been so fatal to the production of cotton. The truth is the cry was begotten of alarm, and maintained in ignorance. It were impossible to devise a tenure better fitted to develop the resources of our soil than prevails in the cotton growing districts of this Presidency, wherever the new Revenue Survey has been made.

THE FALL OF NEW ORLEANS.

The following interesting particulars are reprinted from the correspondence of the Charleston Mercury:—

When General Lovell was assigned to the defence of the coast of Louisiana, he immediately discovered that the only serious danger to New Orleans was by an attack of gunboats up the river. He went to work, and with the assistance of the heroic Duncan, soon placed Forts Jackson and St. Philip in as good condition to destroy any fleet that might attempt to pass to the city as the very limited means in his power would permit.

The obstruction of the Mississippi River, at a point near those defences, was deemed essential to the successful defence of the city, and a very short time after he assumed command a raft was moored from one bank to the other of the river, immediately under fire of both forts. This raft was constructed of very large logs, with two immense chains passing under and fastening below; and they were likewise secured by rivetting large strong slabs across the top. No one for a moment then believed that the combined fleets of the Federal Government could pass up the river.

Upon the night of February 28 this immense structure was torn to pieces and swept away by the Mississippi, which is higher than it was ever known before. The writer of this well remembers the energy and dauntless determination with which General Lovell went to work immediately to place another obstruction in the river. It was clearly shown that no raft could withstand the terrific flood that was then passing over the country. An order was issued seizing a large number of ships and schooners, and they were formed immediately, under that gallant, accomplished officer, Colonel Higgins, into a line, and anchored with every care and precaution across the river near the forts.

Officers and gentlemen of the highest engineering attainments were confident that this second obstruction could not be carried away. Each vessel was heavily and securely anchored, and immense chains passed from one to the other. The fragments of the first raft were also again moored and anchored across the river. The Federal fleet was then in the river, but we felt no apprehension; in fact, everybody was more than willing that they should make the attempt against the forts, which were garrisoned by 1000 experienced artillerymen.

Right here it is proper to add that there were very few first-class siege-guns at either fort; that the few we had, General Lovell had procured with great trouble. It is true, he had often called for ten-inch guns, but those having the power to aid him paid but little attention to these demands.

So far as the land defences of the city are in the question, it is only necessary to state that they were of such a character as to have enabled a very small force to hold them against any numbers which the enemy could have brought. Every confidence was felt by men and officers, and universally shared by the community, that the city could not be taken, except the fleet of gunboats succeeded in destroying the defences above Memphis, and coming down the river.

Such was the condition when the enemy opened fire, from, as near as could be ascertained, twenty-seven mortar boats. They took their position nearly three miles below Fort Jackson, where but few of our guns could reach them. On Friday night a most violent storm arose; and when the morning came, to the unspeakable anguish of the gallant Duncan and men, it was discovered that the anchors which held the ships and schooners across the river had yielded to the combined pressure of the wind and flood; and the obstruction upon which so much depended was destroyed. Prompt measures were taken to repair the damages, but the Federal gunboats opened a tremendous fire upon the men and boats engaged on the work, and they were forced to abandon it.

An open passage to the city was thus before them, through agencies which no power of man could resist. The river was still rising rapidly; the parade ground in Fort Jackson was covered to the depth of fifteen inches with water, and the sharpshooters who had been sent to annoy the enemy below the forts were driven by the water from that position.

The bombardment of the mortar fleet was kept up day and night for a week. They succeeded in getting the range, and the number of shells which fell into Fort Jackson is almost incredible. The woodwork of the fort was burned early in the action, and the garrison, up to their knees in water, and without clothes, save what they were wearing when the quarters were destroyed, cheerfully and bravely stood to their guns.

Upon the morning of April 21, about three o'clock, the enemy's fleet of gunboats and frigates was discovered coming up; but owing to the treason of a scoundrel who was on watch below, and whose duty it was to give warning of their approach by sending up rockets, they had reached a point nearly opposite the forts before they were observed. The country knows how the indomitable Duncan fought them; but it was beyond the power of man to hold them in check. On they passed. General Lovell was on an ordinary steamboat (the Doobloom) in the thick of the fight; and, at one time, some of the Yankee fleet were between him and the city. He came up in all haste, and ordered well-trained artillerymen, under General Smith, to the few guns that were at Chalmette—five on one side and nine thirty-two pounders on the other. It may be asked, why there were not more guns at this point? Simply for the reason that General Lovell did not have them. He had been requested to turn over to the naval authorities the guns which he intended for these batteries; and, besides, it was never pretended by any one that any open works, with the river at least four feet higher than the level of the country, could stand the broadsides of a fleet under such disadvantages.

The works at Chalmette held the thirteen large frigates and gunboats about an hour. The last defences having been overcome, the thirteen vessels came up and anchored off the city. General Lovell was in town, and ready and willing to remain with all the troops under his command, which the morning report of that day showed to be about 2800, two-thirds of whom were the volunteer and militia companies which had recently been put in camp, and not one-half of whom were respectably armed.

It was the undivided expression of public opinion that the army had better retire and save the city from destruction; and, accordingly, the General ordered his forces to rendezvous at Camp Moore, about seventy miles above New Orleans, on the Jackson Railroad.

If General Lovell had had any number of first-class guns they could not have been used, as the country was covered with water. As before stated, the river was higher than it was ever known before, and from a few miles below the city to the Gulf was one vast sheet of water, with the exception of the narrow levee on either side, and upon which there was not space enough to manage the guns that could have been effective against ships-of-war.

If any obstruction could have stood the flood of the Mississippi and the furious storm that raged on Friday night, by which the line of schooners was swept away, the city could not have fallen.

The forts were not armed with the largest guns, but they could have destroyed the fleet if it could have been held under their fire for any considerable period. After they succeeded in passing to the front of the city, General Lovell had either to stand a bombardment without the power of replying, and by which the city would have been destroyed, and more than 100,000 helpless women and children exposed; or retire and let the enemy take possession. He followed in his decision the wishes of the people; he was ready and willing, and so were his officers and men, to perish in the ruins of New Orleans rather than yield, if such a course had been agreed to by the inhabitants. But it was decided otherwise; and in making this statement no reflection is intended upon the courage and loyalty of that unfortunate city. A truer, braver community, never felt the power of the invader; and to-day they are proud and defiant in their devotion to the cause.

I again repeat, but for the storm and flood, which combined to destroy the obstructions in the river, New Orleans would have been saved. General Lovell did all that mortal man could do to save the city; and, it is believed, that the good sense and candour of the people will do him him justice. No soldier in the armies of the South has shown stronger evidences of devotion to the cause.

WAR SONGS OF THE SOUTH.—Before the breaking out of the present war, few persons thought of having books published in the South. Southern authors sent their productions to Yankee land to be printed—in fact, we blindly looked to the North to furnish us with books and papers. The war, notwithstanding it has entailed numberless evils upon us, has nevertheless been a source of benefit to us in a great many respects. We are now writing and printing our own books. Messrs. West and Johnson have in press a volume, by Dr. Shephardson, of Georgia, entitled "War Songs of the South," edited by "Bohemian," the talented correspondent of the Dispatch. The New York press, having seen the above announcement in the Richmond papers, ridiculed the idea, and considered it preposterous for a "rebel" to publish a book. Dr. Shephardson is one of Georgia's most gifted sons—a high-minded and chivalric gentleman—and we feel convinced that he will prove to the Gothamites, by the publication of his "War Songs," that we are not dependent on them for books. Southern books have always been far superior to the trash gotten up at the North, for we have no "isms" in them—they are pure and unadulterated. The songs are the spontaneous outbursts of popular feeling. They show the sentiments of the people, and give the lie to the assertion of our enemy, that this revolution is the work of politicians and party-leaders alone. They show the spirit of Southern poetry, and contain a wealth of patriotic sentiment, that cannot fail to animate the whole country and meet with a ready response in every heart. They record the patriotism of Southern women, who possess the proud and unconquerable spirit of Gertrude, in Schiller's "William Tell." Many of them were written by soldiers in camp, and nearly all have particular reference to some battle, heroic act, or event of war. The book preserves poems that would be otherwise lost to the world. The ballads and songs of the Revolution were only collected a few years ago, and it was a source of much regret that many meritorious and valuable poems, partially preserved by tradition, could not be found. We shall look with pleasure for the appearance of the book, which will be ready in a short time. It is a book of genius and of patriotism—a genuine Southern book, by a true Southern gentleman, and should have universal circulation.—Charleston Daily Courier.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

RED AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rufford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBURIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.

Represented by
Jos. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Killed Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Dresses, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manufactured Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE and NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BESLEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Brydon's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES:
Their Origin and the Remedy for them
Prior Is.
London: HURSTON, New Bond-street.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDER-ICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published
the following Catalogues of their Stock:—

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. B. Roman and French Books. Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travel, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP-CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History,
Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FORTH-LOOKING CATALOGUE. Issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign
Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of advertising.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to destroy the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bid their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern paper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. They will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might leave "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise Southern Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property, &c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION
FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRESS INTERNATIONAL
DE BIENFAISANCE.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.
The Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, in conjunction with the Third Session of the Congress International de Bienfaissane, will take place in London from the 1st to the 14th of June.

The Departmental Meeting of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon,
and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.
The Session of the Congress will be held in the Forenoon, in Burlington House.

A series of Societies will be given during the period of the Meeting; and it is intended to provide for visits to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Members' Tickets, price One Guinea each (entitled to the volume of "Transactions"), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will admit to all the Meetings of the Association and Congress, and to the Societies.

Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C.; and 12, Old Bond-street, W.

As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting
will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions in aid of the local fund.

For every £5 subscribed to this Fund, subscribers are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12, Old Bond-street, W., and at the City office, Guildhall, E.C.; by Messrs. Ramsden, Bouverie, and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Westminster Bank, Lombury, E.C.; the Union Bank,
Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Kennard, and Co., 4, Lombury-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George Lederer, 4, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, E.C.

GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen. Sec.,
and Chairman of Executive Committee.
A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.
G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Elysees—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent non-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under tutelage.

Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Laigne,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE:—78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 232,003 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,333,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1867.
Interest of redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 699,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 73
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 565,449 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issued
of 1859.

Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
J. Maspero.
P. Poux.
C. Harold.
G. Miltenberger.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... $61,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,059 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861;
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPERATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.

PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.
Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made
up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Ship Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry thereon, aquaports, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying on sending the same to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur
a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board
any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of
a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

GENTLEMEN requiring an excellent Tailor are recommended to the establishments of A. M. CAMPER, 229, Regent-street, London, and Anger's Restaurant, and 20, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris.

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENNY.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XI. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free
speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—startled Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little
had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a per-
plexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern
interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal, and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crane-court, Fleet-street, and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—July 10, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 12.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JULY 17, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	177
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	179
Manchester Letter	179
THE TOBACCO MARKET	180
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
The Destruction of the Virginia	180
Private Letters and Extracts	180
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	180
Washington	181
Paris	181
EXTRACTS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS	182
LEADERS—
The War News	184
What the Situation Requires	184
The "Slava Power"	185
Southern Patriotism in Europe	186
THE CRUISE OF THE SUMMER—
Cornered	187
The Escape	187
REVIEWS—
Southern Statistics—
The Cotton Production (concluded)	188
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR	189
ADVERTISEMENTS	192

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE BATTLE BEFORE RICHMOND.

WE will endeavour to give a succinct, and, we trust, an intelligent account of the sanguinary conflict that has resulted in the defeat of General McClellan, and the retreat of the Federal army to the cover and protection of the gunboats. The Northern reports are meagre and contradictory, and here and there most palpably false. Still, notwithstanding the embargo laid on the news by Mr. Stanton, notwithstanding the careful dressing of the defeat to modify its effect on Europe, certain facts are admitted which could not, indeed, have been concealed, and which are sufficiently definite and important to enable us to compile an accurate and satisfactory outline of the encounter.

In order that we may understand the late movements we must recall to mind the position occupied by the Federal army before they commenced. General McClellan had advanced between the James River and the Pamunkey, on his way to Richmond, but between him and that city was the Chickahominy River. Across the last-named river he threw a portion of his forces, with the intention of advancing with his right towards the north of Richmond by the right bank of the Pamunkey; then occurred the Confederate sortie, named by General McClellan the Battle of Fair Oaks, which resulted in the defeat of the division which had crossed the Chickahominy, and which was only saved from being driven into that river by the bringing up of enormous reinforcements. The late exploit of Confederate cavalry will be freshly remembered. A body of troops not exceeding 1500 in number passed through the right wing of the enemy, destroyed property and captured prisoners and stores in his rear, and making a complete circuit of the army, returned to Richmond via the left Federal wing. Such was the position of General McClellan, and such were the ominous disasters that had befallen him since the commencement of the siege of Richmond.

It will now be as well to see whether there is the slightest pretence for the assertion that General McClellan contemplated a retrograde movement before the last battle forced upon him the commonplace "strategy" of defeated armies,—a retreat. On Wednesday, June 25, General McClellan forwarded the following despatches to the War Department at Washington:—

Redoubt No. 3, June 25, 1:30 p.m.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:—

We have advanced our pickets on our left considerably to-day under a sharp resistance. Our men have behaved very handsomely.

Some firing still continues.

(Signed)

G. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

Redoubt No. 3, June 25, 3:15 p.m.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:—

The enemy are making desperate resistance to the advance of our picket lines. Kearney's and one-half of Hooker's are where I want them.

I have this moment reinforced Hooker's right with a brigade and a couple of guns, and hope in a few minutes to finish the work intended for to-day.

Our men are behaving splendidly. The enemy are fighting well also.

This is not a battle—merely an affair of Heintzleman's corps, supported by Key's; and thus far all goes well, and we hold every foot we have gained. If we succeed in what we have undertaken, it will be a very important advantage gained.

The loss is not large thus far.

The fighting up to this time has been done by Hooker's division, which has behaved as usual—that is, most handsomely.

On our right, Porter has silenced the enemy's batteries in his front.

(Signed)

G. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

Redoubt No. 3, June 25, 5 p.m.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:—

The affair is over, and we have gained our point fully, and with but little loss. Notwithstanding strong opposition, our men have done all that could be desired.

The affair was partially decided by two guns that Captain De Russy brought gallantly into action under difficult circumstances.

The enemy have been driven from his camps in front of this, and all is now quiet.

(Signed)

G. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

On the next day, the 26th, a despatch was received from General McClellan, in which he announces that he had gained from the enemy "a swamp, with thick underbrush, beyond which is an open country," and he expresses considerable satisfaction at such a result. We beg our readers to note that, until the 26th, General McClellan, so far from preparing for a retrograde movement, was doing his best to push forward his lines, and was making official announcements of his advance. If General McClellan contemplated a retrograde movement, it was a confession that his plans had been frustrated by the superior strength or superior strategy of his enemy; but that he did not contemplate such a withdrawal is amply testified by his despatches which we have quoted, and therefore the Confederate victory is the more complete since it forced the Federal army to retreat for seventeen miles.

The prelude, or rather the first scene of the bloody drama, was enacted on Thursday, June 26, the day on which General McClellan wrote rejoicingly about the swamp he had taken from the Confederates.

The Northern newsmongers describe the affair of Thursday as heavy skirmishing, renewed from the previous day. Of course the Federals claim the victory, but if the claim was justified it is curious that Mr. Stanton should immediately publish General McClellan's glowing and grateful despatch about taking possession of the "swamp," and should, upon hearing of the said heavy skirmishing, have peremptorily forbidden the publication of all war news.

On Friday morning, at three a.m., General "Stonewall" Jackson, who was supposed to be preparing for another battle in the Shenandoah Valley, and who the Irish-Federal soldiers affirm to be able to be in two places at one time, attacked the right wing of the Federal army. Whether General McClellan and his Pennsylvania reserves were taken by surprise, we know not. We should imagine, after the heavy skirmishing on the Thursday, that the whole line was on the alert; but we are perfectly sure the Federals had no idea of being attacked by General Jackson, and that, as usual, they were profoundly ignorant of the Confederate movements.

It is said that the fight between General Jackson and the troops under General McClellan lasted for three hours; and, according to the Northern version, General Jackson was repulsed. Later in the day, the engagement became general; and we are told that the Federal General Porter, commanding the right wing, repulsed the Confederates four times, and, after making fearful havoc with his artillery, drove them back at the point of the bayonet for more than a mile, but mysteriously returned again and again to his encampment to be freshly attacked by the enemy.

This report is shown by the result to be a fabrication. According to a correspondent of a Northern paper, as soon as General McClellan heard that his right wing was repulsing and driving back the enemy, he ordered it to abandon its position and commence a retrograde movement. Surely this is wonderful strategy, absolutely marvellous, when we remember that only twenty-four hours before General McClellan had been boasting of his advance, and yet, when his troops make a fresh advance he commands a retreat! Just as at Bull Run, the newspaper correspondents at first announced a complete Federal victory, and the imminent capture of Richmond. On June 30, it was currently reported at Fortress Monroe the city was bombarded, and in flames; and finally, that Richmond had been taken. Let us now, having given the imaginary version of the affair, look at it by its results.

According to the Northern telegram, the result of the two days' fighting was that "the Federals, by order of General McClellan, receded several miles, hotly pursued by the Confederates;" and we are further told "that he made for the James River," and that "the Federals are stated to have retreated for a strategic purpose."

General McClellan then commenced the strategic movements for which he had been preparing; his whole right wing fell back, and crossed to the south side of the Chickahominy, in rear of his left wing. He afterwards made for James River.

Now, the only strategy evinced by a General besieging a city, who retreats several miles, hotly pursued by the besieged troops, and who, twenty-four hours previously had been pushing forward his lines and boasting of his advance, is the inevitable strategy of a defeated army. It was impossible to disguise the retreat; and yet to announce it, is a complete and unmistakable confession of defeat. We have no details of the battle, even from Northern sources, but the admitted result shows that the Confederates were triumphant.

The more we dwell upon the terms of the report, the more vivid becomes our conception of the disaster. Receding "several" miles, and "hotly pursued" by the Confederates; what a scene must that retreat have been! Defeated on June 27, yet finding no rest from hot pursuit until the cover of the gunboats was reached on July 2; how often in those five days of hot pursuit did they occupy position after position, only to be forced out of them by the triumphant foe! What a comprehensive sentence is that, "he made for the James River." In such relation there is a peculiar significance about the word "made." We are not deceived by the pretended repulse of General Jackson, or the victories of General Porter. The first assault was successful enough to determine McClellan to retreat as fast as he could, and even to abandon his siege guns; for Jackson's attack took place on Friday morning, yet the same day commenced the hot pursuit, and long before sunset on Saturday the White House had been abandoned. In that place the Federal movement was precipitated by the telegraph operator receiving notice to quit from the Confederates, who were in possession of Tunstall Station. Under these circumstances no one can be surprised to hear that sufficient stores were captured to supply the Confederate army for three months.

The Federals were not allowed to retreat unmolested. The fighting was continued on the 29th and 30th June, and the 1st and 2nd July. Every now and then the discomfited troops were obliged to make a stand to check for a moment the hot pursuit of the enemy; but after June 27, when General McClellan found himself beaten, and perceived that the speedy advance he had anticipated and announced on the 26th would not be realized, and he was obliged to sound a retreat, the battle resolved itself into a flight, harassed by the victorious foe. The Northern telegram says:—

A series of severe and bloody battles, extending over seven days, have been fought before that place, resulting in the defeat of General McClellan's army, with heavy loss, during four days' fighting.

The Federal army retreated seventeen miles.

This is not entirely correct, since the defeat was perfected after two days' battle, and the remaining five days' fighting was forced on the Federals until they found rest under the cover of the gunboats on the James River.

On the afternoon of the 2nd, General McClellan telegraphed to Washington that "he had succeeded in getting his army to Berkeley Harrison's Bar, on the James River, and that "he had fought a severe battle on the 1st, and had beaten the enemy on the 2nd." That is, the Confederates, having driven him across the Chickahominy, and chased him for at least seventeen miles—for Berkeley, the present position of the Federals, is forty-eight miles from Richmond by water, and thirty-five miles from Richmond by road—gave up the pursuit when he had got under the protection of the gunboats. Even then General McClellan felt insecure and uncomfortable, and immediately began to throw up entrenchments. From being the besiegers, the Federals became the besieged.

One effect of the victory is, that the Confederates have recovered the whole of the ground between the Chickahominy and Pamunkey Rivers, and that they have regained the command of the head of the York River.

We will not hazard any opinion as to the losses. No doubt the slaughter must have been fearful on both sides, and especially in the ranks of a fleeing army "hotly pursued" for five days by the enemy flushed with victory. It is reported that General Macgruder has been captured; and, on the other hand, that two Federal Generals are prisoners. But it is useless to speculate on these rumours.

With regard to the booty, the latest telegram says:—

The Southern newspapers claim that the Confederates have captured 12,000 prisoners, all McClellan's siege guns, and supplies sufficient to last the Confederate army for three months.

We pretty well know what this form of expression means. The Confederates "claimed" the victory at Fair Oaks, and they had it. The Confederates "claimed" the victory at James Island, and they had it. The Confederates "claimed" the victory at Shiloh, and they had it. It is a favourite way with the Federals, to admit a reverse, to say that "the Confederates claim, &c." The 12,000 prisoners show splendid generalship, and these guns and stores will be of great use. As we lately remarked, the Federal armies have become the purveyors of stores and war materials for the Confederates. Was it part of General McClellan's "strategy," which he had been "preparing," to lose his siege guns, an immense quantity of stores, and 12,000 prisoners? If so, we must admit General McClellan is master of the art of defeat, and that he can calculate the exact moment and the extent of a disaster.

The Federal Commander evidently knows very little about what is going on in his army. In his despatch of July 2 he states, "he had lost but one gun and one waggon;" but the official despatch two days later states:—

No guns have been lost since the 27th ult., when General McClellan's division was at first overwhelmed, and twenty-five pieces of artillery fell into the hand of the Confederates.

As we have said, on the 27th the Federals were defeated, and driven from their position; and it was then, no doubt, the artillery was captured and the bulk of the 12,000 prisoners.

General McClellan says that reinforcements from Washington have reached him. That he has need of them is quite certain.

Mr. Stanton has found it difficult to invent a plausible fabrication to cover the serious Federal disaster. The following excuse is worse than puerile; it is almost idiotic:—

The Federal army moved into the position now occupied, because it affords greatly superior advantages for the operations of the gunboats, seventeen of which are now in James River, protecting the flank of the Federal army.

If the position is so good, why did the Federals ever move out of it? Why did they advance, at such a tremendous loss of life and time? But if we discuss this excuse we shall fairly lay ourselves open to the charge of idiocy.

Under date of July 7 we learn that General McClellan has issued an address to the army, declaring that the Federals shall enter Richmond, and that the Union shall be preserved, no matter what the cost of time, of treasure, and of blood.

What an undignified specimen of insane rage engendered by disappointment. We will not assert that by a reckless expenditure of blood and treasure, in course of time Richmond may not fall. God only knows. Judging from the past, and looking to the present, we do not think Richmond is in any danger. But there is no potency in the squalling rage of General McClellan. He may utter grandiose predictions about the future, but he is not the arbiter of war. The enemy he could not conquer with his army he will not overcome with his tongue. "The Federals shall enter Richmond!" Well, since June 27th, 12,000 Federals have been permitted a near view of the city, if they have not entered it. The oracular utterances of General McClellan are obscure. He does not intimate whether the Federals are to enter Richmond as victors or vanquished. If he himself were to enter Richmond under a Confederate escort, it would only be a brilliant "strategy" for which "he had been preparing."

All the care of the Government could not prevent a panic in Washington, and in New York gold advanced to more than 10 per cent. premium, and there was a heavy fall in stocks. The most prominent evidence of the panic was the wild cry for more men for McClellan. At one time there was a demand for a conscription, we presume limited to the Irish and German population. To quiet the public mind, the Government published a communication from eighteen Governors of States, asking the President to raise more troops; and the President gave assent to a further levy of 300,000 men. If we mistake not, this correspondence was manufactured on the spur of the moment by the indefatigable Stanton, or it had been prepared in case of need. If the safety of the army of the Potomac depends upon the new levies, it will be in danger for a long time. It takes full four months to raise troops and bring them into the field, and even then they are no better than raw recruits. We are far from saying that 300,000 additional soldiers are not required; for the Federal force must have been fearfully reduced by the casualties of the camp and the battle-field. Possibly it may be found more difficult to raise an army now than it was at the commencement of the war. Union feeling has cooled at the West, and Irish and German mercenaries are not fond of so many hard blows and no plunder.

The first news of the defeat was accompanied by the intimation that Information obtained from reliable sources leads to the belief that General Burnside was to attack the Confederate defences near Richmond on the 28th inst.

General Burnside did not attack the Confederates on the 28th, and we do not suppose he had any intention of so doing. Mr. Stanton is always ready to announce what the Federals are going to do, though he is so particular in concealing what has been done.

The publication of war news was still forbidden when the last mail left New York. The correspondent of the Baltimore American was arrested for forwarding the following despatch to New York papers:—

Baltimore American office, Baltimore,
Sunday, June 29, 9 p.m.

I am writing for the American a detailed account of events at White House, before Richmond, and on the Peninsula, during the last four days, including facts obtained from Washington, having been sent for by special train to communicate with the President.

If you desire it, I will send it to you. It will make 4000 or 5000 words.

We have the grandest military triumph over the enemy, and Richmond must fall.

C. C. FULTON.

The Washington Government dread a panic that might suddenly lead to a financial crash, and hence the strictness of the censorship of the press. But to quote a vulgar saying, "Murder will out," and the postponement of the revelation only postpones the evil consequences.

It is reported that the White House is burnt.

The Federal newspapers were divided in opinion. Many of them attacked General McClellan; others blamed the Government for not supplying the "Young Napoleon" with sufficient force. This criticism has, however, been checked by the Government, and the press has been taught to appreciate and applaud the clever strategy of retreat. The New York Chamber of Commerce

Has passed resolutions that it would by its influence continue to sustain the Government in the determined effort to put down the rebellion and to maintain the Union.

But no amount of loud talking can dispel the gloomy feeling caused by the defeat of General McClellan. The Confederate victory is too glorious and complete to be ignored or slurred over.

On July 4 the North was to have celebrated the capture of Charleston, as well as the downfall of Richmond. The former, as well as the latter, expectation has been disappointed.

The Confederate victory on James Island was so important that General Hunter has retired from his position on James Island, and, although he has been reinforced, has deemed it prudent to discontinue his operations against Charleston. Thus, the city threatened with such peculiar and deadly vengeance has been able to repel the foe. General Benham, who commanded the Federal attack, is to be tried by a court-martial for disobedience to General Hunter in assaulting the batteries. It is likely that the plan of punishing unsuccessful Generals may become popular with the Northerners. With them anything is better than a confession that they are not invincible. The Federal accounts state that they lost no less than two-thirds of their attacking force.

Last week we were informed that Vicksburg had been taken, and this week we are told that Vicksburg has not been taken. It is said:—

The Federal Commander before Vicksburg is employing his troops to cut a canal across the land opposite the city, so as to change the course of the Mississippi, and render Vicksburg for ever an inland town.

What a grand undertaking to change the course of the Mississippi for ever! What terrible fellows are these Federal generals on paper!

On June 21 the Union mortar fleet was repulsed at Grand Gulf by the Confederate batteries.

The position of General Curtis in Arkansas was very critical. He was threatened on his rear by a Confederate force, 6000 strong; whilst General Hindman, with 5000 troops, was marching against his front. The advance of General Hindman had caused Colonel Fitch to evacuate Port St. Charles, after spiking the guns.

There was a rumour that General Curtis had retired from Arkansas, with his forces, into Missouri.

The Federal fleet in the White River made an attempt to go up to reduce some batteries and forces at Dandal's Bluff, but they could not, owing to the lowness of the water in the river, proceed beyond Crooked Point, and were compelled to return to St. Charles. All the distance up the river and back again they were continually fired upon from the shore.

According to the correspondents of the New York Times the Confederates are threatening Port Royal.

Amongst the latest achievements of the Confederates is another successful cavalry attack on an express train. The Northern accounts state:—

A train on the Memphis and Ohio Railroad was captured by a force of Confederate cavalry, fourteen miles north of Memphis. Two railroad superintendents, a colonel, and one company of an Ohio regiment, and a number of mules and provender were taken. Ten Federal soldiers were killed.

It is evident that General Halleck is very weak, or not very vigilant. Much anxiety is felt in Washington with respect to his safety. It is rumoured that a Confederate force, under General Breckinridge, is moving northward to attack him.

General Pope has assumed the command of the Federal forces in the Shenandoah Valley. Mr. Stanton will find him an admirable assistant. A General who does not scruple to invent the capture of 10,000 prisoners will be ready to announce any number of victories that have not been gained. General Fremont has resigned, and retires to enjoy the fortune he has made out of fort building. He is succeeded by General Rufus King, a West-country lawyer, who, although he does not know anything about fighting experimentally, will be as good a general as his predecessor.

The news from New Orleans is, as usual, a record of tyranny and barbarity. General Butler has prepared a new form of oath for foreigners. The attempt to make foreigners take an oath is an unprecedented and monstrous violation of the law of nations.

General Butler's notions of the rights of property would find considerable favour within the precincts of Newgate:—

At New Orleans the Federal surgeon Biddle having taken a slave to be his servant, the owner of the slave retook him from Biddle. The owner was thereupon condemned to two years' imprisonment in the parish gaol, it having been decided that the Federal army must have everything it requires for its use.

This is adding inhumanity to robbery. Surely it was enough to steal the man's property without sending him to prison for two years for trying to get it back again.

The New Orleans Delta, which is edited by General Butler, has assumed an offensive tone of ridicule towards foreign Consuls, the British Consul being specially abused.

At Nashville the clergy, at a special second conference before Governor Johnson, refused to take the oath of allegiance to the United States. Most of them, including the Rev. Drs. Baldwin, Schone, and Sawvie (Methodists), and Ford and Howell (Baptists), were sent to the penitentiary.

The Tariff Bill makes the new rates of duty applicable to goods in bond and on shipboard.

A meeting had been held at the Cooper Institute of a pacific tendency; the Hon. Fernando Wood was the principal speaker.

There has also been an important meeting of the Conservative members of Congress at Washington, at which the abolition schemes were indignantly denounced.

Mr. Lincoln has sent to the Senate a Treaty made by the American Minister loaning to Mexico $11,000,000. This is a marked insult to France.

The ill will towards England is greater than ever, and a war with this country is looked forward to with immense satisfaction.

The possibility of intervention by England and France is regarded with great disfavour; but the idea of mediation does not meet with so much opposition.

The Count of Paris and the Duke de Chartres, since the late battles, have quitted the Federal army, and returned to Europe.

The Federal War Department has ordered all returned prisoners, liberated on parole by the Confederates, to report themselves immediately, and they will be appointed to some duty compatible with their parole. What employment can be found for the multitude of prisoners that have been released by the Confederates that will not violate their parole, we are at a loss to conceive.

Financial affairs in the United States are very gloomy. Gold is at 10 per cent. premium, and at New York there is a cry to prevent the exportation of specie. There is no prospect of collecting war tax in the West; still the issue of redeemable paper money continues; the public debt is being rapidly augmented. Repudiation and national bankruptcy are the natural and inevitable consequences of an increasing expenditure and a rapidly diminishing means.

The next mail steamers due from North America are the Bremen, on the 17th, the Arabia, on the 21st inst.

The Hibernia and Kangaroo passed Cape Race on the 5th, and the Europa on the 6th. The Great Eastern passed St. Andrew's on the 8th. The Anglo-Saxon has arrived out.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, July 16.

Our last report left the market quiet in tone, with Middling Orleans at 17½d. and Fair Dhollerah 13½d. It was evident that the speculative feeling was quelled for the moment, and holders were beginning to betray some little uneasiness. On Thursday the feeling made further progress, and the sales fell off to 3000 bales. Surats were very difficult to move, and the few transactions that occurred were at ¾d. to 1d. decline from the highest point. In American there was more steadiness, and but little quotable decline. The Etna's news was received this day, and gave the first intimation of that series of murderous combats which have taken place in front of Richmond. The intelligence, which was very confused, created a strong impression that the Federals had met with a severe reverse, and was generally construed in favour of the market, but it failed to arrest the drooping tendency. On Friday the depression continued in the morning, and Surats on the spot were sold at 13d. for Fair Dhollerah, while that description was sold to arrive as low as 11½d. As the day wore on, however, the feeling improved. Attention was forcibly called to the rapid reduction of stock; the week's returns showed that the actual export reached the enormous amount of 28,000 bales, against 18,000 delivered to the trade, bringing the estimated stock down to the exceedingly small figure of 157,000 bales. More business accordingly was done in the afternoon, and Dhollerahs were sold to arrive at 12½d. On Saturday there was a further improvement, with sales of 6000 bales, and half the decline was recovered for cotton on the spot, while to arrive there was a large business at ¾d. to ¾d. below the highest point touched before.

On Monday the China's advices were to hand, confirming the disastrous nature of the defeats McClellan had sustained before Richmond. The whole scope of the news was decidedly adverse to the Federals—more so, indeed, than on any occasion since the battle of Bull's Run. At Charleston the Federal expedition was withdrawn. In Arkansas the Northern troops were falling back, while guerillas were anticipating communications in Tennessee. The whole scope of the news was deemed favourable to the market, with the single exception of a paragraph of the telegram published in the Times, announcing that an enthusiastic peace meeting had been held in New York. This report, which afterwards proved to be utterly groundless, completely neutralized the other news and made the market dull and lifeless, though without quotable decline.

Yesterday, however, the tone was completely altered by a fresh batch of news from America. By the Jura, intelligence was to hand from New York as late as the 7th inst.; and though the telegrams were so confused and contradictory that it was almost impossible to unravel them, it was easy to perceive that the former impressions regarding the fighting at Richmond were fully borne out. Amid the smoke and obscurity of that seven days' desperate strife, it was clear that the Federal troops had been driven back from their former position with fearful slaughter, and that Richmond, for the present at least, was safe from attack. The prominent feeling in the public mind was one of sickening disgust at this horrible carnage, accompanied with a strong persuasion that the North would not for the present abate one jot of its determination. The papers by the China also disproved the alleged peace-meeting in New York. It turned out to be only a demonstration of the Democratic party thrown against an Abolition policy. Not a whisper was heard from any quarter of peace or settlement, but the unanimous tone of the Northern press was one of fierce determination to redouble their efforts for the conquest of the South. Lincoln's call for 300,000 additional men was received with enthusiasm, and it was alleged that the requisite number would soon be raised.

The effect of this news on our market was to kindle afresh the speculative feeling. Large export orders came to hand from the Continent, and the business reached 12,000 bales—three-fourths for speculation and export, at ¾d. advance on all sorts. To-day the demand still continues active, but runs chiefly on American cotton. A strong demand still exists for Havre, where prices keep 1d. or 1½d. ahead of Liverpool; and it is said that the consumption of American cotton in France is still nearly 4,000 bales per week, which must be chiefly provided out of our market. Some American cotton is also being bought for New York, where prices have advanced to 40 cents., and the supply is almost exhausted. The influence of this extensive demand on our extremely small stock of American cotton causes it daily to harden, and prices are again dearer to-day; but Surats are dull of sale, and the extreme rates of yesterday can hardly be obtained "to arrive." Our quotations for middling American may be given as 18d. for Orleans, 17½d. to ¾d. for Mobiles, and 17½d. for Bowads. On the spot, Fair Dhollerahs are worth 13½d. to ¾d.; Omrawutta, 13½d. to 14d.; and Broach, 14½d. The best Saw-gioned Dharwar has been sold at 16d., and fair quality may be quoted 15½d.

To arrive, April shipment, may be quoted 13½d. for Broach, 13½d. for Omrawutta, 13d. for Dhollerah, and ¾d. to ¾d. less for May shipments.

The attention of operators in our market is now directed mainly to the expected discussion on American affairs in Parliament on Friday. The effect of the late Federal disasters on the policy of our Government is watched with much anxiety, for it is felt the time is approaching when the recognition of the South may probably be resolved on. The speculative feeling is somewhat restrained here by the uncertainty that attaches to this point.

MANCHESTER, July 15.

Since Tuesday the market has been much quieter, and the change of tone in Liverpool has reacted on the demand for goods and yarns here. Small as it was at the commencement of the week, it was perceptibly reduced at the close.

On Friday last business came to a stand, and beyond the execution of a few trifling orders nothing was done, either for the export or the home trade; prices were generally steady, but buyers holding off. The firmness of spinners was hardly tested in the absence of any offers being made.

In some cases spinners, anxious for orders, were found easier to deal with; for the most part, however, they adhere strictly to their extreme quotations.

Cloth also has been quiet, and what little demand there was has been readily met by speculative holders, who can now afford to undersell the manufacturer.

From the neighbouring manufacturing towns the same unwelcome intelligence of increasing distress continues to be received, varying only week after week in the number applying for relief.

In the Stockport union there has been a large increase since the beginning of June. One remarkable fact deserves special notice, and that is, there has been a considerable decrease of crime in the borough.

In Wigan, also, there is a large weekly increase of distress; and it is stated that in the course of another month all the mills will be closed.

We have yet to see what effect the remarkable movements in the price of cotton will have on these manufacturing districts, heretofore hives of industry, but now distinguished amongst the communities of the kingdom for enforced idleness, privation nobly borne, and an all pervading gloom. It is not necessary for the sufferers to entreat the attention of their fellow-countrymen to their already painful situation, or to the increasing bitterness of their trials, for the gaze of the whole country is now riveted upon the sad spectacle now presented, and there is a ceaseless prayer for their speedy relief; their case is one which the most careless among us will soon be found to take into anxious consideration, great as the distress among the operatives has been, the severity of the crisis is only beginning to be felt; the ground assigned for this conclusion, has only, unfortunately too much reason on its face, namely, that many manufacturers who have hitherto kept their mills open, will not face the risk involved on the extraordinary prices to which the raw material is being forced up. It is a peculiarity of the time, that while nothing but discouragement has surrounded the legitimate trader, the speculative spinner or manufacturer—he, who had the courage and means at his disposal, to hold his production for the anticipated cotton famine, may now realize a fortune: this is one of those times when regular industry is deranged and replaced by rank speculation, and when the most successful man is as likely as otherwise to be the adventurer who goes for a fortune or for ruin, to those with whom he has dealings.

The great body of consumers of cotton goods have hitherto felt the effect of the dearth of the material much less than might have been expected, the disturbance having been singularly slow in its progress down from the fountain head of supply to the retail consumer. But this exemption does not seem likely to continue much longer, and perhaps it is quite as well it should not do so, for there are some minds too careless and apathetic to notice the most remarkable phenomena of commerce, yet which can be effectually aroused into a selfish attention by a sudden rise in price of articles of common use or wear. It has frequently been observed during the course of the present disturbance in the cotton business, that the home trader, by which term may be understood the houses that act as purveyors of cotton goods to the retail dealers and to the British public, have slackened their purchases with each successive rise in prices.

Now, however, that prices have reached a point never known before the home trade are buyers at the advance, of nearly all classes of goods which enter into the consumption of the country.

To-day our market is again much firmer, having quite recovered from the depressed and unsteady feeling observable at the close of last week.

The renewed advance in the raw material consequent on the last American advices, and more favourable telegraphic news from India, have had a strengthening effect in prices, which have rallied considerably since Friday, and are now to the full as extreme as in this day week.

In yarns the business doing is very small, and, to a large extent, consists of resale of speculation lots, at rates below those at which spinners would sell, as each rise in prices leaves spinners in a worse position than before. They are generally indifferent about selling, except at extreme rates, and appear resolved to close their mills to a much greater extent than has hitherto been the case. Buyers are acting with great caution, and restrict their operations within the narrowest possible limits.

The cloth market is very firm at the full rates current last week, but the demand continues quiet.

On the whole, prices are fully as firm as on Tuesday last, but in all departments the business doing is small.

TOBACCO MARKET.

LONDON, July 16.

There has been less actual business in our markets, London and Liverpool, the past week, than for several preceding.

Holders are firm and advancing their pretensions as they receive more certain accounts of American markets, and of prospects of future supply.

The Home trade have bought but little. Considerable inquiries are being made for South European descriptions.

Late advices from Australia show advancing prices for Twist and Cavendish, with stocks diminishing.

AN UNGRATEFUL SECESSIONIST.—The correspondent of the New York Times writes:—"The nearer we approach Richmond the more violent and bitter is the feeling exhibited towards the North. Dr. Gaines, the owner of the grounds upon which our camp is located, is the most unblushing, undaunted, and defiant rebel that we have yet encountered. His residence, surrounded by choice fruit and ornamental trees, with a magnificent flower-garden between it and the avenue, is one of the most attractive that can be found in the State. His lands extend over a large area, comprising hundreds of acres, and in his back and call he has nearly a hundred and fifty slaves. In his store-houses we found a large quantity of corn and wheat, which we appropriated to our own use. In payment the commissary tendered him a receipt, but he refused to accept it, declaring it was worthless paper, and he would not be encumbered with it. He was informed, by order of General Stoneman, that unless he took the receipt he need never expect to be recompensed by government for the property taken. He persisted in his refusal, and will justly lose the whole of his grain. Notwithstanding Dr. Gaines' rank secession proclivities, a strong guard has been stationed round all his property, and no one is allowed to injure it in the least. For this humane act the traitor is exceedingly ungrateful, and indulges in the most insulting expressions, not hesitating to proclaim that we are Vandals and vampires, and cherishes the hope that not a man of us will ever leave Virginia soil alive."—It is certainly curious that Dr. Gaines' should not be grateful for the invasion of his country, and the theft of his property.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

The following is an official copy of the report of the Court of Inquiry, which investigated the destruction of the steamer Virginia, (formerly the Merrimac):—

C. S. Navy Department.
Richmond, June 11, 1862.

The Court of Inquiry, convoked by the order of this Department of the 20th ult., whereof French Forrest, Captain in the Navy of the Confederate States, is President, and which Court convened at the city of Richmond on May 22, 1862, to investigate and inquire into the destruction of the steamer Virginia, and report the same, together with their opinion as to the necessity of destroying her, and particularly whether any, and what, other disposition could have been made of the vessel, have found as follows:—

The Court having heard the statement read, submitted by Flag Officer Tatnall, was cleared for deliberation, and, after mature consideration, adopted the following report:—

The Court, after a full and careful examination and investigation of the evidence connected with the destruction by fire of the C. S. steamer Virginia, on the morning of April 11, 1862, near Craney Island, respectfully report that it was effected by the order and under the supervision of Flag-Officer Tatnall, after her draft had been reduced to twenty feet six inches, and on the representations of the pilots, that in consequence of recent prevalent westerly winds, she could not be taken with a draft of eighteen feet as high as Westover, near Harrison's Bar, in James River (whither he designed to take her), which they previously stated they could do.

1. The destruction of the Virginia was, in the opinion of the Court, unnecessary at the time and place it was effected.

2. It being clearly in evidence that Norfolk being evacuated, and Flag-Officer Tatnall having been instructed to prevent the enemy from ascending James River, the Virginia, with very little more, if any, lessening of draft, after lightening her to twenty feet six inches aft, with her iron sheathing still extending three feet under water, could have been taken up to Hog Island, in James River (where the channel is narrow), and could there have prevented the larger vessels and transports of the enemy from ascending, the Court is of opinion that such disposition ought to have been made of her, and if it should be ascertained that her provisions could not be replenished when those on hand were exhausted, then the proper time would have arrived to take into consideration the expediency or practicability of striking a last blow at the enemy or destroying her.

In conclusion, the Court is of opinion that the evacuation of Norfolk, the destruction of the Navy Yard, and other public property, added to the hasty retreat of the military under General Huger, leaving the batteries unmanned and unprotected, no doubt conspired to produce, in the minds of the officers of the Virginia, the necessity of her destruction at the time, was, in their opinion, the only means left of preventing her from falling into the hands of the enemy, and seems to have precluded the consideration of the possibility of getting her up James River to the point or points indicated.

The Court of Inquiry, of which Captain F. Forrest is President, is hereby dissolved.

S. R. MALLORY, Secretary of Navy.

The British steamer Memphis, Captain Cruikshank, from Liverpool via Nassau (N. P.), arrived at Charleston on June 23. She had on board a most valuable cargo of British goods. The Memphis, had the misfortune, while coming into port, to get ashore on the beach at Sullivan's Island, where she remained several hours, but was finally towed off by the steamers Marion and Etiwien. When she first got aground she was approached by one of the blockaders, which fired into her six times a number of shells; most of them struck on Sullivan's Island, but none of them hit the ship. All her letters and papers were thrown overboard. The Federal gunboat was finally driven off by a rifled gun on Fort Beauregard, which discharged but one shot at her, when she retired. The Memphis made the passage from Liverpool to Nassau in sixteen days and a half, and was hoarded off Abaco by the Yankee steamer Quaker City. The Federal cruisers keep up quite a sharp blockade off Nassau, and board nearly all vessels bound in or going out. Mr. Ward, late Minister to China, and Major Bateman, were passengers in the Memphis.

The entire cotton crop of Arkansas, north of Arkansas River, is being destroyed. The cotton in Concordia parish, La., is entirely destroyed, and all in Tensas parish soon will be. These two parishes produce the heaviest crops of any in the State, that of Tensas having been over 70,000 bales.

PRIVATE LETTER.

Extract of a letter from New Orleans:—

NEW ORLEANS, June 21.

Yesterday only I received yours of the * * * Picayune Butler must, no doubt, have found them very interesting, since he kept them so long. The reason that I have not written to you sooner is, that the letters are opened and read before delivery. * * * I was pretty well through the State of Mississippi, and did some little travelling in Alabama. Make up your mind to one thing: in so far as Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Texas are concerned, every bale of cotton will be burned so soon as Northern forces appear; and if any man tries to save his cotton, his neighbours will burn it for him. The feeling is, "If we are not to have our own way, no money shall be made out of us by any one else."

Already, from the most reliable accounts, 1,000,000 of bales are burnt between here and Memphis—in short, all cotton along the river banks.

On Red River all is moved fifteen miles from the banks; and between the two are the Confederate forces, prepared to fight any Northern forces that land, and if beaten to burn the cotton. There is not the least use in trying to move any cotton at present. The country people would kill the man that tries to do it, and burn the cotton. And the case is the same with sugar, which is rising rapidly in price; there is no sugar coming in.

I consider the grown crop of cotton last year to have been 4,000,000 of bales. This year the corn and wheat planting is enormous, and there are so many small pigs about that one might think he was in Cincinnati. But of cotton in the region where I was the planting is but five acres where there was 100 last year—just enough to save seed and make "home-spun." This last article is very fashionable. The stock of cotton here, when New Orleans was taken, was nominally 11,000 bales; but I think 7000 or 8000 was about the mark, and this was all burnt except some few scattering lots. A good deal of sugar was rolled into the river along "the coast."

I am very much of the opinion that guerilla warfare will be resorted to by the Confederates, until the North gets tired of paying taxes and getting no cotton. The determination of the people in Mississippi is really awful; their idea, and that of the Texans, is about the same, viz., "Food is scarce, and prisoners troublesome; but dead men tell no tales."

From one of the towns I was at in Mississippi, six companies of 100 to 125 each had left; the total inhabitants were at most but 2500.

In regard to cotton getting to market this season, supposing peace made to-morrow, it could not be brought in any quantity, for the boats are all destroyed, burnt, or used up by the Confederate States' army authorities. The rolling stock on the railroads is much in the same condition, and the river, after being very high and overflowing the upper part of the city towards Carrollton, is now rapidly falling. * * *

If any of your Liverpool friends have received consignments of cotton or produce that have run the blockade, write to them on no account to send out account sales here, for Picayune Butler will open the letters, make the shippers here pay him the proceeds, and pocket them. He has done so in three cases already.

Of course every one who has no cotton is in favour of burning that of his neighbour who has any. Out of 30,000 bales which were ready and waiting to be shipped to one firm, 27,000 are burnt, and only 3000 remain.

The overflow above, has been greater (by report) than ever before known. River now falling fast.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, July 1, 1862.

SIR,—Mr. Chase manages to meet the large amount of dividends maturing to day, and which are payable in specie, by making use of the Federal reserve fund of $4,000,000, and what he has saved from the Customs' dues, the amount received from that source, having been about $11,000,000 in May and June, against $3,000,000 in the corresponding months of last year. The gold thus set afloat finds its way into the hands of the bullion dealers, and will supply the export demand for several weeks to come, unless, as has been intimated, the incorporated banks enter the market and become purchasers of the precious metals, in order to get rid of the United States' demand notes now held by them, preferring to make a loss of 10 to 12 per cent. than to risk the whole. These notes of the Federal Government must not be confounded with the Treasury notes bearing interest that the banks subscribed for last autumn, and which they have since disposed of. It is likely that the Government will prohibit the export of specie, in which case it will become more scarce than ever, as the hoarding will increase, these soulless moneyed institutions taking the lead in such a course. The foreign bankers are very much alarmed, and fear to create a panic, or they would be shipping more largely of gold; their principal sales of Bills of London are for the Cunard steamers that leave on Wednesday; with the proceeds of the same they buy specie, and thus the Imman vessels of Saturday take out the heaviest shipments of the precious metals. Selling foreign exchange has not been profitable recently, the premium having advanced so rapidly.

There are rumours of the defeat of McClellan before Richmond, but up to the time of writing no particulars have been received; should they prove true, the "bears" will again be in the ascendancy.

The recruiting for both the army and navy is at a stand-still. President Lincoln has "forged" a letter, getting the Governors and mock Governors of 18 States, and parts of States, to lend the use of their names, by telegraph, to be appended to it, urging him to call for 300,000 additional troops; he has the audacity to publish this as a true document, with his reply, but the trick is known to every one. No troops will be forthcoming; the labouring classes away from the cities are all occupied in agricultural pursuits, and will be so engaged until October; while the mechanics in the large towns are busily employed in making material of war. The truth is, that the rich people, or those who were wealthy, have suffered most by this war, and now that taxation is being added on to loss and depreciation, it may well be said that the conflict has acted as a perfect leveller.

[Though, owing to unavoidable delays in the transmission, no letter from our Washington correspondent has reached us since the great battle before Richmond, the subjoined, written before that event, has not lost its interest.]

WASHINGTON, June 23, 1862.

I look with considerable curiosity for the next three or four steamers. The news which would reach Europe during this month must have an influence, at least, to produce new opinions. The certainty that any expectation of receiving cotton may be abandoned, cannot fail to be an important fact, and the conviction will also grow upon the foreign mind, that the war is no nearer to a settlement than at any previous time. The effect that may be produced by these conclusions I cannot foresee, except that it will surely advance the price of cotton to a very high figure. The political effects are in the keeping of the rulers of England and France, and what they may feel disposed to do, it is impossible to know.

From present indications, this steamer will convey you no important military events. As I have heretofore advised you, General McClellan is at work entrenching himself in his camp, so as to be protected from any attack by the Confederates, whilst he progresses with his plan of siege, gradually working away with parallel after parallel until he hopes to get near enough to command the city and its defences with his heavy siege guns. The Confederates, however, are not disposed to permit him to proceed unmolested with this work, but are now constantly sending out skirmishing parties, and at the same time shelling his works from their artillery. General McClellan's army has been greatly weakened by sickness and casualties; and it is now generally admitted to be so far reduced as to be quite incompetent to the task of taking the city of Richmond by assault. The brilliant movements of Jackson in the Valley of Shenandoah have entirely crippled all the forces in that direction. Originally the plan of the campaign was, undoubtedly, for McDowell, with his corps, to march down from Fredericksburg, while Banks and Fremont should come in with their armies from the South West, and all uniting with McClellan, entirely surround the city. Banks was driven across the Potomac, and his army scattered; and to regain the valley, McDowell's army at Fredericksburg was broken up, a portion sent to McClellan, the balance to Fremont, who was recalled from his position in Western Virginia. Fremont then, being reinforced by McDowell's men, moved rapidly up the valley, Jackson retreating until the latter, having got into a good position, fought two battles, one at Fort Republic and one at Cross Keys, resulting not only in the defeat of the Federals at both places, but all that portion of Fremont's army which was under Shields was entirely demoralized and scattered, its stragglers being all over the country; whilst Fremont with his main body, was forced to retreat to Mount Jackson, at which place he is now resting his men. Thus McClellan has been entirely deprived of the assistance of these three corps of McDowell, Banks, and Fremont (the original strength of which was not less than 120,000 men), with the exception of about 25,000, which was sent to him when McDowell's force was divided at Fredericksburg. The strategy of the campaign has been entirely overthrown, and McClellan now finds himself in front of Richmond with a force of about 100,000 men, in presence of an army of at least equal numbers, who also possess strong fortifications. Hence his necessary delay; and in the meantime he is again trying to reach the city by the way of the river, another attack having been made on Fort Darling on the 17th inst., which was repulsed, but the particulars of which, as well as the action itself, seem to have been carefully suppressed. His next movement may probably be in the direction of this fort. He may determine to capture it so as to ensure the passage of the gunboats. He cannot pass these obstructions whilst this fort is in possession of the Confederates, and he may conclude that he cannot take the city until he can push up the gunboats; so he may make a movement in that direction. I think there is strong probability that Beauregard is now in Richmond, but whether any portion of his army has been brought up is, of course, unknown. His presence, however, will be in itself a valuable acquisition to the Confederates, even without a portion of his army, but I would not be surprised if some few thousands of his best men had gone there with him. The critical condition of things with the Federal army is universally acknowledged, and the newspapers are all talking very plainly of the mismanagement of the campaign, but all calling upon the Government to call out at once 200,000 additional men. I am told that the Government is endeavouring to get as many men as they can, and on Saturday an order was issued from the War Department offering additional and special inducements for recruits; but it is very palpable that the spirit which raised the army of 70,000 men at the outset of the war does not now exist. The recruits that are now obtained are mainly of the character of the material that forms the rank and file of the regular service. There are plausible reasons for this condition of things. That the present position of affairs in Virginia, and the financial necessities of the Government, now give great concern to the Administration may readily be granted.

There does not appear to be any active movements in progress outside of Virginia, except on the islands near Charleston, where there has been, latterly, some fighting without any definite result. The time must soon be near when the Federal troops will be compelled to abandon these islands; the weather is already very hot, and considerable sickness among them; but the regular sickly season does not begin until July. I cannot believe that it is the design of the Federal commanders to retain their force in this exposed situation—and with all the certainty of the disastrous consequences—much longer. Halleck's army has been divided, and portions of it are occupying districts in Tennessee and North Alabama. We hear nothing further from Vicksburg; it is, therefore, yet in possession of the Confederates.

I have seen some persons from the South, who left there but a short time since. They all confirm the fact that there has not been any cotton planted beyond what is necessary to make seed. I do not now, therefore, entertain any doubt as to the omission of the crop of 1862; and from the reports of these parties, I am also satisfied that about half a million of bales have been destroyed of the last crop. They further confirm what I had previously written to you, that there might be some cotton obtained from planters who would sell a few bales to get necessary supplies.

As to the determination of the people to maintain the contest, these parties said there was no doubt, and herein also agreed with my former information, that the people were really more determined than the leaders. At the same time, the deficiencies of the various articles of a vital and important character were quite as great as I have informed you. Salt sold at one time in Memphis for $1 per lb. Powder is worth $4 per lb.

There appears to be at Memphis a stronger reaction in favour of the Union than at any other place that has been yet occupied; but I am told that the Union sentiment is mainly confined to the foreign and Northern element of the population, which constitutes a great portion of the citizens.

We have also one week later news from New Orleans, but I hear of nothing of especial interest. Doctor Stone had been released from prison. James Robb, formerly the New Orleans banker, and at one time the partner of young Nallett, in New York—under name of Robb, Nallett, and Co.—has been appointed Military Governor of the city. It is said that Butler is now endeavouring to be more conciliatory in his action with the people. Several New Orleans parties have recently arrived here and in New York, but they are generally very circumspect and cautious in their remarks as to the condition of things in the city. It is pretty clear, however, that no progress has yet been made in changing the popular sentiment. That a general determination exists to make no purchases of Northerners or of Northern goods is very evident, except in cases where there is no alternative. I find that people who live at the North, and own real estate in New Orleans, are determining to move out there, as, I suppose, they fear that non-residents will not be able to find tenants for their stores.

The gallantry of the 3rd Alabama in the Battle of Fair Oaks is the theme of all the Confederate army. They are said to have covered themselves with glory. The Confederate loss in the Battle of Fair Oaks is said not to have been all told of killed, wounded, and missing, over 2500. This is much less than I had supposed.

A writer in the New York World states that he has undoubted information that the casualties in McClellan's army, since his landing at Yorktown, have been upwards of 25,000 men.

The shipment of specie on Saturday reached the large amount of $2,346,000, and the total shipment of the week is placed at upwards of $3,000,000. A few such weeks will make a decided mark upon our specie reserve—and it is mainly caused by the return of our securities from abroad, which are being sold, and the proceeds returned in gold. Exchange remains about the same, 117½ to 118; gold, 6½ to 6¾. Nothing further has been done by Congress with reference to financial measures, but I think the privilege of issuing $150,000,000 more of demand notes will be granted.

Since writing the foregoing portions of my letter, I have seen several letters from New Orleans, by the Roanoke (15th inst.) from business people, as well as some on private affairs, and the tenor of them corroborates all that I have written on this subject. There is yet some sugar on the plantations, but it cannot be got to market for want of boats, and nothing will be done until boats can come down the Mississippi River, which they cannot do at present. The private letters all speak of the unflinching determination of the majority of the people to adhere to the Southern Confederacy. Those who have shown any willingness to return to the Union are mainly foreigners.

The decision of Butler that the banks must pay all their depositors in their own notes will ruin all the banks. The currency now at New Orleans consists of the issues of the banks, which are not redeemable in anything.

No doubt very full letters will go over to Europe from New Orleans by this steamer, which will give even more detailed accounts of the position of affairs than those that are sent North.

PARIS, July 15, 1862.

While, for fear of doing a gross injustice to the well-deserved reputation of the English people for universal information, I do not feel at liberty to admit the correctness of Mr. John C. Cowell's proposition which purports to plead ignorance of the character of the Southern relations, and of their constant readiness to ship, at all times, their produce to England, Southern hearts, overflowing with gratitude, can but tender their most cordial thanks to the English people for their sentiments of admiration, love, and pity, which they reciprocate to the fullest extent. And it is natural it should be so, for their sufferings are common, and proceed from the same causes. But, if the South entertains warm and brotherly feelings for the English people at large, as a nation, it deeply resents the unjust treatment it has received at the hands of the English Government, or rather of Earl Russell; and nothing can more clearly justify this resentment than the language of Mr. John C. Cowell: "Admiration, love, and pity for the Confederates are spreading among us like a contagion, as do hatred and contempt for the brutal and hypocritical barbarians who are laying waste their homesteads, murdering their men, and insulting their women." And yet the British Cabinet, alone hermetically closing their hearts to this contagion, will disregard public opinion and persist, against all Parliamentary rules, in refusing to the admired and the loved of England a recognition to which every principle of justice, of humanity, and of international law entitles them to.

But why should the South be pitied? Is it because, true to the high dictates of loyalty and honour, she has always firmly stood by England, and averted from her, by unflinching energy, the blows which the unprincipled politicians of the North have constantly aimed at her? Is the South to be pitied because, in the Oregon, Maine, and San Juan questions, it forced the dishonest Seward's clique to respect the rights guaranteed to England by virtue of the existing treaties? Is it because her sons are nobly fighting against a horde of barbarians, to maintain the integrity of their sovereignty? Is the South to be pitied because alone she has the manly courage to resist the brutal fury of the Northerners, whilst all the nations of earth seem tamely to submit to the monstrous impertinence of the United States, and to their insulting pretension of dictating their laws to the world? No; the South need not be pitied. Let the worst befall her; let her even die in her attempt to free humanity from the brutality and commercial rapacity of her adversaries; even then the South will want no pity, for while her death would be a glorious one, it would enshroud the escutcheon of other nations with an eternal reproach.

Be this as it may, the news brought from America by the last steamer seems to have opened the eyes of England. The warlike manner with which the remonstrances of Lord Palmerston against the infamous proclamation of the more infamous Butler, were universally received, the insolent declamations which they provoked, the blockading tariff of the Northern ports voted by Congress, must have powerfully contributed to propagate the contagion spoken of by your London correspondent. Indeed, unless England chooses to deny truth, and remain in a wilful blindness, she must now be satisfied, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that if the South is not her best friend, the North is certainly her worst and most bitter enemy. England must now understand that the forbearance of her Government towards the Yankees has but encouraged and fostered their spirit of aggression and roused it to such an extent that it has become now almost an impossibility for her to avoid a collision with her Northern friends.

The answer of General Butler to the Consuls of New Orleans, the oath required by him from the foreigners residing in that city, and the approval of the Juarez-Corwin treaty demanded from the Senate by Mr. Lincoln, are considered here as so many acts of hostility towards France, and the Government have most undoubtedly put the same construction upon them, for in addition to the already numerous fleet plying in American waters, and independently of the transport ships preparing to take the French troops to Mexico, eleven steamships of the line are now arming to proceed forthwith to the Gulf.

It is currently reported about town that the Government have received despatches from Washington giving full account of the battle which took place before Richmond. If credence is to be given to their pretended purport, the battle should have lasted during four consecutive days, beginning on the 25th, and ending on the 29th of June, in the defeat of the Federals who, to avoid complete destruction, had to retreat towards James River, there to place themselves under shelter of their gunboats. It is further stated, always alluding to the same despatches, that upon the advice of General Scott, the Government of the United States had ordered the withdrawal of the Federal army from the Virginia Peninsula, to reassume his (Scott's) original plan of campaign; i.e., to march upon Richmond by way of the Shenandoah Valley, and the plains of Manassas.

The above rumours were not mere speculations if we construe the Northern telegrams received yesterday in their proper light. The precarious position of McClellan's army means, of course, that it is annihilated; that part of the programme relative to its withdrawal will have, therefore, to be given up. As to the other part, the Federal Government will have to wait for the organization of the 300,000 raw recruits just called by Mr. Lincoln, before they can be marched through the valley where, in all probability, they are to meet with the same ominous fate.

In the meantime the Northern Cabinet and General McClellan and his Royal Aid-de-camps have become the laughing stock of the Parisians, who are well known to be as prompt to extol the merit of successful generals as ever ready to turn into ridicule the military pretensions of blundering captains. Poor McClellan! he was proclaimed a Napoleon by his countrymen, even before he had proved himself to be a general. The fortunes of war have fully justified the expectation of his friends. Indeed, they can now claim that there exists some sort of resemblance between their favourite and the great military genius who kept Europe trembling for a quarter of a century, for he began like Napoleon finished, by a Waterloo—sic transit gloria mundi.

The new call made by the Autocrat Lincoln for 300,000 men is here considered as an official acknowledgment of the utter impossibility to subjugate the South, and a conclusive proof that the Government and people are labouring under the fatal influence of a delirium furiosum. It is to be hoped that the English Government, sharing that opinion, will take advantage of this Federal disaster to demand, jointly with France, the restoration of peace in North America, for never will there be a better chance for these two Powers to be heard than that of a forced armistice imposed upon the North by a glorious Confederate victory.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I am informed, by the most undoubted authority, that the Corwin-Juarez treaty had been partially executed before the presentation to the Senate for confirmation. I am assured that $2,000,000 has actually been paid to the Mexican Government by the United States a few days after the treaty had been received at Washington.

(From another Correspondent.)

PARIS, July 15, 1862.

The newspapers which are alleged to possess the state secrets announced yesterday that France and Russia have finally come to a perfect understanding with regard to the question concerning Italy, Denmark, and Constantinople; which fact implies a quasi-alliance between the Cabinets of St. Petersburg and Paris. Some papers even go so far as to say that the very stipulations of a Franco-Italo-Russian treaty have already been agreed upon, and will be signed next October by these three Powers at the Castle of Brühl, where the Emperor Napoleon and the Emperor of Russia are to have an interview under the royal auspices of the King of Prussia.

On the other hand, it is reported that, with the view of guarding against all eventualities possibly to arise from this treaty, England, Austria, and Constantinople have conjointly sent to M. Thouvenel a note, declaring that their respective policy should be entirely governed by the Treaty of Paris of 1856.

Two opposed camps seem thus to be organized, their policy clearly defined, their intentions mutually known, and thus the matter is likely to stand until some new unforeseen events come to scatter to the winds these deeply-matured plans. It is folly, even for the Governments now-a-days, to enter into schemes that are to be realized at any future day. It is sufficient to examine the internal situation of each of the six Powers now engaged in this sort of champ clos to nurse the conviction that none are sure of their morrow.

The capital of Russia, but a few days ago, came very near being the prey to the flames lighted by political incendiaries, her serfs are getting impatient, and Poland shoots at her Russian Vice-King.

In France, the tribunals are now engaged in the trial of the "Fifty-four," as it is called here, or, more properly, of a political secret association which aims at nothing less than to do away with the Emperor and his entourage.

Constantinople is like a mummy which looks firm and solid as long as it remains enshrouded in its bandages, but tumbles into ashes at the slightest touch of the hand.

Austria can hardly be considered better off than the United States. Their financial condition is about on a par, and the Unionist feelings of Hungary, Venetia, and Servia, are very vivid.

And, lastly, England will probably have more work to attend to at home, when next winter sets in, than will be agreeable to her, or permit her to attend much to European politics.

What, then, do all these diplomatic movements amount to?—To child's play, and nothing else; for all these Governments must know that a European war, in the midst of the forthcoming sufferings about being brought upon the people by the interruption of commerce which was the fountain source of their daily support, may well originate between kings and dynasties, but might eventually terminate by a war of the people against the crowned heads of Europe.

In the meantime the Emperor has gone to Vichy to repair his health, which, by-the-bye, was never more flourishing, and the Empress has returned to St. Cloud. She came to Paris last Sunday, and visited the new Hotel de la Paix. Her Majesty is said to have been amazed at the luxury which has been displayed in the parlours and reception-rooms of this new establishment; of which I will give you a full description next week.

Monsieur le Duke de Morny enjoys, for the present, the sweets of his new title at his royal country seat of Auvergne, and the Prince Napoleon lovingly attends his charming wife, Princess Clothilde.

The friends and adherents of the Count de Chambord announce his visit to the London Exhibition.

M. Troplong, the President of the Senate, is spoken of as being one of the most prominent candidates for the seat of the French Academy left vacant by the death of the Duke Pasquier.

The news just brought in by the Quebec steamer, to the effect that McClellan's army had been forced to fall back a distance of seventeen miles from Richmond, on James River, and cut off from all communications, except by that river, has been received in Paris with a universal sentiment of delight. This Confederate victory is regarded as a just retribution for the infamous proclamation of Butler, and already are the rumours spreading that the Government thinks the moment arrived to interfere and request the settlement of the American difficulties.

GENERAL HALLECK'S DESPATCHES AND GENERAL POPE'S CAPTURES.

We did not, from the first, hesitate to pronounce the despatches of General Halleck in reference to the evacuation of Corinth, and the capture "of 10,000 prisoners and 15,000 stand of arms," pure fabrications. On June 19 we observed, "General Halleck is not a great commander, but it would be unfair to deny that he has a very glowing imagination;" and "we may be sure the prisoners captured in General Halleck's despatches will not diminish the effective force of the Confederates." The official report turns out to be completely false. As was justly remarked in the Times' leader of Monday,

We have henceforward just the same trust in the veracity of General Pope as Prince Hal had in that of Sir John Falstaff. General Pope turns out to be the Sir John Falstaff of the Yankee army. He took 10,000 "men in buckram" from General Beauregard, and multitudes of arms and knapsacks. But General Pope is infallible only in the well-censored American press. It is now proved that he has simply written a false despatch.

We copy from the Mobile Register the following letter written by General Beauregard, in answer to General Halleck's despatch:—

Headquarters, Western Department, June 17.

Gentlemen.—My attention has just been called to the following despatch (published in your issue of yesterday) of Major General Halleck, commanding the enemy's forces, which, coming from such a source, is most remarkable in one respect—that it contains as many misrepresentations as lines:—

"To the Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War,

"General Halleck's Headquarters, June 4, 1862. "General Pope, with 40,000 men, is thirty miles south of Corinth, pushing the enemy hard. He already reports 10,000 prisoners and deserters from the enemy, and 15,000 stand of arms captured.

"Thousands of the enemy are throwing away their arms. A farmer says that when Beauregard learned that Colonel Elliot had cut the railroad on his line of retreat he became frantic, and told his men to save themselves the best way they could.

"We have captured nine locomotives and a number of cars. One of the former is already repaired and is running to-day. Several more will be in running order in two or three days. The result is all I could possibly desire.

"H. W. HALLECK, Major-General Commanding."

General Pope did not "push hard" upon me with 40,000 men thirty miles from Corinth, on the 4th inst., for my troops occupied a defensive line in the rear of "Twenty Mile Creek," less than twenty-five miles from Corinth, until the 8th inst., when the want of good water induced me to retire at my leisure to a better position. Moreover, if General Pope had attempted, at any time during the retreat from Corinth, to push hard upon me, I would have given him such a lesson as would have checked his ardour; but he was careful to advance on after my troops had retired from each successive position.

The retreat was conducted with great order and precision, doing much credit to the officers and men under my orders, and must be looked upon in every respect by the country as equivalent to a brilliant victory.

General Pope must certainly have dreamed of having taken 10,000 prisoners and 15,000 stand of arms; for we positively never lost them. About 100 or 200 stragglers would probably cover all the prisoners he took, and about 500 damaged muskets is all the arms he got. These belonged to a convalescent camp, four miles south of Corinth, evacuated during the night, and were overlooked on account of the darkness. The actual number of prisoners taken during the retreat was about equal on both sides, and they were but few.

"Major-General Halleck must be a very credulous man, indeed, to believe the absurd story of 'that farmer.' He ought to know that the turning of two or more cars on a railroad is not sufficient to make 'Beauregard frantic' and ridiculous, especially when I expected every moment to hear of the capture of his marauding party, whose departure from Farmington had been communicated to me the day before, and I had given, in consequence, all necessary orders; but a part of my forces passed Boonville an hour before the arrival of Colonel Elliott's command, and the other part arrived just in time to drive it away and liberate the convalescents captured; unfortunately, however, not in time to save four of the sick, who were barbarously consumed in the station-house. Let Colonel Elliott's name descend to infamy as the author of such a revolting deed. General Halleck did not capture nine locomotives. It was only by the accidental destruction of a bridge before some trains had passed that he got seven engines in a damaged condition, the cars having been burned by my orders.

It is, indeed, lamentable to see how little our enemy respect truth and justice when speaking of their military operations; especially when, through inability or over confidence, they meet with deserved failure.

If the result be all he desired, it can be said he is easily satisfied; it remains to be seen whether his Government and people will be of the like opinion.

I attest that all we lost at Corinth and during the retreat would not amount to one day's expense of his army.

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

A NORTHERN ACCOUNT OF THE LATE BATTLE.

The New York Times of the 3rd inst., gives the following survey of the news:—"We have at last full reports of the recent movements in front of Richmond. We are sorry to say that they do not sustain fully the encouraging interpretation which the public sought to put upon the brief announcement, that our right wing had been attacked and had withdrawn to the other side of the Chickahominy. We have now no room to doubt that our army has met with a very serious reverse, and that it is in a condition of peril which, if not imminent, at least calls for the instant and energetic efforts of the Government and the country. Two of the regular corps of the New York Times reporters left General McClellan's head-quarters, which are now on the James River, on Monday afternoon, and reached this city last night. They were spectators of the events which they describe, and although their reports of necessity are written in haste, and may therefore err in matters of detail, there is no reason whatever to doubt the entire accuracy of the narrative they give of the principal movements of the opposing forces. It seems from their statement that the right wing of our army, numbering about 20,000 men, was attacked on Friday by an overwhelming rebel force of 50,000 men; and that after a hot and protracted fight, sustained with gallantry by our troops, they effected their retreat across the Chickahominy. This leading fact was known before; but it now appears that they did not wait to destroy the bridges across the swamp so effectually as to prevent the rebels' passage; that our forces on the left, for some reason or other, did not dispute the passage, although they had planted batteries for the purpose of doing so, but decided to abandon their position; and that accordingly on Saturday and Sunday the whole left wing, comprising the main body of the army, under Heintzelmann, Keys, and Sumner, fell back along the whole line of the railroad and the Williamsburg-road, turned the foot of the White Oak Swamps, which approaches the Chickahominy, and marched to James River, a distance of ten or fifteen miles. The rebels, after crossing the Chickahominy, in the immediate neighbourhood of what had been General McClellan's head-quarters, paused on reaching the railroad, and made no further pursuit. They remained, however, in possession of the ground held by our troops on both sides of the Chickahominy, including the bridges and earthworks we had erected against their approach in front. Our whole army, therefore, now lies upon the James River, at a point called Turkey Bend, within reach and under cover of our gunboats.

THE UNITED STATES TREATY WITH MEXICO.—The subject of this treaty affords the Federal press a splendid text for insulting the French nation. The New York Herald, in one of its leaders on Mexico, observes:—"We should not hesitate about giving her the financial aid she needs, so as to strengthen her hands for more desperate resistance to her invaders. That the Mexican people are determined to maintain their national rights and to defend their independence may be seen in the unflinching bravery with which they met the French, and so signally defeated them, at the late battle of Puebla. All they require now are means for recuperating their strength and solidifying their army, and then, with their own strong arms, they will be enabled to drive the French invader from their soil and into the sea.

FOREIGN CONSULS IN NEW ORLEANS.

As a specimen of General Butler's literary style, and the manner in which he insults foreigners through the columns of his journal, the New Orleans Delta, we furnish our readers with an editorial that appeared in that paper on June 18. The composition has the genteel title of "Dry Up, Consuls!"—

The Major-General of this Department has made the word 'Consul' rank. He has stripped these pretentious fellows, and exhibited them to public gaze. He has done this 'one, two, three times,' and, strange to say, such is the thirst for notoriety among the Consuls, they insist upon their nude condition all the time. If General Butler rides up Canal-street, the Consuls are sure to come in a body and 'protest' that he did not ride down. If he smokes a pipe in the morning, he is sure to have a deputation in the evening, asking why he did not smoke a cigar. If he drinks coffee, they will send some rude messenger with a note, asking, in the name of some tottering dynasty, why he did not drink tea. Foremost among these foreign flies, who have been perching on the General's brow, is the creature who pretends to be the British Consul. It seems to us that that person is sufficiently embalmed. It seems to us that he should dry up. He is the subject of universal laughter in New Orleans. The fellows who follow after him, and sign his letters, are objects of pity simply; but the 'Acting' British Consul is the sport of beer-shops and shady sidewalks.

The following "General Order," has been issued, in which it is announced that Southern soldiers who do not come forward and take an oath prescribed by General Butler will be treated as spies!—

Headquarters Military Commandant,
New Orleans, June 14, 1862.

General Orders No. 13.

All officers and soldiers now in service in the army of the so-called Confederate States, who are citizens of New Orleans, and who desire to return, are hereby permitted to do so upon the following conditions:

Upon their arrival within the lines of the army of the United States, they shall immediately report their names and rank in the service to the officer in command.

They will then register their names, rank, and residences, and take and subscribe the following oath:—

I,, late (or now), a in the Confederate army, do solemnly swear that I will not take up arms against the United States, and will not furnish any information, or afford any aid or comfort, to the enemies or opposers of the United States, until I am regularly exchanged or released from this my parole.

All officers and soldiers now in the city who have served in the Confederate army are required immediately upon the publication of this order, to register their names and residences at the office of the Military Commandant, in the Custom House.

Those who have not already been released on their parole will take and subscribe the oath aforesaid.

Officers and soldiers in the service of the Confederate army who have not given their parole, and who do not within three days from the publication of this order, if now in New Orleans, and within one day after their arrival in New Orleans if they came after the publication of this order, comply therewith, will be liable to be treated as spies.

Any violation of this parole will be punished as provided in the articles of war, and according to the law and usage of nations.

By order of Acting-Brigadier-General G. F. SHEPLEY.

Military Commandant of New Orleans.

EDWIN LLSLEY, A. A. G.

THE MURDER OF MR. MUMFORD.—The Boston Courier thus criticises the transaction:—"When General Dix uttered the exhortation to shoot upon the spot whatever person should attempt to pull down the flag, it was accepted as a popular expression of patriotic feeling, and, no doubt, most persons felt that such an outrage, under circumstances of actual indignity, might justify the taking of life. Still, the imagination would only conceive of such a summary deed as done in hot blood, and in such case that the pulling down the flag was likely to be the precursor of other rebellious conduct, and the immediate incitement to it. In the midst of violence, adequate vindication of the honour of the flag might render the most extreme act of violence necessary. We cannot but regard this as a very different case from that of which the papers of New Orleans have just given us an account. As we read the relation, it makes the same impression almost as any absolutely incredible statement would. It seems that upon taking possession of the city, the United States' flag was hoisted upon the Custom House, and at some ungarded moment the crowd hauled it down, among whom was a man named Mumford, who was probably a principal actor in the transaction. Mumford, who, we see, was a North Carolinian, and apparently not a very reputable character, was arrested, and having been tried by a court-martial, was sentenced to death for his offence. That such a sentence for such an offence would be carried into effect in cold blood we imagine very few could consider possible. The case is totally different from that conceived of by General Dix. New Orleans is completely in the power of the United States' forces, the flag floats freely wherever it is flung out, and no injurious consequences having flowed, or being likely to flow, from Mumford's act, actually to carry the sentence of the court-martial into execution seems to us one of the most extraordinary acts of this most extraordinary war. If he had been instantly shot, it might have admitted of some palliation, on the plea that it would strike terror into the hearts of the tumultuous and rebellious citizens; after this lapse of time we can only look upon the deed as not only needless and cruel, but as indiscreet in the highest degree, and likely to produce the most injurious effects. If the man had been sent to jail, or subjected to any infamous punishment, of proper duration, it would have been all very right—but a sentence of death carried into effect is, we believe, totally unprecedented in a civilized country, and in modern times, under such circumstances."

A letter in the Moniteur says:—

The battle before Richmond is looked upon as a complete defeat for the Federal troops. The most devoted partisans of the North admit that the reverse is of the most serious character, not only for the position of General McClellan, but also for the Northern cause. Within the space of one week here are two great battles, both lost by the North. Under these circumstances it is hoped that the partisans of an arrangement will be emboldened to raise their voice."

The Northern press is not quite contented with the state of affairs, though it still revels in the glorious strategy evinced by the defeat and retreat of General McClellan's army. The New York World thus writes in an editorial:—

The military situation at the West is not what it should be. General Curtis is retreating, with a prospect that he will lose his army, and leave Missouri undefended. General Mitchell is retiring before rebels in Tennessee, and General Morgan is marching in the opposite direction from Knoxville. Rebel armies are turning up in every direction, and our forces are nowhere as strong as they should be.

The following is the new form of oath for foreigners, prescribed by General Butler:—

I,, solemnly swear that I will, to the best of my ability, support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. So help me God.

DEMORALIZATION OF A BATAILLON.—The Winchester Va., correspondent of the New York Tribune writes as follows, under date of 19th instant:—"Blenker, with his staff, arrived here to-day, en route for Washington; the General, I am informed, having been relieved of his command, which is completely demoralized. Under the able management and controlling influence of General Carl Schurz, the men may be brought back to a sense of propriety and decency. Blenker is a medium-sized, restless, overbearing sort of man, extremely rude and boisterous. Himself and staff stopped here a night; and every time they moved about the hotel, the clank, clank, clank of their swords on the floor or over the stairways disturbed the rest of the guests. The brief space allotted me would not allow anything like a recital of the barbarities and butcheries of Blenker's men, and even, should I recount a half-dozen or so, they would scarcely be credited. While on marches everybody and everything suffered; tongues were cut out of cattle, and the poor animals left to suffer, and perhaps die; as many as fifteen sheep and lambs were sometimes stolen in a day, and slaughtered; articles of no value whatever to the soldiers were carried off and destroyed, &c. From the highest officer in the command to the lowest the demoralization was complete. Matters finally arrived at such a pass that officers in the division tendered their resignations in order to escape the odium which the conduct of Blenker's men threw upon them. General Fremont eventually ordered an investigation, and it is said, but with what truth I do not know, that during the examination of some men Blenker became very insolent, upon which Fremont took off his (Blenker's) shoulder-straps and broke in two his sword. After his arduous whiskey campaign, General Blenker will probably be allowed a long rest."

EUROPE DEFIED.—The New York Herald, in the course of an editorial on the Federal iron-clad navy, observes:—"Our fleet of nine sea-going monitors will all be ready next fall. Early in August we may expect to witness in our bay the trial trips of several of them. Including the new ironclads, Whitney's iron boat, the large shot-proof iron vessel building at the Morgan Works, and the Roanoke, with her three turrets and heavy deck and side armour, thirteen iron-clad vessels will be added to those already afloat, without counting the iron-clads now building on the Western rivers. Europe will view with astonishment this prodigious display of energy and mechanical resources. It was supposed that our power would be taxed to the utmost in arming and sustaining an army of 700,000 men, in addition to the cost of maintaining our active fighting vessels and enormous blockading fleets. Yet, while thus vigorously carrying on the greatest war ever known, we have created an impregnable fleet of nearly 400 vessels of all kinds, and 130,000 seamen, that will enable us to defy all opponents. Our commerce, manufactures, and resources are more than double those of England when she carried on a war of fifteen years with Napoleon and came out victorious at last. The rebels are growing weaker every day; the Union feeling is spreading, and we will be ready to defy all the maritime Powers of Europe combined in less than two months. Napoleon, in Mexico, may then look out."

PRESIDENTIAL DIGNITY.—In passing through Jersey city, on his return from visiting General Scott, the mob invited Mr. Lincoln to address them, which he did in the following terms:—"My Warm Union-loving Friends of New Jersey,—It is not the first time I have been honoured with your cordial welcome in this very place; and I have only to warmly thank you for your present recognition of me, although I had hoped that I should have passed unnoticed. (Loud cheers.) I admire not only your generosity as citizens, and your strong attachment to the Union, but I also notice with much pleasure the gallantry and daring bravery of your noble troops on the battle-field, both officers and men. (Great applause.) When animals and birds are viewed through a fog they cannot be seen to advantage. You may all feel anxious to know about my flying visit to West Point to see General Scott; but I am sure you will feel satisfied when I tell you that it was not to make or unmake any generals now in the army. (Great cheering.) The Secretary of War has put an injunction on the press, lest it might tell more than is requisite, and if I were to give you too much information he might hear a tight rein on myself. (Great laughter and cheers.) My time is necessarily limited, and as I see the cars in readiness I hope you will permit me to conclude for the present by again thanking you for the reception I have received in your city." (Bursts of applause.)

The New York papers give a glowing report of a lecture on Secession by Parson Brownlow, in which occurs this elegant passage, and which, we are told, was vociferously applauded by a fashionable audience:—"At this point Brownlow exclaimed to persons in the aisles, 'Gentlemen, come upon the stage. Here are seats for you. I will not contaminate your skirts with Secession. Bring the ladies also with you if they are on the side of the Union.' (Laughter, and cries of 'Good egg.' 'Go it, Parson.') He continued:—'Don't introduce a Secession woman, for a Secession woman South has more devils than Mary Magdalene had. (Laughter and applause. The crowd in the aisles mounted to the stage, among them several members of Congress.) As I was saying, I occasionally delivered short sermons. (A voice:—'What church do you belong to?') The miserable Methodist church South, that's going hellwards—(laughter and applause)—but when I return I intend to set up my own church in East Tennessee."

The Philadelphia Ledger notes a remarkable instance of Northern despotism and lawlessness. It says, "Wm. H. Cowan Esq., was arrested in Baltimore lately by the Provost Marshal and, by order of General Dix, was sent to Fort McHenry. His arrest is said to have been ordered in consequence of language used while defending a prisoner on trial at the Criminal Court."

The following remarks upon the prospects of mediation, the hatred of the English in the Northern States, and the desire to bring on a war with this country, appeared in the Times' City Article on Tuesday:—

Although in some quarters the last news from America has awakened hopes of the possibility of a settlement being arranged through the mediation of France and England, or by these two Powers in conjunction with Russia, or by Russia singly, the feeling on the point among those who have watched the whole course of the war is far from sanguine. It is seen that there is reason to apprehend that, if a talk of mediation should be permitted by the Government, it will be merely for the purpose of coveting their inaction during the season of deadly heat, and while they are recruiting the 300,000 additional men now demanded, and that, as soon as strength had in some degree been recovered, the mediators might find their labours closed by some transparent pretext, if not by open insult. According to the present advices, the rage against England, consequent upon the loathing expressed against General Butler, had reached a point of insanity; and it is also apparent that in several quarters the idea was again current that it would be a good plan to force on a quarrel with this country, and to attribute to it the necessity for abandoning the war against the South. In the shops at Boston placards are exhibited with the announcement "No English merchandise sold here;" and in Philadelphia, for the sake of patriotism, many persons inflict upon the ladies of their family the compulsion not to wear anything of British manufacture.

GENERAL BUTLER's general order as to the administration of the oath of allegiance to residents of New Orleans, contains this clause:—

It is further ordered, That all persons ever heretofore citizens of the United States, asking or receiving any favour, protection, privilege, passport, or to have money paid to them, property, or other valuable things whatever delivered to them, or any benefit of the power of the United States extended to them, except protection from personal violence, must take and subscribe the oath above specified, before their request can be heard, or any act done in their favour by any officer of the United States, within this department. And for this purpose all persons shall be deemed to have been citizens of the United States, who shall have been resident therein for the space of five years and upwards, and if foreign born, shall not have claimed and received a protection of their Government, duly signed and registered by the proper officer more than sixty days previous to the publication of this order.

In reference to the defence of Mobile, the Mobile Advertiser says:—

The people of Alabama are vigorously prosecuting works for the defence of the Alabama river, in case the enemy shall take Mobile, which, however, General Forney, with the concurrence of its citizens, says he will defend to the last extremity. The marshy nature of the country between Mobile and the coast, and the shallowness of the water in all the channels approaching the city, are said to render its defences more feasible than, perhaps, any other of our seacoast cities, and there is said to be a reasonable prospect of successful defence.

The following advertisement appears in the Delta:—

New Orleans, June 11, 1862.

Mr. Editor,—Seeing my name published as a member of the Executive Committee of the Union Association of New Orleans, I beg, as an act of justice and historical truth, that you will state that there is no authority for such use of my name; that I am not a member of said association.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS ACKLEY WATSON.

The Federals have grown so sensitive that they cannot tolerate the slightest mark of respect even from children; witness the order of the military commandant of Norfolk:—

Office of Military Governor.

Norfolk, Va., June 28, 1862.

Assemblages in the streets for the purposes of political discussions, being provocative of civil disturbances, are positively forbidden, and the exhibition of badges and flags indicative of disloyal sentiments will not be tolerated.

Parents will be held responsible for the conduct of their children in this particular.

By command of Brigadier-General ROBERT L. VIERE, Military Governor.

DEATH OF A BEADAN SHARPSHOOTER.—A gentleman gives an account of the death of one of McClellan's sharpshooters, on the peninsula, under circumstances which possess interest sufficient to give them to the public. Several of our men, it seems, were killed while going to a spring near by, but by whom no one could imagine. It was at last determined to stop this inhuman game, if possible. So a sharp look out was kept for this sharpshooter, and the next time he fired the smoke of his rifle revealed the locality of his pit. That night a pit was dug by the Confederate soldiers, commanding the position of the Federal sharpshooter, and arrangements made to get rid of him. For this purpose a young Kentuckian was placed in our pit, with a trusty rifle, and provisions enough to last him until the next night. Next morning early a man was dispatched, as usual, with two buckets to go to the spring. He had proceeded about 200 yards, when the Federal marksman elevated himself, and placing his rifle to his shoulder, was about to pull trigger, but the Kentuckian was too quick for him, for he pulled his trigger first, and simultaneously therewith the Federal fell. Upon repairing to the spot which the Kentuckian did immediately—he discovered a rifle-pit, and a sturdy man in it, in the last agonies of expiring nature. The pit was provided with a cushioned chair, pipes and tobacco, liquors and provisions. But the rifle which had been used was really a valuable prize. It was of most superb manufacture, and supplied with the latest invention—an improved telescopic sight upon its end. The pit had been dug at night, and its occupant had been provisioned at night; so, but for a sharp lookout for the smoke of his gun, there is no saying how long this sharpshooter would have enjoyed the luxury of killing Southern men, without even a chance of losing his own life.—Petersburg Express.

Lieutenant-Colonel Wood and seventy of Morgan's command, who were captured recently at Lebanon, escaped by overpowering the Yankee crew on the boat which was taking them to St. Louis. They took the boat down to Clarksville, where all landed safely and proceeded to join their command.

The New York World says:—"Should General McClellan meet with a great disaster, there can scarcely be a question but that it will lead to the recognition of the Southern Confederacy."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 103, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JULY 17, 1862.

The War News.

THE late conflict before Richmond, which has resulted in the retreat and defeat of the Federal army, is the greatest battle of the war, and the worst disaster that has befallen the North. History does not record a battle of equal duration. There is no pretence for saying the Federals were panic-stricken and fled, but it was a stoutly-maintained contest, which fairly tested the strength of the respective armies. Although few details have reached us, they are sufficient to enable us to appreciate the epic completeness of the Confederate plan, and the eminent success that has attended its execution. The opening scenes of the grand drama were enacted on Wednesday and Thursday, June 25 and 26. On those days there was heavy skirmishing, and General McClellan expressed his satisfaction that he had pushed forward his advance. The correspondents of the New York papers reported mysterious movements in the Confederate lines—that some of the pickets were withdrawn, while others retained their position. The tone of General McClellan's despatches on June 25 and 26 shows that he had no conception that these movements were preparatory to a general engagement. On Wednesday he telegraphed to Washington "that the affair was over," and on Thursday he announced that he had gained an advanced and important position hitherto occupied by the enemy. On Friday, at three o'clock in the morning, the battle which had been preluded by the two days' skirmishing, was commenced by General Jackson attacking the re-erves of the Federal right wing, under the command of General McCall. This engagement lasted three hours. Later in the morning there was a general attack upon the whole of the right wing of the Federal army, which was commanded by General Porter, and, according to Northern accounts, the Confederates made four distinct assaults. General McClellan saw that he was defeated, and ordered General Porter to retreat. The Confederates captured the Federal siege guns and 12,000 prisoners. The vanquished army was hotly pursued, and had no breathing time until Saturday evening, when the evacuation of the White House was completed, and it had crossed the Chickahominy, leaving the Confederates in possession of all the ground between the Chickahominy and the Pamunkey, and a booty of stores sufficient, we are told, for a three months' supply of the Confederate army.

On Sunday morning Generals Hill and Longstreet, with their divisions, crossed the Chickahominy. So hasty had been the retreat of the Federals that they had not even attempted to destroy the bridges so as to impede the pursuit, much less did they essay to dispute the passage of the river with the batteries they had planted for so doing. After crossing the Chickahominy on the Sunday, the Confederates took possession of the ground lately held by the enemy, together with the bridges and earthworks that had been erected. Owing to the nature of the ground, notwithstanding the urgency of the case, the Federal retreat was protracted. On Monday, about two o'clock in the afternoon, the Confederates came up with the enemy at a place called Turkey Creek, and a fierce engagement ensued, in which the Federals were assisted by their gunboats. The retreat continued during the next two days, with constant skirmishing, until, at length, General McClellan had succeeded in reaching the James River, and placing his troops under the protection of the gunboats; but, still anticipating a further attack, he at once began to throw up entrenchments. Berkeley, the position occupied by General McClellan, is about forty-eight miles from Richmond by water, and thirty-five by land; and it is worthy of remark that this point of the river to which he has been forced to retreat was that intended to be guarded by the Virginia.

It would be superfluous to offer any criticism upon this tremendous battle. The energy of the attack, and the resistance of the Federals, must equally discourage the North. The first shows how invincible is the resolution and devotion of the Southern people to maintain their independence, and the latter that superiority in numbers and resources will not enable the North to subjugate the South. We do not know the numbers of the contending armies in the late battle, but we do know the North spared no effort to take the Confederate capital, and that the South was equally determined to defend it, and that, therefore, it was a trial of the strength of the belligerents—a trial that even the Northern press admits has issued in a Confederate triumph.

But the battle before Richmond, and the defeat of the grand army of the Potomac, though the most prominent, is not the only disaster that the North has lately sustained. Charleston was to have been captured before the 4th of July, but, in consequence of the Federal defeat on James Island, the attempt to take that city has been postponed by the withdrawal of the Federal army. Vicksburg, so often reported as captured, is still in possession of the Confederates. Port Royal is threatened. The operations of the mortar fleets on the White River have been checked. The capture of an express train between Memphis and Corinth shows that there is good reason for the anxiety felt in Washington with respect to the safety of General Halleck's army. General Curtis has had to abandon Arkansas, and to retreat into Missouri.

These facts, admitted and reported by the North, do not need any comment. They show that the Federal effort to effect the conquest of the South has signally failed, and that it was not an idle boast of President Davis when he declared that, if necessary, the war could be continued for twenty years. At all events, the news of the last fortnight must have convinced Europe that there is not the most distant prospect of the termination of the war by the Federal conquest of the Confederate States.

What the Situation Requires.

THE vacillation between the extremes of hope and fear which characterizes the people of the North, has been not inaptly compared to the symptoms of a well-known American disease, sufficiently described by the name of "chills and fever." The comparison holds good also in the mode of its treatment. The remedies which, in the period of chills, are deemed most efficacious are those which most aggravate the disease if given in the period of fever. The chill, in fact, is only the earlier stage of the fever, and the stage in which its progress can alone be checked. The mind of the Northern population is again suffering from a chill of unprecedented severity. The Northern heart is sick from hope too long deferred. The 4th of July, which was to be the day of rejoicing over triumphs such as no other country could boast of, and which was to bring promises of the future still grander and more glorious, has come, but it is a day of national sorrow. It has become a new anniversary, but it is the anniversary of the overthrow of the great army before the rebel capital. It is the anniversary of the abandonment of the siege of Charleston, as well as of Richmond. And as from the East, so from the West, comes nothing but rumours of impending disasters. Every homestead has some member to mourn whom this cruel war has cost, or a father, or son, or brother, or husband to nurse, who is lingering with the fatal fever of the camps. Yet a new levy, five times as great as the first which was to crush the rebellion, half as great as all the subsequent levies together, is to be made. Already the tax-gatherer is knocking at every door to collect his tribute upon every necessary of life, and yet more treasure is to be spent, greater debts to be incurred, heavier burdens to be assumed, for the same fruitless purpose. A damp, deadly chill has seized upon the vitals of the nation.

But it is transient only. The fever is sure to follow, and its intensity of heat will be in exact proportion to the icy coldness of the chill. In a few months hope will be once more buoyed up by a few trifling successes magnified into triumphs. With the despair of men who have nothing more to lose these Northern populations will make a greater effort than ever before to recover all. The inaction of the defeated armies will be explained by the necessities of a Midsummer campaign. The delay will give time to recruit their numbers, and to drill the contingents which Germany will freely send from her inexhaustible population. Thus before was the Northern mind chilled after the disgrace at Bull Run, and thus before was the chill succeeded by delirious ravings and fever visions of triumph and conquest. If the experience of the past has not convinced Europe that this war will never be abandoned by the North by its own spontaneous act, let the experiment be tried a few months longer, and the proofs will not fail. It is true that it will then be too late to interfere, except by armed force; the fever period will then have set in, and peaceful remedies will only make the ravings and the struggles of the patient more violent.

We have heard much of the opportune moment for European action. If that opportune moment could ever arrive, it has arrived now—now that the winter and spring campaign has ended in disastrous failure, now that the North is panting for breath, and is preparing, with superadded difficulties, to begin its work anew. It is now when capital trembles for its safety, when the young recruit hesitates to share the fate of the relatives that have preceded him in the ranks, and not when the contract mania, fed by the requirements of thrice 300,000 new conscripts shall once more have drowned the fears of wealth, and when regiment after regiment, with flaunting banners and sound of drum, shall march through Washington to the scene of war. We were told that the opportune moment to recognize an insurgent Power was not when its very capital was beleaguered, and its Government might at any moment be a fugitive body. But Richmond is no longer at the hazard of a battle, and the Confederate President and Congress are more securely seated there than Mr. Lincoln and his adjuncts are in Washington. We were also told that the opportune moment for putting bounds to the progress of a conqueror was not in the height of his triumph and success. But the conqueror at this moment is checked at every point. His armies are demoralized by defeat, and in the West, as in the East, are strictly on the defensive.

The Powers of Europe which do not now raise their voices against the further prosecution of the war become parties to it as accomplices after the fact. Their inaction is, in truth, the most powerful stimulus to its prosecution. It is to the North an implied acknowledgment that its undertaking is not a hopeless one, and that by renewed efforts it may yet succeed. In this fact lies the potency of the recognition of the Confederate States as an agency of peace. Why should the North, its Government, its capitalists, and its people, abandon as hopeless, after having staked so much on it, an enterprise in which all the world encourages them to persevere? They, as well as we in Europe, understand the claims which the Confederate States have established upon foreign Governments according to international usage. They,

as well as we, understand the powerful interests which urge foreign Governments to admit these claims. What is more natural and more logical than that they should construe the hesitancy of those Governments, if not into an approval, at least into a confession of the practicability of the subjugation of the South? They do more, and in a self-conceit which is peculiar to them, they construe this hesitancy as a confession of fear of their irresistible power, and their threatened vengeance. Every press, every stump-speech, every official document, embodies this idea in some form, and by it more than by ought else are the demagogues of the North able to delude the people with vain hopes. Thus the non-recognition of the South has become a chief agency in this war, and each reverse of the Northern arms renders its influence more pernicious. Even now, it is argued, does Europe despair of the ability of the South to maintain itself; even in our crippled condition Europe trembles before us, and dares not do what it lists, lest we be offended. Should Europe recognize that just title to independence which a gallant people has written with its best blood, the most fatal of Northern delusions would vanish as if by magic. Every capitalist would feel that the crash could no longer be averted; the Peace Party, which even now must disguise its mutterings in terms of humble submission to the powers that be, would raise its head and speak in tones of command instead of supplication; political leaders, guided by the instinct of self-preservation, would seek to win the favour of what they know must soon become the popular sentiment; the recruit about to step into the bloodstained ranks would, for the first time, be confronted by the doubt whether, indeed, the power of his country's arms was so great, and their success so certain, as he had so long been led to believe. For the first time, in brief, in the history of this war, would its utter hopelessness come home to the minds of all classes of the Northern people. The despotism at Washington would totter, for now for the first time its real strength would be tested, and mankind would discover with amazement, as after the fall of Robespierre, on what a slender basis its enormous power rested. If it did not fall at once, its only supports, the power of raising money, and that of raising troops, would fail it, for the supplies of both would be dried up in their sources.

Is the simple recognition of the Confederate States as a nation an adequate remedy at this crisis? We honestly and firmly believe it. Nay, more, we believe that the attempt to do more could only be productive of mischief. What need is there of mediation between two countries, one of which claims only the government of its own soil and makes no pretensions upon the government of the soil of the other? There are no disputed or disputable possessions which mediation is to adjudge to the rival claimants. It is not as though both claimed the same things, as in the case of rival pretenders to a crown, or of rival factions in a civil war. But, it will be asked, are not boundary questions at dispute an arbitration of which is implied in the recognition of the South? By no means. In recognizing the Confederate Government, European Powers recognize, not a territorial dominion of undefined and doubtful limits, but a Confederation of States the boundaries and governmental organization of each of which antedates the war. The only manner in which these boundaries can be altered is the same in the law of both belligerents. In both it can only be done by the constituted authorities of the State itself, with the consent of its partners in the Federal compact. No difficulty can, therefore, arise on this head calling for the mediation of foreign Powers. The adjustment of questions which may arise out of the former partnership, such as relates to the public debt, the public property, may safely be left to the decision of the parties concerned, when they have once laid down their arms; and in all of these the South has always sincerely professed its willingness to make the most liberal concessions. All it has ever asked is its own soil, and the right of its inhabitants to govern themselves.

We conclude that Europe has now again the opportunity of ending the war by a mere diplomatic act, without committing itself to the local pretensions or minor differences of the belligerents; without becoming itself entangled in the war. That it has the right to do this, whenever in its judgment it sees fit, no one on this side of the Atlantic will seriously dispute. That it is a duty which it owes to humanity, the progress of events has already shown. The recognition, then, of the Confederate States as an independent nation—nothing less and nothing more—is what the present situation of American affairs requires, the only course of action which it justifies, and the only course of action which can lead to beneficial results.

The "Slave Power."

THE term "Slave Power" has for thirty years been employed by those who in the American Union waged an unrelenting war against the institutions, the peace, and the reputation of their fellow partners of the South, to sum up all the wickedness and heinous crimes with which they charged the objects of their attack, and all the dangers with which they terrified the virtuous inhabitants of the North. Under this title a book has recently been published, which the friends of the North pronounce to be the ablest and most complete advocacy of the Northern side of the American dispute. This is high praise, considering that the advocate had the advantage of all that the talent, the ingenuity, and the sophistry of the North has said for over a year and a half—the greater part of this period almost uncontradicted—in defence of a cause which, nevertheless, the common sense of Europe has well-nigh unanimously condemned. This praise we should not ourselves have bestowed, but as the partisans of the North may be presumed to be the best judges of the strong points of their argument, we have no right to question their discretion in the selection of a champion.

The author of the work—Mr. J. E. Cairnes, M.A., Professor of Jurisprudence and Political Economy in Queen's College, Galway—does not pretend to be an impartial investigator. His opinions are definitely formed, and he has neither ear nor patience for any others. In the very outset of his book he prejudices the case in dispute by designating the Southern people as a "band of treasonable conspirators," all their acts as treacherous, and their institutions as "robbery and murder on a gigantic scale." From such a judge the South has no mercy to expect; but it is a merciful judgment on him to believe that he has never visited the South himself, has never known a representative man of that country, and has never read a Southern book. Accordingly, he can see nought but unmixed evil in the object of his hate, not so much even as a palliative to its lesser faults. He assumes all to be bad, wicked, and monstrous; and from these charitable premises he proceeds to demonstrate that all must be bad, wicked, and monstrous, without much concern whether his deductions agree with the facts.

His object—and this explains the otherwise unmeaning title which he has borrowed from the old vocabulary of the revilers of the South—is to prove that the institution of Slavery is a formidable aggressive Power, which endangers not only the peace and prosperity, but the very civilization of mankind; and, therefore, that the accident which has imposed this system of labour upon the Confederate States makes their independent national existence a standing menace to the best interests of humanity. It is an easy task to assail what no one, at least in Europe, has thought of defending these two or three generations back; and painting is not difficult where the only colour permitted is black, and the only merit consists in the intensity of the hue; and hence the feeblest capacities have successfully vied with the highest in this species of rhetoric and painting, and Europe has been favoured ad nauseam with specimens of every degree of excellence. But as neither Brazil nor Spain, with its slave-holding colony, have been considered as peculiarly formidable or aggressive Powers, the horror at their exceptional institutions might be indulged in without any admixture of fear. The devil, though very black, might be painted without danger of the proverbial consequence. He had no clutches long enough to reach us, and we might lecture him, abuse him, hold him up to scorn and indignation, with as perfect impunity as naughty boys make faces at, or poke sharp sticks at, the encaged wild beasts in the menagerie. Now, if we are to believe Professor Cairnes, it is not so. The evil thing is about to break loose; soon, like a roaring lion, it will seek whom it may devour; and Professor Cairnes gives the alarm, and calls upon all good people for assistance ere it be too late. This is the originality of the book before us. Except this it does not contain an idea which has not been worn threadbare by the Abolitionists of the Wendall Phillips school since 1833; not an assertion which has not been confuted over and over again. Even this originality is restricted, and consists in giving a more general significance to a word and an imaginary danger which had long had only a local application.

Brought forward seriously, with much show of authority and argumentation by an avowed champion of the North as the best justification of its course, Mr. Cairnes' theory deserves our consideration. Mr. Cairnes asserts that a "Slave Power," as he calls it, has been the dominant Power in the American Union since its formation, that it has been the author of all the wrongs which that Union has perpetrated or attempted upon others, that it is the one evil influence which has poisoned the public and private morals of the American democracy, and that the present war has no other motive than a sublime moral effort of the Northern people to shake off and destroy this Power for ever. He further asserts that, from the conditions of its existence, this "Slave Power" is compelled to spend upon a vaster theatre those irresistible destructive energies for which it no longer found scope in the late Union, and that if not checked now by the combined efforts of the civilized world, it would grow to such dimensions as to impede, if not wholly obstruct, the path of human progress. This is the fundamental idea of Mr. Cairnes' book. Let us first consider how far the past warrants the fears which he hopes to awaken in our minds.

When the American Union was formed, twelve out of the thirteen States composing it had the law of slavery written on their statute books. After an existence of eighty-four years, during which it more than quadrupled its territory, and multiplied its population by ten, fourteen out of thirty-three States retained that law. This shows no very formidable progress as made by Mr. Cairnes' "Slave Power." But these altered proportions do not tell the whole story. While free labour has supplanted slavery in State after State, slavery has not supplanted free labour in a single one of the many States which added new stars to the galaxy on the banner of the rapidly expanding Union. Kentucky was a part of Virginia when the Union was formed, and while this new State retained the law of the mother State Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan, also integral parts of Virginia when the Union was formed, rejected it. Tennessee was a part of North Carolina at the same period, and on becoming a State simply sanctioned what had existed before. The same is true of Alabama and Mississippi, which originally were parts of Georgia. In Florida, and in the Louisiana Purchase—out of which latter were carved the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and Iowa—slavery was implanted by the Spanish and French colonists, whose descendants still form an important element of the population of some of these States. Texas entered the Union as an independent Republic, recognized as such by foreign nations, and brought the law of slavery with her. It appears from these facts that the "Slave Power," whose aggressive energies Mr. Cairnes professes so greatly to dread, instead of encroaching upon the possessions of others, has not been able to retain its own. At the adoption of the Constitution, the South—already then so termed—was the superior of the North both in territory and population; in 1860 it possessed but one-third of the joint population, and not quite one-half of the territory. Indeed, the deterioration of the South, its hopeless inability to compete with its more enlightened, more thrifty, and solidly progressive rival, is Mr. Cairnes' favourite theme in the very book which is intended to alarm the world with the formidable proportions and threatening attitude of the "Slave Power."

Having conjured up an imaginary danger by the invention of an imaginary fact, Mr. Cairnes proceeds to invent its causes in the same felicitous manner. He discovers them in a supposed law of the nature of the "Slave Power." He asserts that slave labour exhausts beyond redemption the soil it cultivates, which compels the "Slave Power" to constantly seek new fields for its fearful ravages, and to prolong its life by preying on that of others. He draws a graphic picture of abandoned farms, of deserted villages in countries which had been settled scarce long enough for a white child born in them to grow to man's estate. Strange that this inevitable result of slave labour, according to Mr. Cairnes' theory, has never been noticed in Cuba or Brazil. Still stranger that each of those States where the originals of his pictures are supposed to abound, figures in the official census statistics as yearly increasing in population and in productiveness. Thus Georgia, one of the original States, in 1840 had a population of 691,392, and produced 300,000 bales of cotton; in 1850, with a population of 920,000, it produced 450,000 bales. Such a progress is a strange consequence of abandoned farms and deserted villages. Mr. Cairnes might have surmised, and in another part of the book a glimmer of the truth seems to have flashed athwart his mind—that in all new countries, where lands are plentiful, there is a wasteful system of agriculture quite independent of the form of labour employed, which has for its obvious reason that it is cheaper to buy new lands than to fertilize the old ones. Neither Mr. Cairnes, nor any one else, to our knowledge, has ever adduced any proof that cotton exhausts the soil more rapidly than cereals; and an à priori reasoner like Mr. Cairnes might have reasoned that the abandonment of land consequent on exhaustion would be a more potent agency in free-labour than in slave-holding countries. He might have argued that the small farmer, with his thrifty wife, rifle and axe in hand, was the true pioneer of the wilderness, and more apt to seek and find untried fields for his industry than the planter, with his slave family, and the cares, expenses, and difficulties of transporting and providing for them. What with the one was only a congenial adventure, an à priori reasoner might have added, would become to the other, bidding adieu to his ancestral mansions and his broad estates, the last resort of a cruel necessity. Slavery—might have been the conclusion—is in its nature sedentary and stationary; free labour is migratory and progressive. But this reasoning and conclusion would not have suited Mr. Cairnes' purpose in this branch of his argument, though it did admirably in another; and hence he ignores the palpable fact that in no one instance has slave labour successfully competed with free labour in the settlement of new territories. The bitter struggle for Kansas, while it flooded that land of dispute with free labourers, did not induce the introduction of fifty slaves; and the territory of Arizona, with a climate and soil adapted to slave-labour products, and where free labour offers no competition, yet contains after ten years of organization less than fifty. This is the reason why the contest of the South with the North for the possession of the nascent States of the West was so utterly hopeless, and is one of the chief causes of the dissolution of the Union. Less biased historians than Mr. Cairnes might, not illogically, conclude that it was the conscious weakness of the "Slave Power," and not its strength, which forced it to resign all hopes of future expansion and aggrandizement, and to seek its last refuge in a new national existence; and History herself will soon solve the doubt whether that new national existence is more competent to protect it than was the stronger and greater one from which it has fled.

It is not our intention nor our desire to defend the institution of Slavery; but we cannot conceive why the accident of its existence in the Confederate States should justify a British author in stigmatizing

the whole people of those States with the most opprobrious epithets. Surely a people who worship the same God as ourselves, who read the same Bible, and who base their hopes of future salvation upon the same Mercy, cannot be a nation of robbers and murderers. If they are wedded to error, surely accusations which in their inmost hearts they must feel to be cruelly unjust will not impress them with the knowledge or the wisdom of the teachers who seek to convert them. Mr. Cairnes would have us believe that all of civilization in the late United States resides on one side of a geographical line, and on the other side all is darkness and barbarism. An unsupported assertion is not to be met by an unsupported counter-assertion; but the present war has revealed facts sufficient whereby to test Mr. Cairnes' charge. We can compare the side of exclusive civilization with that of barbarism, in the official documents of their respective Governments, in the acts and reports of the commanders of their respective armies, in the tone and temper of their organs of public opinion. The comparison is not favourable to Mr. Cairnes' conclusions. Those lawless and untamable barbarians, of whom the author speaks as "mean whites," and "white trash"—as if these terms were familiar household words in the South—have executed the most difficult and successful strategic operations that have ever been performed by the best disciplined armies of the Old World. Under unheard of hardships and privations there has been a striking absence of the mutiny, desertion, treachery, which are the ordinary consequences of such sufferings. The negroes, between whom and their wicked tyrants, Mr. Cairnes tells us, no human tie of affection is possible, have kept guard over the unprotected wives and children of their masters, have followed the latter in the field, have been the sappers and miners, as well the faithful spies, of the Confederate armies. But what will be thought of an author—and a political economist, too—who gravely informs his readers, and repeats it in every chapter of his book, that of a population of eight millions, five lead a life "alternating between listless vagrancy, and the excitement of marauding expeditions." Did it not occur to Mr. Cairnes to ask himself how five millions of vagrants and marauders could live at the expense of the industry of three millions? Did it not occur to him, that in one single branch of industry the product of the South has, within half a century, increased from a few thousand bales of cotton to 4,000,000 bales? After this the reader is prepared for the astounding statement, that "all attempts at conveying education to the bulk of the people of the Southern States have proved costly failures."

Throughout the book there is no evidence that Mr. Cairnes has consulted a single table of official statistics, either as regards population, productions, churches, schools, distribution of property, or any of the facts which one might suppose indispensable to the performance of the task he set himself, although the census of the United States, and publications without number of equal authority, tempted to the study by their elaborate accuracy and convenient arrangement. His chief authorities, which indeed he quotes copiously, appear to have been Olmstead and Helper, books which any author who values his reputation opens with distrust, and shuts with a stronger feeling. Throughout his work Mr. Cairnes betrays an amazing perverseness of judgment, which besets him already in the introduction. He there says that at the outbreak of the American difficulties public opinion in Europe ascribed the cause to conflicting commercial interests and prohibitive tariffs, but as the war progressed, it became obvious that slavery was the true cause, and its abolition on the one hand, and its extension on the other, the objects of the contending parties. Would any one but Mr. Cairnes have thus written the history of European public opinion on American affairs?

Such, then, is the best argument which the North, after more than a twelvemonth's exclusive possession of the ear of Europe, can put forth in its own defence. We have presented its essential features fairly and as forcibly as the author himself could have wished. Into its minor details we need not enter; most of them require no other reply than a mere reference to the Census and the Trade Returns.

Southern Patriotism in Europe.

PERHAPS no country ever engaged in a great war under such discouraging disadvantages as did the Confederate States of America. When Mr. Lincoln assumed the Presidential Chair, they had not an arsenal, not a dockyard, not a powder-mill, or a gun factory, not a single regiment of troops under the orders of the Confederate Government, and not a penny in the Confederate treasury except £100,000 loaned it by the State of Alabama. The subsequent accession of Virginia to their number supplied some of these prime necessities of warfare; but up to the fall of Fort Sumter, when the Washington Administration dropped its mask, the belief in peace was so general that no steps had been taken to obtain supplies from Europe. Since that period they have waged a war of self-defence, upon the whole successfully, against the vastly superior numbers and resources of their enemy; they have twice defeated his main armies, once at Manassas and once at Richmond, and have never lost a pitched battle, except that of Somerset, which can scarcely be called a pitched battle. These great results they have achieved by an unanimity of which it would be difficult to find a parallel in history, and which caused a whole people to act as one man. Regiments were raised, clothed, and even armed, at individual expense; banks, corporations, and private persons, placed their funds at the disposal of the Government. The highest in station took their places by the side of the humblest in the ranks, the lad from school by the side of the hoary grandsire. The whole male population of the country became one great army, of which the women were the sempstresses and nurses, and the slaves the teamsters and labourers. Fearful as have been the sacrifices which every age, sex, and class has been called upon to make, and has cheerfully made, it cannot be said that they have not been compensated by great rewards. They have extorted the reluctant admiration of mankind for a people whom the systematic misrepresentation of a quarter of a century had almost placed beyond the pale of mankind's sympathies. If the war had purchased nothing else, it would have purchased, at perhaps not too dear a price, that elevation in the estimation of the civilization of the world which fifty years of peace could with difficulty have earned.

The same spirit which animated the Southern people animated also those members of the national family whom the war surprised in distant climes. Southern navy officers, in remote regions of the globe, threw up their commissions, though with the certainty of being incarcerated as traitors on their arrival in a Federal port. Men educated for the army, and having devoted their lives to the profession, felt the tie to their Southern home more binding than the ties of life-long professional and private associations, and hastened by scores to offer their services where they deemed them rightfully to belong. Civil appointments, posts of honour, and prospects of ambition were alike sacrificed without hesitation and without regret. Youths engaged in pursuits of study or of pleasure in European capitals braved the dangers of the blockade, or the greater perils of a journey through the enemy's country, to take their proper place among the defenders of their homes. Those to whom this course was not open, compulsory exiles from the land of their affections, sought other means to aid its cause. Who had money to give, gave it; who could ply a pen, plied it. According to his means, his position, his social or business connections, each one applied his hands to the work nearest to him with an unremitting, untiring, never despairing effort. Nor were the women idle; again and again have remittances been made of money, or what is more than money's worth, medicines and surgical instruments, the spontaneous contributions of Southern ladies residing in Europe; and, in alliance with their sisters bearing that harder yoke than exile, the sway of a brutal conqueror, female ingenuity and fertility of resource, has often contrived to relieve the objects of its patriotic benevolence, where the efforts of men had failed. Silent as has been this work, or rather, overlooked in the great tragic spectacle enacting, its fruits are nevertheless apparent everywhere, and every one that numbers a Southerner among his acquaintance can bear personal testimony to the fact. No system of Freemasonry ever so closely united together in common sympathies and common objects, as has this fervid Southern patriotism, men strangers to, and living remote from, each other, and, perhaps, without affinity of taste or pursuits. Surely, a nation which, in a great emergency, has such a hold upon its individual members, that even those who might be supposed alienated by long absence, or who, at least, are withdrawn from the contagion of a powerful popular enthusiasm, imperil and sacrifice in its behalf position, prospects, private fortunes, even life itself—such a nation cannot be otherwise than a homogeneous one, and one endowed with more than ordinary vitality. In such a nation the craving for independence cannot be a transient or accidental sentiment; it must spring from, and feed itself from, the deepest roots of the national life.

We are led to these reflections, which we could illustrate with innumerable interesting details, were we at liberty to do so, by the intelligence that a safe and certain channel having been discovered to relieve the lamentable sufferings of Southern prisoners in Northern hands, within a few hours several hundred pounds had been collected in Liverpool alone, and were by the next mail already on their way. The energy and promptness exhibited in this instance is more suggestive than the pecuniary value of the gift, which has since been, no doubt, largely increased. The transmission was effected, we are informed, through the agency of the "Southern Club," at Liverpool, founded for such purposes by Mr. J. H. Ashbridge, of New Orleans, and others; and it proves the efficacy of organization even for objects which the law of God and man sanctions, under all circumstances, but especially under those where the vigilance of a suspicious enemy is to be eluded. Thanks to such organized and united efforts, the Southerners in Europe have been enabled to contribute in no small degree to the results of the battles waged across the ocean, while raising their country's character in the eyes of foreigners. The time was when, for any one to call himself a Southerner, exposed him to the risk of being considered little better than a barbarian of the most cruel and savage type. The time has already come when men are proud of the name, and when many claim it who have no right to bear it. The manner in which those who have that right have proved their title to it will make it an easy matter at all times to draw the distinction.

The Cruise of the Sumter.

CORNERED.

We made the Island of Martinique after a long and unprofitable cruise of fifty-seven days from Maranham, Brazil. This island is one of the few possessions still remaining to the French in the West Indies. The scenery is bold and precipitous, the mountains bearing evident traces of volcanic origin, and as we steamed along the shore at sunset the scene presented was grand and varied; the soft light of sunset lent a mellow tint to the picture, the sides of the mountains being covered with verdure, while the white cottages of the planters, peeping from amidst this maze of tropical vegetation, afforded pleasing evidences of civilization and refinement. The authorities kindly accorded us permission to lay at the man-of-war anchorage, and on the morning of November 9 we moved into the inner harbour of Port Royal, and came to under the guns of the immense fortifications which command its approaches. The defences of the harbour consist in four or five forts, two of which are well manned and very large; they would prove formidable obstacles to any foe. The town is regularly laid out and very handsome.

Josephine was born a few miles from this spot, and the inhabitants have shown their appreciation of the virtues and graces of the first Empress, by the erection of a handsome statue to her memory.

The officers of the garrison, while practising that strict neutrality which is the policy of their nation, treated us personally with great kindness, inviting us to their clubs, and acting as cicerones in pointing out the various places of interest and beauty. We will ever retain grateful recollections of their kindness and friendship. The Sumter was an object of great curiosity, and they could not understand how so frail a vessel could encounter so many dangers, and yet remain unscathed: for many days our ship was thronged with visitors. We could not obtain coal here, but were permitted to purchase it from the merchants of St. Pierre, a small town some thirty miles to the northward. We accordingly bid farewell to Port Royal, with its many pleasant associations, and on the 13th inst. got under way for St. Pierre, and came to in front of the town at three p.m. The anchorage is very unsafe, the "barbour" being merely an indentation of the coast, and wholly exposed to the sea; a protracted stay during the hurricane season is extremely dangerous. Curiosity was rife to see "the pirate," and the beach was literally covered with people, while hundreds of little negroes swam out to the ship with perfect impunity from the sharks which infest the West Indian seas. Mooring the ship stern on to the shore we commenced coaling and making preparations for sea.

The United States' steamer Iroquois had visited this port some time before, in search of "the pirate" Sumter, and it was rumoured that she had stranded on the rocks off Rio Grande, on the coast of Brazil; thus, as we hoped, delivering us from all further pursuit from her, for she was considered an ugly customer; but while in the act of congratulating ourselves, she hove in sight, and afforded us an apt illustration of the old saw about "speaking of the devil, &c." On the 16th, at four p.m., when we had nearly finished coaling and other arrangements for sea, a steamer was seen rounding the north point of the island. She was under Danish colours, and had made, it was evident, some ludicrous attempts at disguising herself, such, for instance, as a studied disarrangement of her yards, and some alterations in her head booms; I was under the impression at the time that we were very old birds to be caught with such chaff. She came up slowly at first, evidently not seeing us, as we lay concealed in the shadow of the hills, but when within about two miles we could see, with the aid of our glasses, the water curling from her bows, and we knew that the Yankee had scented his prey, or, to employ the expressive phrase of our rough old signal quartermaster, "she had got a bone in her mouth." All the good citizens of St. Pierre came down to the beach to witness the scene, and a great many indulged their aquatic instincts by swimming out to us, to await the denouement. The Iroquois was now close on to us, and when about 100 yards distant, hauled down the Danish colours, and set the Stars and Stripes in their place; thus we were once more in the presence of our hated foe.

The Iroquois is one of the new class of gunboats, powerfully armed with nine and eleven-inch guns, and is about 1000 tons burden; her crew consists of about 200 men; and we knew that it was useless for the Sumter to think of fighting her; our only hope of escape being by strategy. The enemy stood in close to the land, and sent a boat on shore to communicate with the United States' Consul and the French authorities, being, however, very careful not to drop anchor. Captain Palmer informed his Excellency the Governor that there was a pirate at anchor in the Port of St. Pierre, and requested permission to destroy her, but this was refused emphatically, and the irate commander furnished with the proclamation of his Imperial Majesty Napoleon III., according belligerent rights to the Confederate States, and decreeing strict neutrality on the part of France. He was informed that it was necessary for the Iroquois either to cast anchor, or leave the waters of the Isle, and if accepting the former alternative, that an interval of twenty-four hours must elapse between the departure of either belligerent; also that in case of any breach of neutrality occurring, the forts would open on the offending party.

After remaining stationary for some two hours, her boat returned; the Iroquois stood out of the harbour, taking a position a short distance ahead of us, and commenced backing and filling across our bows. Meanwhile the crew of "the pirate" were not idle; every preparation was made to repel boarders and to defend our ship to the last extremity; the crew were inspected, and every man seen to be properly armed and equipped for action. We fully expected an attack that night, and remembered the threats and loud pretensions of not respecting any neutrality which prevented them from destroying the Sumter, as made by the commander of the Niagara and the redoubtable Porter, of the Powhattan; this latter gentleman having actually followed us as far as Maranham, only to find the people "Sumter mad" on his arrival. Very few on board the Sumter that night felt any inclination to slumber; the men were sitting about in groups commenting in low tones on the contest which now seemed to be imminent; while those officers who were at leisure were gathered on the quarter-deck engaged in the same interesting discussion. At two a.m., the word was passed by the look-outs forward that the Yankee was bearing down close upon us; and the order passed, almost in a whisper, "to go to quarters." I never saw men obey an order with more alacrity: in a few minutes the boarders, pikemen, and small-arm men were ranged in three lines close to our low rail to await his attack, all preserving a perfect silence that seemed death-like. When about twenty feet distant from us, we heard the deep tones of her bell in the engine-room, as it rung the order to back; but not before we had discovered her men at quarters, and, in fact, presenting every appearance of a ship intending to board an enemy. A single stray pistol shot would have brought on the engagement, and to judge from the lights and signals glancing along the fortifications, the Frenchmen would have taken a hand too. The appearance of our decks next morning was amusing; the men were strewn about promiscuously, fully armed and accoutred for battle, endeavouring to obtain some rest; a stranger might easily have imagined us to be a buccaneer. Captain Palmer stated, next day, that he was afraid we would board him in boats, when asked the meaning of his threatening manoeuvres; but it is difficult to believe that the commander of a ship-of-war would make such a flimsy excuse, and let us hope, for his own credit, that he did not really believe his own statement. The demeanour of the crew was most satisfactory; no noise or bustle could be noticed, but a quiet, firm determination was expressed in the countenance of each man to defend our noble little ship to the bitter end, and never to strike our flag to the foe. These flagrant violations of neutrality greatly irritated the inhabitants, and the better portion of them threw off their thin mask of indifference, and openly expressed sympathy for us; some were so excited as to volunteer to go with us, but their kind offers were not accepted. The negroes, however, did not seem to recognize us for what we really are, their best friends, but were somewhat opposed to the Sumter; and their allegiance to our enemy was made the subject of one of Captain Palmer's voluminous despatches to Mr. Gideon Welles.

THE ESCAPE.

On Saturday, the 16th inst., the French war-steamer L'Achiron, came in from Port Royal, and anchored, in order to assist the authorities in preserving the neutrality of the port. She is a small vessel and very lightly armed, but her commander was none the less emphatic for that, and Captain Palmer was fain to consent to either come to anchor or cruise full three miles off the land. He chose the latter alternative, and departed accordingly, after having established a well-concerted code of signals, and instituted a complete system of espionage on our movements. The method of ascertaining the news concerning us was an ingenious one, being effected through the agency of the negro fishermen and their little canoes. They would row out as if to fish, the Iroquois would take up a position in-shore of them, and then what passed was veiled from profane eyes. One of these fellows I noticed as being particularly zealous; the words "Con fiance de Dieu, No. 718," were painted on the sides of his boat, and as he rowed by us, it was amusing to see how serious and inflated he appeared to be with the importance of his mission.

The moon was now approaching its full, which was very unfortunate for us, as it almost turned night into day, and gave the Yankee a most important advantage; I never was so sensible of its brilliancy before; Venus also appeared to dispense us a most extraordinary light; though all this, I suppose, was the effect of my heated imagination, and may have originated in a desire to "keep dark." Our best chance of escape, therefore, was early in the evening, when the moon had not yet risen from behind the tall cliffs of St. Pierre.

By the 23rd of November the slight repairs necessary for some portions of our machinery were effected, and the Sumter was ready for sea. At five minutes to eight, p.m., we went to general quarters, carefully extinguishing all lights and shrouding the battle-lanterns. All was in utter darkness, and it was difficult to distinguish the forms of the men as they stood by their guns, while the sauded deck, piles of shot, rammers, sponges, &c., in their places, indicated preparations for a desperate defence. The word was now given, the cable slipped, a few strokes of an axe severed the stern line, and the Sumter bounded away to the southward. I will never forget the yell which the negroes on shore gave at this moment, it seemed like the exclamations of men under the influence of mortal excitement, and I could not institute a more apt comparison than to liken it to the howl of demons. We were a little way from our anchorage, and just astern of the Acheron, when we observed three brilliant lights flash up on shore, followed by two "blue lights" from a Yankee hermaphrodite brig in the harbour. A boat immediately left the French steamer in pursuit of those making signals, while the Sumter, rightly surmising that the signals indicated her present course, wore round on her keel and stood to the northward. About this time the "journal" became so heated that it was necessary to proceed very slowly, which we did, keeping close in under the land, to obtain the benefit of the tall shadows of the mountains, which were thrown far out into the deep. When opposite the north point of the island, the look-out in one of the quarter-boats reported the enemy bearing down on us under all sail and steam, and we all strained our eyes anxiously in the direction indicated, but nothing like the Iroquois was to be seen, the enemy in question turning out to be a small fishing smack, sloop-rigged, and broad off our port beam. The unfortunate discoverer was called down, and severely reprimanded for his stupidity.

The order "to give her all steam and let her go," was given, and the Sumter shot out from under the lee of the land with great speed. We were, however, destined to have more trouble with our machinery, the engineer reporting that the "journal" was again getting hot rapidly; we were forced to "slow down," and finally to stop entirely. This was a moment of extreme danger, and if our huge foe had pounced upon us he would have made short work of the little Sumter; but, fortunately, a heavy rain squall came up at this juncture, so obscuring everything that any object was invisible at twenty yards distance. The engine was again started after some fifteen minutes delay, and, favoured with a fine breeze, the Sumter seemed to fly through the water; indeed, none had seen her make such headway before.

At eleven p.m. we made the Island of Dominique, beat the retreat, secured the battery, and spliced the main-brace, drinking to the health of Jefferson Davis and the Southern Confederacy. We skirted close along the shore of the island, and after making some very narrow escapes from running on the rocks, finally ran out clear of the islands, and the Sumter was at sea again, free once more to pursue her destructive career.

A court of inquiry was held on the captain of the Iroquois, and he was deprived of his command. The Northern press indulge in marvellous stories concerning a patriotic old tar, who went on a spree at St. Pierre, out of pure chagrin at our escape; but we could not find out what became of the vessel, though it was understood that she went in pursuit of the Sumter, but as this was generally thought to be a wild-goose chase, we considered it indefinite.

Reviews.

SOUTHERN STATISTICS.

THE PRODUCTION OF COTTON (continued.)

In England there has been a chronic panic lest the supply of the raw material should fail. With regard to the increasing consumption of cotton fabrics, no doubt has been entertained. With the advance of civilization, this consumption of cotton increases, and, indeed, the consumption of cotton is an unerring test of national wealth and national progress. India and China would multiply our cotton trade, if the consumption of cotton in those countries should equal 20 per cent. of the present consumption per head of the population of the United Kingdom.

The present consumption of cotton may be thus estimated:—

Country.	Population.	lbs. consumed.	per head.
England	29,000,000	260,000,000	9 lbs.
France	36,000,000	140,000,000	4 lbs.
United States.....	28,000,000	315,000,000	11 lbs.
Other European Countries	213,000,000
Other parts of America	29,000,000	1,096,000,000	1 lb.
Asia	775,000,000
Africa	200,000,000
	1,310,000,000	1,811,000,000

To make the general consumption equal to 2 lbs. per head, it would require nearly double the quantity of cotton at present grown; but, unless the progress of civilization is a chimera, 2 lbs per head is a low and inadequate average. The above estimate is made up partly from statistics collected nearly four years ago; and during the last four years the consumption of cotton, especially in France, has greatly increased.

It has, then, never been a question of finding a market for our manufactures, but whether we could rely on obtaining a sufficient supply of the raw material. On the other hand, the planters of the Southern States have been fully persuaded of their power to produce any quantity of their staple that might be called for; but they have always been anxious concerning the possibility of the demand being limited; and that the development of the plantations might result in loss by raising more cotton than could be consumed, and so making it comparatively a drug in the market, and forcing down prices; a very unreasonable surmise, we must confess, but it is not more unreasonable to dread the limitation of the demand, than to dread the limitation of the consumption. There will always be fluctuation in consumption, values, and prices, but hitherto there has not been any over productiveness of staple; that is, the bounty of the Creator has not been found a needless waste. Nor hitherto has the productiveness of the earth been proved inadequate to the wants of man. The increase of demand has gone hand in hand with the development of production. To show that the planters, though in error in respect to the possibility of the limitation of demand, were, from facts within their own knowledge, justified in feeling confidence in being able to supply any possible demand, we will quote from the census of 1850 the acres of improved and unimproved land in farms in the States in which cotton may be profitably cultivated.

	Improved.	Unimproved.
North Carolina	5,453,975	15,543,008
South Carolina	4,072,651	12,145,049
Georgia	6,378,479	16,442,900
Florida	349,049	1,216,240
Tennessee	5,175,173	13,808,849
Arkansas	781,530	1,816,684
Alabama	4,435,614	7,702,068
Mississippi	3,444,358	7,046,061
Louisiana	1,500,025	3,399,018
Texas	643,976	10,852,363
	32,324,830	90,002,240

Thus, in 1850, only 27 per cent. of the farm land in the Cotton States was improved. What an enormous margin does this leave for increased production; particularly when we consider how, during the last ten years, agricultural science has facilitated and cheapened the improvement of land.

According to the census of 1850, there were 113,032,614 acres of improved land, of which 17,247,614 acres were not in actual cultivation. We must, therefore, make an allowance of about 3 per cent. for the improved land that may be cultivated. Further, in 1850 the number of acres in cotton cultivation was 5,000,000 throughout the United States; so that not quite a sixth part of the cultivated land in the Cotton States was used for the production of cotton. If, then, the demand for cotton renders it expedient—that is, profitable—there is land ready to receive cotton seed, or the South could limit its growth of other agricultural produce, or the unimproved lands could be brought into cotton cultivation.

But we have not yet disposed of the question of area. The acres of farm land in the ten cotton-growing States are 122,327,110; but the total area of those States is equal to 452,000,000 acres; and persons acquainted with the country, and having a knowledge of the kind and climatic position of land necessary for cotton cultivation, estimate that half this immense territory may be used as cotton fields. It is surely needless to further press the point of there being sufficient available land in the Southern States to grow as much cotton as can be consumed. As a proof that an increasing area has been sown with cotton, we may observe that the total product in 1850 was 2,796,706 bales, and in 1860, 4,300,000 bales, and that this increase was not the result of improved farming; but that, whereas in 1850 only 5,000,000 acres were in cotton cultivation, in 1860 there were not less than 8,000,000. With such immense resources in the way of land, it is not surprising that the planters should have directed their attention more to the improvement of quality rather than the quantity to be obtained per acre.

Besides the suitable land, and the demand for the produce, capital and labour are needed. Will the productiveness of the Southern States be limited for lack of these indispensable agents? With regard to capital, assuredly not. We always find abundance of money forthcoming to foster enterprise that has a prospect of returning a profit. The West Indian proprietors refuse to find the means for growing cotton on their estates, but they find the capital for the cultivation of sugar. As an instance of the anxiety of capitalists to find a promising investment, we may recall a fact revealed by the crash of 1847—that London houses had advanced on sugar crops to be grown three or four years after the date of the advance. In British India capital for cotton growing cannot be procured, but there is a superabundance of capital for public works, indigo and opium cultivation, and all other pursuits that yield a profit. It is amusing to hear gentlemen, who ought to know better, advocate the Government guaranteeing a return on cotton culture, because such a proposition is in itself an admission that, in the opinion of all mercantile and monied men, cotton growing in India is a bad speculation. Capital, the servant of profit, is easily beguiled by fair promises, except, as in the case of Indian cotton culture, these promises have been demonstrated false by experience. The competition for capital is not greater than the competition for investment.

If, then, it became necessary, we are confident that European capital would be furnished to the Southern planters; but, probably, such a necessity will not arise. Hitherto the increased crops have been brought to market without any unusual assistance. The capital of the Northern States increased with the increase of the cotton cultivation, and the advances made to planters were profits arising from the cotton trade. However, without considering special circumstances, the question of capital is disposed of by the canon—that where there is suitable land, suitable labour, and a profitable demand, capital will be willingly attracted. Having satisfied ourselves as to the land and the demand, it remains for us to inquire whether the Southern States will be able to find the increased labour necessary for the increased supply. That they have hitherto done so we know. What are their prospects of so doing in the future?

We give a return of the labour population in the cotton-growing States for four decades.

	1820.	1830.	1840.	1850.
North Carolina	205,017	215,601	245,817	288,548
South Carolina	258,475	313,401	327,038	384,984
Georgia	149,656	217,531	280,944	381,682
Florida	—	15,501	23,717	39,310
Alabama	47,439	117,949	253,532	342,844
Mississippi	32,814	65,659	195,211	309,873
Louisiana	69,064	109,588	168,452	244,809
Arkansas	1,617	4,576	19,935	47,100
Tennessee	80,107	141,603	183,059	239,459
Texas	—	—	—	53,161
	844,189	1,233,009	1,699,705	2,336,775

From 1820 to 1830 the growth of the black population was 50 per cent.; from 1830 to 1840, 25 per cent.; and from 1840 to 1860, 40 per cent. From this we gather that the labouring population of the South is increasing with a rapidity that will be equal to the additional demand for labour. And this is so conclusive that we need not dwell upon the improvements of agriculture that will necessarily economize the production of cotton.

We have, then, an increasing demand for cotton, an almost indefinite extent of land in the Southern States fit for the profitable growth of cotton; there is no lack of capital, and the supply of labour is abundant, and constantly becoming larger. We have merely to record facts that need no comment. In seventy years, from producing only a few bags, America has become the cotton grower for the world, and has created that industry which is so marvellously developed in England. We have seen how the whole growth of the cotton trade, from the close of the last century until now, is due to the Southern States, and that the Southern States, so far from being exhausted, are in a position to yield more and more cotton, according to the exigencies of mankind. England ought especially to rejoice in the prospect of the continual development of her cotton manufactures, for it is through her agency that India, China, and Africa are to be clothed. But in reference to cotton, England suffers from a peculiar determination to try, or rather to wish to try, to gather abundance where it has pleased Providence not to bestow abundance. A great deal is said about breaking up the American monopoly. What monopoly does the South enjoy? She must sell and the world must buy. The strength of the South consists in the special fecundity of her soil; and such a patent of monopoly can neither be bestowed nor destroyed by man. America was the last to enter the cotton field, and at a single bound she outstrips all her competitors. The American cotton crop in 1790 was 1,500,000 lbs.; in 1860 it was 2,250,000,000 lbs. As in the past, so in the future the Southern States will be the main source of cotton supply, and when from war or any other catastrophe that supply is cut off, the commerce in cotton must dwindle.

But those who imagine that the cultivation of cotton in the Southern States demands no ingenuity or care labour under a considerable error. Even the prolific South does not yield her increase without assiduous toil. Cotton planting requires as much, perhaps more, assiduity and skill than any other agricultural pursuit. We will give some of the items of outlay of a cotton plantation, which will, we think, demolish the idea of the easy simplicity of cotton cultivation.

Let us take an estate of 4000 acres, of which little more than 50 per cent. is in cultivation; this would be worth $70,000
250 slaves 90,000
Mules, mares, herd of cattle, and hogs ... 7,000
Carts, wagons, implements, &c. ... 2,500

Capital invested ... 169,500

Money in the South is worth 7 per cent., and we have put down the invested capital at a low figure. The interest on the capital invested is equal to $11,000

Bagging and rope	800
Taxes on servants and land	250
Wages for overseers	800
Medical attendance (average)	309
Clothing for slaves	1,500
Repairs, iron, gins, &c.	300
Freights and commission on cotton	2,000

Expenses ... 16,959

This is not a perfect statement. It does not include the cost of feeding the hands, or make any allowance for loss of hands by epidemic; or any allowance for re-fitting mules, &c. But imperfect as it is, it will be sufficient to show that a cotton crop in the Southern States is not all profit.

In conclusion, we will make one or two brief suggestions in reference to the efforts now being made to induce the Government or the Manchester capitalists to invest money in the cultivation of cotton in India. The persons who busy themselves with this scheme talk about "introducing" the culture of cotton into India. Why, before the footfall of a European was heard on the continent of America, ages before the dawn of Christianity, India was a cotton-growing country; not only grew it, but knew its value, for the native Indians were singularly skilful in the manufacture of cotton fabric. Besides, the most persistent efforts have been made to improve the growth of Indian cotton and to adapt it to modern requirements. In 1788, before American cotton was known, the Directors of the East India Company were struck with the small quantity of cotton exported from India to Europe into England compared with the exports from other places, and they instructed their representatives to spare no pains in increasing the growth of cotton. In 1790 reports were received from the Indian Government giving a glowing account of the distribution of seed throughout the Indian Peninsula. But notwithstanding the patronage of the Government, the support of the wealthiest corporation in the world, the rising demand for the article, and the absence of any serious competition, no profitable results were obtained. In 1799 plantations were formed on the Malabar coast, and at other likely positions. Upon the failure of the plantations, it was thought the seed was not favourable, and American, West Indian, and Persian seeds were tried. When the cotton-gin was discovered, it was supposed that as India would be able to clean cotton she would at length yield an abundant and acceptable harvest. But neither the new seeds nor the gin enabled her to supply the European markets. In 1818 four model cotton farms were established, regardless of cost, at Jimnevelley, and three other places; and the only effect of these farms was to teach Indian farmers that they had better eschew the cultivation of cotton for Europe. In 1823 a cotton farm was established at Barrackpore, by Lady Hastings. Lord Ellenborough was extremely zealous in striving to make the cultivation of cotton general and profitable. Between 1830 and 1840 continued experiments were made, in which large sums of money were sunk. The East India Company sent an officer to America to collect information, and seed, and to engage experienced cultivators. The information, the seed, the American planters, were obtained; but, for all that, India has not been able to afford a substitute for the American supply. We are not in the least surprised at the non-success of these schemes, because if demand will not bring a supply, no other power on earth can do so; but it is rather curious that, with such an experience, Manchester capitalists should be asked to pay for new experiments, or that Government aid should again be sought. It is not in the power of any Government, however strong, to alter the fundamental laws that regulate commerce, or to contravene the plans of the Creator. So long as the Southern States produce cotton in abundance only limited by the demand, and cheaper either in respect to quality or price, so long the Southern States will command the market, despite legislative enactments; and so long as India can grow produce for export more profitable than cotton, so long her produce of cotton for export will be limited to the quantity that can be raised with the surplus labour not used in more profitable pursuits. If the American supply was cut off for ever, India would not replace it, for she could only do so at a sacrifice of other pursuits that would enhance the price of cotton and limit the consumption.

THE CONSTITUTION AND SPIRIT OF THE OPPOSING ARMIES.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The Confederate victories with which Europe is now ringing, gladden but do not astonish those who have believed and maintained that the South, in fighting for freedom, was sure to triumph over the North in its struggle for the "Union." Every impartial spectator has long ago come to the conclusion that the result of the great battle which has been impending would be a decisive victory for the Confederacy. It could not be otherwise. Since the Federals first conceived the unhallowed design of conquering the South in order to reconstruct the "Union," their armies have been defeated in every encounter in the open field. It has been repeatedly demonstrated that the Federal generals cannot manoeuvre, and that the heterogeneous and mercenary Northern hosts are remarkable for unprecedented alacrity in running away. In one thing only have the Northern officers achieved an exceptional and extraordinary success; they have shown themselves unrivalled in manufacturing lying despatches, and in inventing euphuistic phrases for the conveyance of unwelcome news. Not even a Chinese mandarin ever went the length of asserting that when an army was routed, it only "receded," and, under an imaginary "strategic movement," veiling a crushing defeat. President Lincoln, by offering incredibly large bounties to the offscourings of Europe, may raise regiment after regiment, and call the combined mass an army. He may manufacture paper by the ton, and call it money, and exult in the thought that, having an unlimited supply of men and money at his command, he must, sooner or later, vanquish the rebellious South. He lacks some things, however, without which his thousands of soldiers and millions of notes are worse than useless. The object for which he is striving is ignoble, and the men through whose instrumentality he hopes to attain it are utterly incompetent. Moreover, there are numbers of influential Northerners interested in the purposeless waste of money and the indefinite prolongation of the war. The Confederate President occupies a different and far more enviable position. His material resources are not a tithe of those at the command of his adversary; he cannot entice needy foreigners to his standard by the offer of large bounties and the prospect of high pay; he cannot bribe trading politicians with lucrative official appointments, and thereby compel them to sound his praises and commend his skill. In all of these things President Jefferson Davis is no match for his opponent; but in other and more important matters the Confederate President stands on a vantage ground which the Federal President cannot reach. He is the chosen chief of a free and United people. That people has risen as one man, in order to defend its territory, and to maintain its indisputable rights. The Confederate army is composed of volunteers, who ask for no other reward than to be led against the enemy. Himself a man of proved military talents, President Jefferson Davis has under him some of the bravest and ablest generals who ever organized and marshalled armies. But he is strongest of all in this, that, while the cause for which his opponents die in swamps and on the battle-field is the subjugation of a free people, while their victory would be succeeded by the exercise of remorseless tyranny, the cause for which he contends is the cause of liberty, and the result of its triumph would be the addition of a powerful and independent State to the fraternity of nations.

"R."

DIFFERENTIAL TARIFFS.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

July 15, 1862.

SIR,—I thank you for permitting my letter on the subject of "Differential Tariffs" to appear in THE INDEX. It must seem, and indeed I feel, that it really is presumptuous in one who occupies no standing place in Southern affairs, to obtrude his opinions on Southern policy; but the deep and heartfelt interest which I entertain for the South will, I venture to hope, be accepted as my apology.

But I am very anxious that it should not be supposed that I meant to cast any peculiar blame—much less reproach—on the South for its proceedings in 1816. It did nothing more at that time than follow the miserable example of England and the rest of Europe, in adopting the protective system. But it did not the less, on that account, make a sad mistake, and, in its peculiar condition, as being the sole producer of a raw material of incalculable value to the whole world, a mistake fatal, alas! to all its subsequent welfare and happiness. It certainly does appear to me to be of paramount importance at this moment, that the Southern public should become fully aware of this fact, when it has to reconstruct all its external relations.

In the beginning of a new national consolidation people are all warm, in every direction, with fraternal sympathy—shaking hands with each other, as it were—backing each other up—prone to assent to almost any proposals springing from motives evidently sincere and patriotic, without much scrutiny into the remoter effects on public welfare likely to arise from them. In this happy state of the public mind any well-meaning zealot who may cry out, "Let us depend upon ourselves for everything and encourage one another—let us tan our own national leather—grow, dye, and weave our own national wool—make our own national knives, forks, spoons—use parched corn and shoe-leaves instead of foreign coffee and tea, &c., &c.," is sure to find some audience in patriotic ears; but when a general policy of this character is adopted, how is a nation to make friends and allies with other nations, and exchange what may be its own peculiar products against theirs?

The frightful consequences of such a policy are strikingly visible in the actual condition of the South. Suppose it had refused, in 1816, to assent to a protective tariff in favour of Yankee ships, where now would be that maritime power which the North is now wailing to its destruction? No such thing would, or could, have existed. The maritime power of the North has been built entirely upon the carrying trade of the South—and this amounted last year to the enormous amount of £80,000,000 in value! No wonder that the North is fighting with all the malignant energy of despair to secure this vast element of profit and power; for the entire loss of it—certain to ensue if the South establishes its independence—will at once reduce the North to a nullity as an offensive Power, and make to the South friends and allies of every nation which shall send its ships to take off its cotton and tobacco.

The native nautical population of the North is very scanty indeed—scarcely exceeding a few thousands; and in 1839, when I was in the States, there were more than 40,000 English sailors in Yankee employ, independent of Dutch, Germans, Scandinavians, &c., &c. That number is now considerably greater, and it is these men who are now manning the war ships of the North, and blockading and shelling Southern cities. These men will readily man the future Southern navy, and the larger portions of what has hitherto been the Northern maritime power will be transferred to the South, provided the South itself shall not artificially check the transference by madly resorting to "discriminating duties," differential tariffs, and that delusive system of protection which is so attractive to the blind and narrow selfishness of the human heart. Its own coasting trade must necessarily fall to the South; its own merchants will purchase ships where they can find them best and cheapest, and if events hereafter should evince that they can profitably appropriate a portion of the carrying trade with Europe, as will most probably prove to be the case, the South will come into possession of it naturally, and will hold it permanently by a secure tenure. Boston, New York, and Philadelphia will have nothing to carry but the corn and provisions of the West, and of these articles one-half will speedily be transferred to Canada. The Confederate Government cannot do better, in constructing its future marine than follow the examples of Russia, Spain, &c. &c., and build its war ships in England, New Brunswick, and elsewhere, and I believe that in less than one generation the South will become the wonder and glory of America.

It is the prospect of this which terrifies the North; by the Secession of the South which they have so long, owing to its sad mistake in 1816, held in wretched vassalage, they see the inevitable loss of all their commercial and political power; and so certain is this to ensue, that they will persevere in this brutal war to their last man and last dollar, in the vain and desperate hope of retaining their nefarious dominion. They fight to fix the Morrill Tariff on the South, and for nothing else whatever. I say this emphatically; I call attention to this in the strongest manner, because it is a fact which is in no wise understood in Europe. It is, however, the "great governing fact" in this terrific struggle, and they who look to an intervention or mediation of France or Russia as a means of peace, are the dupes of their own honest feelings and erroneous judgment. The North will never consent to any peace or compromise which should deprive it of the commercial and maritime dominion of the South; and this the Southerners will never consent to yield in any shape or in any degree.

JOHN W. COWELL.

41, Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park.

OPPOSITION TO THE REVOLUTIONARY TAX BILL.

(From the Standard.)

The news brought from New York by the China is, without exception, the most grave and threatening that ever reached these shores from the same quarter. Passing over the Federal defeat at Charleston, the suppression of the news from Virginia by Mr. Stanton, the precarious position of the Federal General Curtis in Arkansas, the appearance of Confederate cavalry on the line of the railway between Memphis and Corinth, the refusal of the Nashville clergy to take the oath of allegiance, and the cry raised in New York to stop the exportation of gold to Europe, we have only to direct the attention of the public to two circumstances to create a most painful feeling. General Butler, the Haynau of the present war, has, we are informed, issued an amended oath to be taken by the foreigners in New Orleans, and the New Orleans Delta, of which General Butler is the reputed editor, has "assumed an offensive tone of ridicule to the foreign Consuls, but more especially to the British Consul." This is one of the two circumstances; and its gravity lies in this, that it is incompetent for General Butler to require foreigners in New Orleans to take oaths. Foreigners, the subjects of Powers at peace with the Federal Government, residing in New Orleans, stand in precisely the same relation to the Federal Government as foreigners living in London to the British Government, the war notwithstanding. It would be an outrage on the subjects of Powers with which this country is at peace, for the British Government to prescribe oaths to be taken by such subjects; and as there was no such attempt during the Russian war, even to subjects of Russia, the practice is without precedent and at variance with the common law of nations. The conduct of General Butler must, therefore, be disavowed by his Government, or Europe will have to choose between supporting its protest by force of arms, and allowing the usages of war to be strained at the pleasure of a belligerent powerless to gain his object in the usual way, and by the usual means. "Offensive ridicule" to the foreign Consuls in New Orleans, and more especially to the British Consul, is a kind of barbarism to be expected from the Indians of the Hudson Bay territory, and must, of course, be the immediate subject of apology by the Federal Government.

The other circumstance to which we have to direct attention bears more immediately on the Americans than on ourselves. We are, on the one hand, told that President Lincoln, in answer to an address signed by the governors of eighteen States, has issued a proclamation calling for 300,000 additional troops for the vigorous prosecution of the war; and, on the other hand, we are told that an enthusiastic public meeting has been held at the Cooper Institute, in New York, in favour of peace. We are further told that the Conservative members of Congress have held a meeting in Washington, no doubt for the same purpose. This antagonism of sentiment and intention is primarily the concern of the Northern States. Remotely, however, Europe is seriously concerned in this new complication. Simultaneous meetings in New York and Washington for a purpose hostile to a Government with the keys of Port Lafayette and Fort Warren in its hands, are suggestive of ripe organized resistance to the course which the Federal Government is pursuing. The Peace Party appears to be at length feeling itself strong enough to enforce peace; and that, we need hardly say, means nothing less than the overthrow of the Government and party of which President Lincoln is the chief. A counter-revolution of this sort—which, by the way, has been long foreseen—would at once bring the Northern States down to the level of distracted Mexico, and that to Europe would be a great and trying evil. What may have been supposed to have given consistency and courage to the Peace Party is the Tax Bill, now become law, but not yet in force. The principle of that measure, we grieve to say, is the total subversion of state law and state government. The Tax Bill remorselessly sweeps away all the great landmarks which the Constitution of the United States recognized, and erects the Federal Government into a despotism pure and simple. This we might show by quotations from the bill, and quotations from the constitutions and laws of the various States, wherein, in the latter, it is specially provided that in the case of homesteads to the value of £200, implements of husbandry, farm stock, tools of trade, household furnishings, and every necessary for the proper maintenance of a family, there shall be no levy and sale on execution, or distraint for rent or taxes; while in the former, the bill provides in various sections, but in the nineteenth particularly, "That it shall be lawful for such collector or his deputies to proceed to collect the said duties or taxes, with 10 per cent. additional thereto, as aforesaid, by distraint and sale of chattels or effects of the persons delinquent as aforesaid." Then again, the Tax Bill sets aside the law of "mechanics' lien" in so far that the tax-gatherer must be paid before the labourer and mechanic, who hitherto, in all the States, have had the first claim in respect of their labour on all the work on which they have been employed. Hence the revolutionary character of the Tax Bill. The States' rights and the States' sovereignty, corner-stones of the Republic, are both overthrown, and the presumption, therefore, is that if the party of Fernando Wood and his brother is to try its strength against the Federal Government, the support of the labouring classes and of the small proprietors is counted on in the struggle.

For armed resistance to the Federal Government the Western States may be soon prepared. Let it once be fairly understood that the Western homestead, the shanty, the farmyard, and the workshop, in violation of state constitutions and state laws, are to be invaded by the Federal tax-gatherer, and despoiled, and Western love for the Union will be more severely tried than Southern loyalty before the war. The Western States are the great refuge of the financially distressed of Europe. There, also, European socialism has taken root and flourished under laws which are congenial, because framed and passed in the State Legislatures through the influence, if not by the votes, of Parliamentary members of the socialistic body. Such men need little preparation to preserve intact the privileges and immunities they now enjoy; and the Union to them is a mere abstraction, desirable, no doubt, at some time or other, but not worth the sacrifices which Congress and the President now exact. Union at the price of a tariff which is prohibitive, implies almost all that is disadvantageous to the West; but at the price of the subversion of the Western rights of property, or rather of the Western rights of debtors, it is equivalent to confiscation and utter ruin. The West, we may rest assured, will be the next to fight or the first to second counter-revolution in New York. Whether the process of Republican disintegration is to proceed further, with bloodshed, woman whipping, and rapine, Parliament may as well decide before the session closes. Lord Russell no doubt believes the thing impossible. So he thought about the present war, and he was wrong.

THE BATTLE NEAR HARLESTON.

From the Charleston Mercury, of the 18th June, we copy the following account of the fight at Secessionville:—

Secessionville is a small village, the summer retreat of a few of the James Island planters. It is on the eastern side of the island, on a high plat of land lying on a bold creek, which winds through the marshes between James' and Morris' (or Folly) Island, and empties into the Stono River near its mouth. This creek runs immediately up to Secessionville. On the west of the village a short, shallow creek makes its way towards the waters of Charleston bay. Thus a tongue of land is formed between the two creeks. It is connected with the body of the island by a narrow neck of thirty yards width, some 400 or 500 yards south of Secessionville. Here Lamar's battery is located, across the high land, and flanked on each side by marsh and the creeks. It is a simple earthwork, heavily constructed, having a plain face, with an obtuse angle at each side. It faces south, in the direction of Battery Island, Legare's, Rivers', and Grimald's plantations, on the Stono River, which is about two miles off.

From this point the cleared high land stretches out towards the Stono River, like the top of a funnel, for the distance of near a mile, interrupted only by the division lines between fields, hedges, and ditches. These fields are covered with weeds three feet high. The edges of high land and marsh are skirted with brushwood and sea myrtles. In the background are patches of wood between these fields and the Stono. On the borders of these woods, three batteries of the enemy are located; and, besides these land batteries, the gunboats, approaching by way of the Secessionville creek, can open fire as they please. For the last fortnight, a fight at long law has been going on at intervals between the Secessionville battery and the guns of the enemy, and our artillerymen have been much fagged by their watching and exertions. They have done much to keep the foe in check.

On Sunday night, two companies, consisting of the Charleston Light Infantry, from the Charleston Battalion, under Captain T. Simons, and Company A., Captain Smart, from Smith's Battalion, were thrown out half a mile in front of the work. The rest of the men of these two battalions of infantry, stationed at Secessionville to support the battery, were laboriously occupied during the night. The two companies of Lamar's South Carolina Volunteer Artillery—Reid's and Kiett's—were also engaged in labour until a half-hour of dawn, when they were ordered by Colonel Lamar to take a nap. At break of day the pickets came running in just before the advancing foe. When Colonel Lamar was notified, and looked out from the work he was to defend, the enemy had approached to within 400 yards. But twenty-five of the garrison were awake. It was a complete surprise, and nothing but the nerve, promptitude, and energy of the officers, especially the commanding officer, saved the battery from easy capture. The first round was fired when the column was within thirty paces of the guns. It was well directed by Colonel Lamar himself. The shot burst through the closed ranks with great havoc, and the foe soon retired.

The weary men, startled by the sound, or aroused by shakes and bayonet punches from their officers, sprang to their guns. The two infantry battalions rushed to their quarters for their weapons, formed under their officers, and came to the assistance of the gunners. Three land batteries, two sections of field artillery, and three gunboats, began to open upon the work. The second charge of the enemy was made and repulsed with slaughter. And again the third. The accurate fire of our riflemen, co-operating with the deadly charges of grape and canister, swept the field in front and cut down the skirmishers, who, deploying on the left flank under cover of some bushes, had come up to the very work at that angle. In these successful efforts, which occurred by five o'clock in the morning, Colonel Lamar fell from the effect of a Minie ball striking him through the lower part of the ear, and running round his neck under the skin.

To his cool courage and energy, in the early part of the action, is due the preservation of the position, under circumstances of great peril, from the surprise. His brave example and personal efforts greatly inspired his command.

After Colonel Lamar was wounded he was unable to stand, from his great loss of blood, and was carried off as soon as practicable. His place in the battery was filled by that able, accomplished, and indefatigable officer of the regular artillery, Lieutenant-Colonel T. M. Wagner—being the next officer in rank present. As Colonel Gaillard had been stationed at the post with his battalion for some time, and had done good service, Colonel Wagner, who was only temporarily there, requested him to assume command, adding that he would aid him and take charge of the battery. This he did until the conclusion of the fight, between eight and nine o'clock, sustaining a terrible flank fire, and directing the gunnery with great coolness and precision.

Upon failing to storm the work or to flank it on the left or eastward side, the enemy drew off and came up on the right flank, on the other side of the small creek and north to the marsh. Here, at the short distance of about 150 yards, three regiments deploying in line of battle, and partially covered by a small growth of underbrush, poured upon the gunners of the work, and upon the two batteries of infantry drawn up facing them across the marsh, a continuous and deadly fire. The gun-carriages were perforated and torn by many balls. Many of our men fell at the guns and along the line formed to the rearward of the battery on its right flank. The contest was very unequal and trying. It raged for some time; but at this critical juncture the Louisiana battalion came up gallantly, at the double-quick, under its skilful officer, Lieutenant-Colonel M'Henry. By the guidance of Major Hudson, of Smith's battalion, it formed on the right of that corps, facing the marsh. This reinforcement and its gallant fire disheartened the foe. Captain Boyce, with one gun of light artillery, began to play on his rear. He began to fall back, fairly beaten off.

While the struggle was progressing immediately on the rear right flank of the battery against these three regiments, a formidable force of the foe attempted, by passing further out to the west, to gain the rear of our position. But in skirting a wood they came upon the advancing lines of the Eutaw Regiment, Colonel Simonton, who had come two miles. Declaring they were friends—not to shoot—they got close up and fired into our men, killing many. But the response they got was cutting. The wood edge was strewn with the dying and the dead. Thirty or forty bodies were picked up here. The movement was foiled. Nothing was left but retreat from every portion of the field.

It was a bloody fight, fought against odds, by exhausted men, without preparation. It was a signal victory of Southern patriots over the murderous invaders of their soil. The five regiments attacking are said to be the 79th New York Highlanders, the 8th Michigan, one from Massachusetts, a New Hampshire, and a Connecticut regiment. But for the distance of our other troops, and the brief time occupied in the action, together with obstructions in the road preventing the passage of light artillery to the enemy's rear, their whole force may, perhaps, have been taken or cut up. From the account of prisoners, who assert that there were nine United States' regiments out that morning, it is probable that four regiments were held in reserve to support the five engaged, and to protect their retreat.

The following is the congratulatory order of General Pemberton:—

"The Major-General commanding the Department tenders his heartfelt thanks to every officer and soldier of this command whose happy fortune it was to participate in the glorious work of Monday, the 16th of June inst.

"To the gallant and indefatigable Colonel T. G. Lamar, and to the brave men who so steadfastly supported him, especial thanks are due; and to the noble dead a debt of deep and lasting gratitude."

THE EFFECT OF THE WAR NEWS IN NEW YORK.—The Times correspondent, writing on the 2nd July, says:—All day on Sunday there was a vague feeling, not traceable to any direct source, that the Federal armies had suffered a signal defeat before Richmond. Late in the evening a statement was made that there had been a battle, that it was not a decisive one; but that it was unmistakably a victory. Yesterday morning it was announced in all the papers that there had been fighting; that General McClellan had made a successful movement; but that the Government imperatively forbade the publication of the particulars. This did not look like victory; and the people, who are not so easily hoodwinked as the official mind imagines construed the prohibition to mean that McClellan had been defeated. The whole city was in a state of the most intense excitement. The sultry air was sultrier with rumours of disaster. Wall-street was almost demoralized with alarm, and every kind of stock went down. The Illinois Central Railway Shares tumbled 2 per cent.; Eries, $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.; New York Centrals, $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and Government stocks found no purchasers at a decline of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The friends of the South, who, in ordinary circumstances, say but little, were jubilant with delight, while the enemies of McClellan, who deny his generalship, because he has no sympathies with the negro, and cares nothing for the abolition of slavery, were equally pleased at the idea of his discomfiture which seemed to be but the accomplishment of their own prophecies. The crowds before the newspaper offices were so dense as to render the street impassable for hours, and amid all the buzz and hum of the conflicting rumours that every moment brought forth, changing and shifting from disaster to victory, and from victory to disaster, was to be heard one deep, unvarying growl of discontent against the Secretary of War, who would not let the truth be known, whatever might be its character. At length came authentic details, published in an extra of one of the morning papers, from which it appeared that there had been three days' hard fighting; that the struggle virtually commenced on Wednesday, and was renewed on Thursday and Friday; and that the results were fearful slaughter on both sides, the abandonment by McClellan of his position on the Pamunkey River and the White House, and his occupation of a new line of battle and a new base of operations between the Chickahominy and the James. To-day the best face is put upon the matter by Wall-street and the press. It is loudly maintained that the fight was a victory, but those who are fain to believe that it was so, are compelled to admit that the circumstances are woefully like a defeat.

GENERAL "STONEWALL" JACKSON.

A Martinsburg correspondent relates several interesting incidents of General Thomas Jefferson Jackson, but generally known as "Stonewall" Jackson. We copy the following:—

His family, though by no means wealthy, was one of extensive and influential ramifications; socially and politically their status has always been high, even in aristocratic Virginia; and it was this advantage, perhaps, which saved our hero from neglect when he was turned upon the world a very poor young orphan; for it was by family influence, exerted in behalf of intellectual and moral promise, that he was made a West Point cadet at the age of seventeen. It was his own cousin, Judge Jackson, of the United States Court, who spoke from Winchester last month on the approach of Thomas Jefferson, recently petrified into "Stonewall." His pertinacity in procuring his cadetship shows the man. Being then a resident of Clarksburg, in Western Virginia, he walked from that place to Washington, bearing with him letters of recommendation to the Congressional representative of his district, urging the claims of Jackson to a cadetship at West Point Academy. After some delay at the capital, his application was successful; and, with his commission in his pocket, he travelled on foot all the way from the capital to West Point, there to receive the rudiments of the science of Stonewall.

He was graduated with high honours in the same class with McClellan, just as the Mexican war broke out, immediately entered service with General Scott as a brevet-lieutenant, and was made full lieutenant for gallant conduct in the memorable campaign from Vera Cruz to Mexico.

As for his outer man, he looks at least seven years older than he is—his height 5 feet 10 inches; his figure thick-set, square shouldered, and decidedly clumsy; his gait very awkward, stooping, and with long strides. He often walks with his head somewhat on one side, and his eyes fixed upon the ground, imparting to his whole appearance that abstracted quality which young ladies describe as "absent-minded." A lady who has known him long and well, has told me that she never saw him on horseback without laughing—short stirrups, knees cramped up, heels stuck out behind, and chie on his breast—a most unmilitary phenomenon. In society he is quiet, but cheerful; not loquacious, but intelligent and shrewd; in religion the bluest kind of a Presbyterian, and extremely strict in his church observances. In Winchester he took a very active part in revivals, and habitually led the Union Prayer Meetings.

To illustrate the popularity of the man:—For some reason which has never been made public, the expediency of removing him from his command was at one time freely discussed in the Confederate Cabinet, and all but two members favoured the motion. These two, arguing that a man of such exemplary modesty, and yet of such intense religious enthusiasm and indomitable firmness, must possess those moral elements which, combined with his military education and experience, should constitute a great general. Their opposition served to postpone a decision, and the motion was held under a consideration. Meantime the people of the Valley got wind of the affair, and with a great cry of indignation and threats, so assailed the powers at Richmond, that the question was dropped "like a hot potato." It was about this time that Jackson sent to Richmond his rebel-famous despatch:—"send me more men and no orders, or more orders and no men."

Such is the Confederate Napoleon, for whom his people venture to claim that in four weeks he has marched 350 miles, and won four victories—that he has crippled or dispersed the forces of Milroy and Schenck at McDowell, Banks at Front Royal and Winchester, Fremont at Cross Keys, and Shields at Port Republic—that he holds McDowell in check to take care of Washington and Maryland, and monopolizes, for the amusement of the world, the attention of six distinguished generals.

When lately he fell back to Winchester from pursuing Banks, he said to the people there: "When we left you last March, we promised to return—and here we are. Now, with much more confidence, we promise to return again, and soon. Only be prudent and patient."

And to the women: "When the Union troops come in again, as they will, do not forget yourselves."

Just as I am closing this I get a fresh and interesting anecdote of this fighting elder:—

The surgeon of one of the Indian regiments and two of his brother officers were captured by a party of Ashby's Cavalry and taken before Jackson. Immediately on hearing their names, he said: "It was you, gentlemen, who lately saved the property of a dear friend of mine in the valley from the fury of your own men. I thank you. Have you any means of transportation back to your regiment?"

"We have not, General."

He then gave them horses, an escort, and $100, and then courteously dismissed them on their parole.

This is authentic. I have it from one of the captured officers, whose name I am not at liberty to mention.

GENERAL BUTLER AND THE FOREIGN CONSULS.

We reprint the following from the New Orleans Picayune, which is at present under the supervision of the Federal Press Censors appointed by General Butler. The first two letters refer to the non-recognition of the British Acting Consul:—

British Consulate, New Orleans, La., June 14, 1862.

Sir,—I beg to inform you that great doubt exists in the minds of British subjects who, under the provisions of your Order No. 41, are called upon to subscribe the oath therein set forth, as to the consequence of compliance with the behests of that order.

I would therefore respectfully request that you will inform me whether the oath prescribed in the first instance is intended, or in your understanding can be construed, to affect the natural allegiance they owe to the Government of their nativity.

Objections have also been very generally urged against the oath prescribed to duly registered aliens, on the ground that it imposes on them (in words at least) the office of spy, and forces them to acts inconsistent with the ordinary obligations of probity, honour, and neutrality.

Hoping that I may receive such explanations as may obviate the difficulties suggested,

I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,
GEORGE COPPELL, Her British Majesty's Acting Consul.
Major-General B. F. Butler, U. S. A., Commanding Department of the Gulf, &c., New Orleans.

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, June 14, 1862.

Sir,—I am directed by the Major-General Commanding, to inform you that no answer is to be given to the note of George Coppel, Esq., of this date, until his credentials and pretensions are recognized by his own Government and the Government of the United States. All attempts at official action on Mr. Coppel's part must cease. His credentials have been sought for, but not exhibited.

I have the honour to be, your obedient servant,
P. HAGGERTY, Capt. and A. A. Gen.
George Coppel, Esq., Acting Consul of Her Britannic Majesty, New Orleans.

The rest of the correspondence needs no introduction, but explains itself. The last paragraphs of General Butler's letter are truly remarkable:—

New Orleans, June 11, 1862.

Sir,—It has been represented to the undersigned by Mr. Covas, of the commercial firm of Covas and Negroponte, carrying on business in this city, that certain sugars bought by that firm conjointly with Messrs. Ralli, Benachi, and Co., also carrying on business here, are not allowed to be sold or taken from the place in which said sugars are stored, without further orders from you.

We beg here to state that Mr. Covas represents to the undersigned that the sugars in question (3205 hogsheads) have been bought for, and are the property of, British, French, and Greek subjects, and with which fact you are already acquainted.

The purchases of these sugars were effected at various times, ranging from January to March last, paid for at the time of purchase in the usual manner in which such business is carried on here by foreign commercial houses when purchasing for account of distant parties, i.e., by the proceeds of bills of exchange, drawn by the purchaser here upon the bona fide owner of the produce.

These transactions were strictly mercantile, and feeling assured by the proclamation issued by you under date of May 1—had they had any fears before—that this, the property of foreigners, was safe, and would be accorded that protection, as stated in the proclamation, which had been granted heretofore to such property, under the United States' laws, the purchasers of these sugars were anxious to ship them at a time when other such shipments were being made; but by your order, as stated above, were prevented, thereby entailing upon the foreign owners great loss. But as the undersigned are disposed to waive all past proceedings, they beg that the order not permitting the removal of the produce in question be rescinded, and that the sugars be at the disposal of the purchasers, to do with them as they may seem fit; or that the undersigned, if compatible, in consideration of the interests concerned, be placed in possession of the facts which caused such order to be issued; the enforcing and existence of which materially retards and stops the legitimate business of our countrymen.

We beg to remain, sir, your obedient servants,
(Signed)
GEORGE COPPELL, H. B. M.'s Acting Consul.
C. H. MEJAN, French Consul.
M. W. BENACHI, Greek Consul.
To Major-General Benj. F. Butler,
Commanding Department of the Gulf, New Orleans, La.

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, June 12, 1862.

Gentlemen,—In the matter of the sugars in possession of Mr. Covas, who is the only party known to the United States' authorities, I have examined with care the statement you have sent me. I had information, the sources of which you will not expect me to disclose, that Mr. Covas had been engaged in buying Confederate notes, giving for them sterling exchange, thus transferring abroad the credit of the States in the rebellion, and enabling these bills of credit to be converted into bullion, to be used there, as it has been, for the purpose of purchasing arms and munitions of war; that Mr. Covas was one of the agent of an association or company of Greek merchants residing here, in London, and in Havannah, who had set apart a large fund for this enterprize; that these Confederate notes so purchased by Mr. Covas had been used in the purchase of sugars and cotton, of which the sugars in question, in value almost $200,000, are a part.

I directed Mr. Covas to hold these sugars until this matter could be investigated.

I am satisfied of the substantial truth of this information. Mr. Covas's own books will show the important facts that he sold sterling exchange for Confederate Treasury notes, and then bought these sugars with the notes.

Now, this is claimed to be "strictly mercantile."
It will not be denied that the sugars were intended for a foreign market.

But the Government of the United States had said that with the port of New Orleans there should be no "strictly mercantile" transactions.

It would not be contended for a moment that the exchanging of specie for Confederate Treasury notes, and sending the specie to Europe, to enable the rebels to buy arms and munitions of war there were not a breach of the blockade, as well as a violation of the neutrality laws, and the proclamation of their Majesties, the Queen of Great Britain and the Emperor of France. What distinguishes the two cases, save that drawing the sterling bills is a more safe and convenient way of eluding the laws, than sending bullion in specie, and thus assist the rebellion in the point of its utmost need?

It will be claimed that to assist the rebellion was not the motive.

Granted "causa argumendi!"

It was done from the desire of gain, as doubtless all the violations of neutrality have been done by aliens during this war—a motive which is not sanctifying to acts by a foreigner, which, if done by a subject, would be treason or a high misdemeanour.

My proclamation of May 1, assured respect to all persons and property that were respectable. It was not an amnesty to murderers, thieves, and criminals of deeper dye, or less heinousness, nor a mantle to cover the property of those aiders of the rebellion, whether citizens or aliens, whom I might find here. If numbers of the foreign residents here have been engaged in aiding the rebellion, either directly or indirectly, from a spirit of gain, and they now find themselves objects of watchful supervision by the authorities of the United States, they will console themselves with the reflection that they are only getting the "bitter with the sweet." Nay, more, if honest and quiet foreign citizens find themselves the objects of suspicion to, and even their honest acts subjects of investigation by, the authorities of the United States, to their inconvenience, they will, upon reflection, blame only the over-rapacious and greedy of their fellow-citizens, who have, by their aid to rebellion, brought distrust and suspicion over all. Wishing to treat you, gentlemen, with every respect, I have set forth at length some of the reasons which have prompted my action. There is one phrase in your letter which I do not understand, and cannot permit to pass without calling attention to it. You say, "the undersigned are disposed to waive all past proceedings," &c.

What "proceedings" have you, or either of you, to "waive" if you do feel disposed so to do? What right have you in the matter? What authority is vested in you by the laws of nations, or of this country, which gives you the power to use such language to the representative of the United States, in a quasi official communication?

Commercial agents merely of a subordinate class, Consuls have no power to waive or condone any proceedings, past or present, of the Government under whose protection they are permitted to reside, so long as they behave well. If I have committed any wrong to Mr. Covas, you have no power to "waive," or pardon the penalty or prevent his having redress. If he has committed any wrong to the United States, you have still less power to shield him from punishment.

I take leave to suggest, as a possible explanation of this sentence, that you have been so long dealing with a rebel Confederation, which has been supplicating you to make such representations to the Governments, whose subjects you are, as would induce your sovereigns to aid it in its traitorous designs, that you have become rusty in the language proper to be used in representing the claims of your fellow-citizens to the consideration of a great and powerful government, entitled to equal respect with your own.

In order to prevent all misconception, and that for the future you gentlemen may know exactly the position upon which I act, in regard to foreigners resident here, permit me to explain to you, that I think a foreigner resident here has not one right more than an American citizen, but, at least, one right less, i.e., that of meddling or interfering, by discussion, vote, or otherwise, with the affairs of the Government.

I have the honour to subscribe myself,
Your obedient servant,
B. F. BUTLER,
Major-General Commanding.
Messrs. George Coppel, claiming to be H. B. M. Acting Consul, A. Meján; French Consul; M. W. Benachi, Greek Consul.

FEDERAL RETRIBUTION ON WOMEN AND CHILDREN.—The commanding officer of the United States' steamer Wiconia, Lieutenant F. T. Nichols, lately addressed a letter to the authorities of Rodney, Mississippi, from which the following is an extract:—"You are doubtless aware that the town of Grand Gulf was fired upon, a short time since, by some of the vessels of the United States' Government, as a punishment for permitting a battery to fire upon some of our transport steamers while passing down. I deem it my duty to inform you that should any battery of artillery fire upon any of our vessels while passing up or down, from or near the town of Rodney, the punishment for the offence will be visited on the town. We are not here to war upon unarmed or peaceable persons, and we would deprecate any event compelling us to fire upon the property of inoffensive people." This letter was replied to by Major-General Lovell, as follows:—"When two nations are at war, it has become customary among civilized people to 'punish the offence' or an attack by the armed force of one upon those of the other by a combat with the attacking party. If such attack be made from a town, the assaulting party is not entitled to, and so far as our troops are concerned, does not claim any immunity by reason of the presence of women and children. What we do claim, however, and insist upon, is, that whenever your vessels or transports are fired upon by our troops, they shall not hasten to the nearest collection of 'unarmed and peaceable' women and children, and wreak their vengeance upon them, as was done lately at Grand Gulf by United States' vessels, in retaliation for an attack with which the town had no more to do than had the city of St. Louis. My batteries are located at such points upon the river as are deemed best suited for the desired purposes, and without reference to or connection with the people of the towns. Should the site happen to fall within a village, you, of course, are at liberty to return the fire. Should it be in the vicinity of one, however, the usages of civilized warfare do not justify its destruction unless demanded by the necessities of attack or defence. I cannot bring myself to believe that the barbarous and cowardly policy indicated in the enclosed letter will meet with the approval of any officer of rank or standing in the United States' navy. I have, therefore, thought proper to transmit it to you under a flag of truce, with the confident expectation that you will direct those under your command to confine their offensive operations as far as possible to our troops, and prevent the wanton destruction of defenceless towns, filled with unoffending non-combatants, unless required by imperative military necessity. The practice of slaying women and children as an act of retaliation has happily fallen into disuse in this country with the disappearance of the Indian tribes, and I trust it will not be revived by the officers of the United States' navy, but that the demolition and plunder of the unoffending little village of Grand Gulf may be permitted to stand alone and without parallel upon the record."

HOW GENERAL BUTLER MAKES MEN CONVICT THEMSELVES.—General Butler heard of a conspiracy between six men, French and Spanish creoles, to take his life. Four of them were arrested and brought before General Butler. They protested their innocence; but they were ordered to be chained together until they should conclude to divulge the secrets of the conspiracy.—N. O. Picayune.

THE BATTLE OF CROSS KEYS.—The subjoined account of the affair is from the Lynchburg Virginian, received from an officer who participated in the engagement:—"The battle-ground is five miles from Port Republic. General Ewell's division fought this action, and chiefly by Brigadier-General Trimble's brigade on the right, who, by skillful selection of his position, and judicious manoeuvres, with 1705 men, defeated in four several charges two full brigades of the enemy, numbering over 6000 men and two batteries of artillery; killing and wounding of the enemy over 2000, and with a loss in his own brigade of over 124 killed and wounded. Perhaps no action during the war has exhibited such brilliant results, obtained by skill in manoeuvring on the field, as well as hard fighting."

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND
CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Runford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.

Represented by
JOS. T. ROBINSON & CO.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rilled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

THE ONLY PAMPHLET ON THE AMERICAN QUESTION WITH A MAP.

WHY PENNSYLVANIA
SHOULD BECOME ONE OF THE CON-FEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA. By a Native of Pennsylvania. With a large Map of the Federal and Confederate States, distinguished by colours.
London: JOHN WILSON, Bookseller and Publisher, 53, Great Russell-street. Five doors west of the British Museum.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A.
Represented by R. G. BEESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States, Commissions for books and
goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES;
Their Origin and the Remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: Houghton, New Bond-street.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDER-ICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published the following Catalogues of their Stock:—

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books, Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP-CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History,
Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Material Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign
Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of effecting this alliance, the Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be sustained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Larpier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

GENTLEMEN requiring an excellent Tailor are recommended to the establishments of A. M. GAUTIER, 220, Regent-street, London (above Verrey's Restaurant), and 20, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bolin.
Nina Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 690,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 865,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1855.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Pont.
C. Hould.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Stocomb.
B. F. Voorhier.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,870 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,959 55
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 1st September, 1861.

Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primage.

PATTERN PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Does not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Ship Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquasfortis, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and any person who shall send by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur
a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board
any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of
a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum
Stamped. Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XII. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little
had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they
retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a per-
plexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—July 17, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.
OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I.—No. 13.] LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JULY 24, 1862. [PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	193
OBITUARY	194
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	194
Manchester Letter	195
THE TOBACCO MARKET	195
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
The Battles of the 27th and 28th June	195
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	196
Berlin	196
Paris	196
Washington	197
MR. LINDSAY'S MOTION	198
EXTRACTS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS	199
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR	199
LEADERS—
The Features of the War	200
The Position of Canada in the American War	200
The "Mean Whites" of the South	201
The Debate on the American Question	203
Editorials	204
THE CRUISE OF THE SUMTER—
A Yankee Skipper	204
Burning Prizes	205
REVIEWS—
Southern Statistics—
The Distribution of Property, Schools, and Churches	205
The Presidential Contest of 1860	206
The Church in the Army	207
ADVERTISEMENTS	208

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE report, per Glasgow, which agitated the public on Friday last, of the offer of M'Clellan's army to surrender, is not confirmed, and it has not been substantially contradicted. It did not surrender we may learn from the latest Federal reports, but it does not follow the offer was not made. We are now better informed of the extent of the disaster that befell the army of the Potomac than we were last week. The view we then took that the Federals were routed on June 27, and pursued by the victors until July 2, is fully confirmed by subsequent intelligence. It is true that flight was marked by tremendous battles, for the Federals fought for position after position, but found themselves powerless to resist the relentless onslaught of the foe until they were under the protection of their gunboats. Even then they deemed it necessary, though exhausted by a week's fighting, to throw up entrenchments, and under such circumstances it is not without the range of possibility that there was an offer of conditional surrender; and it certainly is but reasonable that the Confederates, flushed with victory, should have refused any compromise. Even the New York papers are obliged to admit that the army has sustained a severe defeat. The correspondent of the New York Tribune thus writes, in reference to the battle of June 27:—

Scores of gallant officers endeavoured to rally and reform the stragglers, but in vain; while many officers forgot the pride of their shoulder straps and the honour of their manhood, and herded with sneaks and cowards.

Another ominous sign is the continued reticence of the Washington Government; and that the publication of war news is still forbidden, unless it has been previously edited and sanctioned by Mr. Stanton.

The loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, is variously estimated, and possibly it will not fall short of a total of 40,000 men.

On the 4th, the Federals were reported to be throwing up breastworks at Hampton, two miles from Fortress Monroe, and the Federals are now the besieged instead of being the besiegers.

Though thoroughly beaten and obliged to act on the defensive, General M'Clellan has issued the following congratulatory address to his army. Instead of offering any comment on this unprecedented document, we refer our readers to a leader on the subject which appeared in the Times of Monday, and which we publish in another part of our impression:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Camp near Harrison's Landing, July 4.

Soldiers of the Army of the Potomac,—Your achievements of the last ten days have illustrated the valour and endurance of the American soldier attacked by superior forces and without hope of reinforcements. You have succeeded in changing your base of operations by a flank movement, always regarded as the most hazardous of military expedients. You have saved all your material, all your trains, and all your guns, except a few lost in battle, taking in return guns and colours from the enemy. Upon your march you have been assailed day after day with desperate fury by men of the same race and nation, skilfully massed and led. Under every disadvantage of number, and necessarily of position also, you have in every conflict beaten back your foes with enormous slaughter. Your conduct ranks you among the celebrated armies of history. No one will now question that each of you may always, with pride, say, "I belong to the army of the Potomac." You have reached the new base complete in organization and unimpaired in spirit. The enemy may at any time attack you. We are prepared to meet them. I have personally established your lines. Let them come, and we will convert their repulse into a final defeat. Your Government is strengthening you with the resources of a great people. On this, our nation's birthday, we declare to our foes, who are rebels against the best interests of mankind, that this army shall enter the capital of the so-called Confederacy; that our National Constitution shall prevail, and that the Union, which can alone insure internal peace and external security to each State, "must and shall be preserved," cost what it may in time, treasure, and blood.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN.

Some of General M'Clellan's friends intimate that he is not responsible for his despatches, and that they are compiled in Washington; but, we presume, there can be no question as to the authenticity of the above. However, Mr. Lincoln has endorsed the conduct of the General in calling a defeat a victory. The United States' President has paid a visit to the camp of M'Clellan, for the Young Napoleon has not advanced so far from the Federal capital as to render such a visit inconvenient. Mr. Lincoln, according to report, "ascended the ramparts in view of the enemy's pickets." This was foolish, because he might have been shot by mistake, for his appearance is not very familiar to Southerners. After this daring feat, we are told, "the President briefly addressed the soldiers;" and certainly the President of the United States on the "stump" at a camp, if not a very dignified, is a very novel presentment. And what said Mr. Abraham Lincoln, "honest Abe," as he is sometimes called—"old Abraham Lincoln, rugged, simple, indomitable," as Mr. Taylor, M.P., designated him on Friday evening?

He said he had come to see for himself, and that he should go back satisfied. It was said that they had been "whipped," but it was not so, and never would be. He knew the men around him would prove equal to the task before them, and would never give up without going into Richmond. He declared his confidence in the army and its commander.

We are afraid that the morals of Mr. Lincoln, "the honest, simple, &c.," have been corrupted by his associates, or he would not have told a defeated army that they had not been defeated. The, "and never would," was a natural sequence; for if the army of the Potomac was not beaten during the seven days' fight it assuredly never will be beaten. What a comfort it must be for the North to have a President who does not care a cent for Providence; and who, if he cannot understand the present knows all about the future. The going into Richmond is not impossible. Had it not been for the gunboats it is tolerably certain the army of the Potomac would have been in Richmond about the 4th or 5th July.

It is reported that General Burnside has joined General M'Clellan at Harrison's Landing. The force under General Burnside does not exceed 20,000 men. It is also rumoured that General Buell has arrived at Wheeling (Virginia), with 50,000 men from General Halleck's army. The desperate condition of M'Clellan's army is attested by these real or reported reinforcements. If 50,000 men have been taken from Halleck, that illustrious commander must have very few forces left; but that is of no importance, as he can win any number of battles, and capture hosts of prisoners with pen and ink.

The capture of General Magruder is contradicted, and we are inclined to think that the "2000 prisoners" is also a Stanton myth.

The following Northern report is very significant:—

A Federal transport, conveying supplies up the James River, was fired into by the Confederate batteries below Harrison's Landing, on the opposite side of the river. She was obliged to run ashore to escape being sunk. On the same side of the river the Confederates have constructed batteries between Harrison's Landing and the Chickahominy River. The batteries are not heavy.

It is, then, true that the Confederates are in M'Clellan's rear, as well as in his front. What superb strategy on the part of the Young Napoleon to place his army in such a position!

Captain Wilkes, the hero of the Trent affair, has been appointed to the command of the James River flotilla, and he may have more severe work than firing at the unarmed vessel of a neutral Power.

There is an angry dispute going on in Washington and New York, as to whether General M'Clellan or Mr. Stanton was to blame for the late disasters. The friends of the former say he warned the Government of his peril, and "Congress has adopted a resolution asking the Government for all the correspondence with M'Clellan;" but as Congress will shortly adjourn, the aforesaid resolution may not annoy the Government.

Although the public attention is mainly engaged with the affairs in Virginia, the news from other quarters is most cheering to the South, and deserves careful consideration. It is reported that the Confederates have captured Baton Rouge, and taken 1500 Federal prisoners. The proximity of this place to New Orleans renders its capture important.

Further, we are informed that A large body of Confederates has captured Martinsborough.

near Nashville, and taken one Federal regiment prisoners. It is supposed that they will attack Nashville.

Murfreesborough is about thirty miles from Nashville, and there is railroad communication between the two places. The people of Nashville are staunch patriots, and the Federal occupancy of the city is in immediate jeopardy.

The Confederates are in considerable force near Frankfort. Thus the capitals of Kentucky and Tennessee are likely to fall into the hands of the South. The risings in these States, which we have long foreseen, threaten the rear of Halleck's line; and these movements, together with the retreat of General Curtis from Arkansas, leaves the army of Halleck surrounded by the enemy. It is likely we may see a repetition of the McClellan strategy by the defeat of General Halleck, and his seeking the only retreat that may be open to him—the protection of the gunboats.

At Mobile the Confederates have two gunboats, and a ram in the bay. 10,000 troops are below the city on the Shell Road, and the fortifications are completed.

General Bragg is at Lupello, with 40,000 troops. General Breckinridge, according to the Granada Appeal of the 3rd inst., has gone to Vicksburg, with 35,000 men. At the last advices Vicksburg was still safe, and the course of the Mississippi had not been changed. General Van Dorn was in command of the Confederates. His command embraces South Mississippi and East Louisiana.

On the 1st inst., the Federal forces which had evacuated James Island had arrived at Port Royal.

What is the matter with General Halleck? Is his imagination under an eclipse? We suppose it is from the following:—

General Halleck reports that on the 1st Colonel Sheridan, of the 1st Michigan Cavalry, with two regiments of 728 men, was attacked near Booneville by parts of eight Confederate regiments, numbering about 4700 men. He defeated and drove them back, after seven hours' fighting, during which he lost only forty-one men killed, wounded, and missing, while the enemy left sixty-five dead on the field.

A few months ago General Halleck would not have been satisfied with driving back 4700 of the enemy with 728 of his own troops. He would have driven back 40,000, captured 10,000 prisoners, and several parks of artillery. It must have been a curious fight; seven hours it lasted, the enemy were seven to one, yet the Federals only lost forty-one men killed, wounded, and missing. The preciseness of General Halleck is beautiful. An ordinary general would have said the enemy numbered 4000 or 5000 men, but Halleck gives the hundreds, tens, and units.

At Baltimore the Federal flags were taken down from the newspaper offices on the receipt of the news of the strategic movements of General McClellan. In every direction there is a vigorous uprising and resistance to the Federals.

In the midst of all these difficulties Mr. Lincoln finds it difficult to procure the 300,000 men he has called for. The Common Council of Buffalo has apportioned $80,000 to raise a new regiment, giving $75 in addition to the Government bounty. The New York press demands a conscription, and perhaps that is the only way of carrying on the war; but we anticipate that it will be a most unpopular measure.

The North evidently thinks foreign intervention near from the way it is protested against. Possibly, the menaces to foreign nations are meant to bring about an intervention. The New York Times urges that in case of foreign intervention Southern negro regiments should be raised; but it does not intimate how the disgraceful proposal is to be carried into effect. Happily the people of the South are strong enough to defend the negroes from the threatened and savage brutality of the North.

The Mayor of New York has issued a proclamation, saying "that the country demands the services of all loyal persons, not only to put down the rebellion, but also to repel with becoming spirit the first approach of foreign intervention, obscurely threatened, which cannot be admitted without national disgrace;" and the New York Herald is again treating of repudiation. If "America is forcibly broken up by foreign interference, the loss of American bonds, amounting to $6,000,000 or $8,000,000, due to English capitalists, is inevitable." America is broken up without foreign intervention, and therefore, according to this doctrine, the English capitalists have lost their money.

A meeting of the members of Congress for the Border States has been held at Washington to consider President Lincoln's emancipation scheme. The majority were opposed to the scheme, and refuse to accept the proposition.

At Springfield, Massachusetts, on the 4th, a large meeting was held in response to the President's call for troops. One of the resolutions contained a vote of confidence in the President, the other was as follows:—

That the recent manifestations in high quarters, both in France and in Great Britain, of a purpose still further to give continuance and encouragement to the rebellion, but too openly reveal a hatred of our Republican institutions, as well as jealousy and fear of the marvellous strength in which they have grown in the prosperity of a united nation; and that we concur in what we are certain is the unanimous sentiment of the loyal people of this country, that "foreign intervention in our affairs is not to be tolerated, and that the cheerful alacrity with which our armies have rallied to suppress a domestic insurrection will be at once and far surpassed upon the first hostile demonstration."

What a delusion to suppose that England or France cares for the Republican institutions of the United States, or envies the prosperity of a bankrupt nation!

Commercial affairs are gloomy in New York. Gold has reached 17 per cent. premium, silver was 8 per cent. premium, and copper cents 2 to 3 per cent. premium. As a slight relief it is proposed to use postage stamps for small currency.

On Friday last, in the House of Lords, there was a debate on "Colonial Fortifications," in the course of which the Earl of Ellenborough spoke as follows:—

I must express my entire concurrence with the noble duke in his expressions of extreme regret at the conduct of the Canadian Parliament in not passing the Militia Bill. I cannot understand what spirit of infatuation can have possessed that Parliament to induce them to act in such a manner. Is it possible that they cannot see, what every other man must see—that in whatever manner the present civil war in America terminates, whether in the success of the North or in the separation of the South, the immediate result will be an irruption into Canada? If the people of the North fail, they will attack Canada as a compensation for their loss. If they succeed, they will attack Canada in the drunkenness of victory. They will then have an army which will be difficult to control—an army very differently constituted from any which America has ever possessed before. It is idle for us to talk of opposing to the American army, as it is now constituted, the troops which in former times were considered sufficient for the defence of Canada. The circumstances have entirely altered, and yet I can recollect a few years ago the despatch of a Governor-General, who said that 50,000 British troops were absolutely necessary to enable Canada to defend herself against the United States, weak as they then were, having, I believe, not above 13,000 regular troops dispersed over the whole country, and a militia without discipline, the achievements of which, if achievements they can be called, were such as to cover the military profession with ridicule. We have now sent to Canada all the men we can spare for her defence, and the Canadians must not look to us for further support. Occasions may, indeed, arise when it might be extremely difficult for us to part even with the 12,000 troops we have now sent to the colony. Yet it is idle to suppose that Canada can be defended without disciplined troops. If Canada is to be protected from successful invasion, the whole population must come forward, as the people of the Southern States have come forward, in defence of their soil. To suppose that any country in the world can be defended against a regular army by coming forward in a state of enthusiasm—which Sir Charles Napier said ran away (a laugh)—to suppose that the Canadians when invaded are to come forward in a state of unarmed and undisciplined enthusiasm against the well-armed and the disciplined army of the United States, is something utterly impracticable, and every reasonable man in the country must know it to be so. If the Canadians persist in the course which they have recently taken, I shall see with very deep pain and apprehension that which, under the circumstances, would be but a handful of British troops left alone in Canada, and dispersed over the country, to fight a desperate battle in which they might lose their lives and might imperil the honour of their country. My lords, I think it is a little too much for the Canadians to take our troops and not to take our goods. It is a little too much for them to expect, under these circumstances, that we shall continue to incur the sacrifices and to run the risks we now run, when they thus requite the friendship which we desire always to entertain for them. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Wodehouse thought our position in Canada was unsatisfactory, and if an attack was not inevitable, no man could help feeling that such an attack was far from improbable. Earl Grey expressed his opinion that in the present state of North America we were not justified in leaving British troops in Canada without adequate support. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe said:—

With regard to Canada, it must have struck every noble lord that the position in which our small army was placed, regard being had to the war in America, was one of great danger. The debate which had just taken place had in no way diminished that feeling as far as he was concerned. Bearing in mind the difficulties of the season which was fast approaching, and the near proximity to the end of the Session, the Government ought to take into serious consideration measures which would secure our interests and the honour of our troops.

In the House of Commons, on the same evening, there was an important debate on Mr. Lindsay's motion, of which we elsewhere give a summary.

OBITUARY.

We are pained to record the death of the Honourable Robert Blair Campbell, late Consul for the United States of America at the Port of London, which melancholy event took place at Ealing on the 13th instant. General Campbell was a native of South Carolina, and belonged to a family of influence and wealth in that State. He was a highly educated and refined gentleman, and a most useful member of society, adorning every circle he frequented by his superior intelligence and good example. In politics, he was a strong State Rights Democrat, and a warm supporter of Mr. Calhoun. He held many posts of honour and trust confided to him by his countrymen, among which he received a military commission during the war of 1812-15; he subsequently was elected to the Legislature of his own Commonwealth, and afterwards to the Federal Congress, and was a member of that body from the years 1822 to 1828. In February, 1825, when the great struggle took place in the House of Representatives for President, the States having failed to make an election, he cast the vote of South Carolina in favour of General Jackson. After remaining in private life for a number of years, he was appointed Consul-General of Havana by President Polk, from which office he was transferred by President Pierce to a similar position at London, where he remained until removed by Mr. Lincoln. He may truly be said to have been the last consul of the United States at the port of London. During his sojourn in Europe he made many friends, who mourn his loss; and although unable from feeble health to return to his native country, his heart was ever there, the distressing events of the last year, no doubt, tending in a great measure to undermine a once vigorous constitution. General Campbell was in his seventieth year; he has, therefore, lived the days allotted to man, and we may safely say, has not left an enemy behind him. Firm, resolute, and unyielding in the cause of right, truth, and justice, he has departed in peace and honour. He leaves a large family to lament his loss; several of his sons and grandsons are now serving in the Confederate army; his younger children, with their afflicted mother, are still in England, but propose to return to America at an early date, whither his remains will be sent as soon as hostilities cease.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, July 23.

Our market continues to be exceedingly sensitive to the advances from America, and almost every day during the past week a visible change in its tone has been apparent. Our last report left with an upward bias, Middling Orleans worth 18d., and Fair Dholerah 13½d. to 3d. On Thursday the demand continued active, and American and long-stapled cotton was rather dearer; but on Friday the market was stunned by the circulation of strange rumours alleged to have come by the Glasgow, via Queenstown. The first report was that McClellan's army had surrendered, but afterwards it was softened down to the milder statement that the Federal generals were discussing the propriety of capitulating conditionally, and that the Confederates would accept nothing short of unconditional surrender. This news was generally discredited, but it served to paralyse the market, and the sales fell off to 4000 bales at 3½d. decline for Surats, and 3½d. in other sorts. On Saturday the Arabia's news was before us, giving no confirmation of the absurd reports of the day before, but announcing McClellan's army tolerably safe under shelter of the gunboats. To this was added the important intelligence that the premium on gold had suddenly started from 10 to 16 per cent., while exchange had risen to 129. The latter news somewhat neutralised the other, as it indicated increased financial weakness in the North, and consequently greater difficulty in carrying on the war. The debates in Parliament the previous evening on the American question were decidedly in favour of the market. Lord Palmerston stated emphatically that the time had not come for recognising the Southern Confederacy, and that there was no opportunity at present for offering mediation. Our market in consequence opened briskly in the morning, but the demand became slack as the day went on, and the sales only reached 5000 bales at full prices for American, but little improvement in Surats.

On Monday the full details by the Arabia were to hand, and the market was damped by the very unfavourable comments on the Federal situation expressed in the Times. The general tenor of its leaders and correspondence went to prove that the North could not afford to carry on the struggle much longer. Though this view is not accepted in the best-informed quarters, it has had for several days a powerful influence on the market, and on Monday the sales in consequence fell to 2500 bales, of which only 500 to the trade. Surats were greatly depressed, and sold at a further decline of 3½d. to 3d., but American, owing to its extreme scarcity, was not notably lower.

Yesterday the dullness continued unabated, sales 3000 bales. The Anglo-Saxon's news failed to alter the tone—attention was still directed to the progress of the Confederate arms; throughout Tennessee they were recovering lost ground, and there seemed a strong probability that, before long, much of the results of the spring campaign in the West would be lost to the Federals. In Manchester business was completely checked by this news, and a fresh impulse given to the rapid reduction of consumption. Our market this morning opened flatter than ever, and some very low sales were made in Surats, in a few cases at a decline of 1d. from Friday, and 1½ from the highest point—say on the basis of 12½d. for Fair Dhollerah. But these low sales brought on a speculative demand, and the cheapest lots have been picked up, and the market closes stronger for Surats on the basis of 15d. for Fair Dhollerah and Omrawuttu. In American there has been much less discussion, but sales have been made, in some instances, at a full ½d. decline from the top. The proper basis of quotations, however, may still be given as 17½d. for Middling Orleans, 17½d. for Mohile, and 17½d. for Bowdels. In Surats, “to arrive,” there has been great irregularity, and Dhollerahs have been sold as low as 12d. for May shipment; but at that price they can hardly be bought this afternoon. Broach of May shipment is worth nominally 12½d. per lb.

The Bombay mail of June 27 is to hand to-day, and reports the small shipment of 28,000 bales for England in the last fortnight, setting at rest the ridiculous rumour that 115,000 bales had cleared in a single week. It is evident now that the available stock at Bombay is nearly exhausted, and little more may be expected till after the monsoon—say till October or November.

Most of the buying brokers have now become sellers, and this cause may continue to be a source of weakness for some time. On the other hand, it must be admitted that the American news afford slender hopes of a speedy settlement of the disastrous war.

MANCHESTER JULY 23.

The past week has been a very quiet one in our yarn and cloth market. Manufacturers still continue making resales of their yarns from one to another, and underselling spinners by 1d. to 2d. per lb., but as their stocks are very light this cannot continue long, and the inevitable consequence is, that there will be a more general closing of their establishments.

The continental shippers have bought very little of anything, and as far as regards Water Twist, they find it more easy to deal with speculators, who hold a considerable quantity of this class of yarn, which they are disposed to sell at prices from 1l. to 2l. per lb. below spinners pretensions.

On Friday all business was totally suspended, in consequence of a rumour to the effect that a telegram was posted up at Lloyd's, stating that General McClellan had surrendered to the Confederate commander, and the excitement was immense on the arrival of our mid-day report from Liverpool, which stated that business was suspended there, and no idea could be given as to the probable amount of sales.

The correctness of the above intelligence was very much doubted, and holders of both cloth and yarn were determined to await the arrival of news by the Arabia, which might be expected the next day, before entering into any transactions.

On Saturday and Monday business still continued very dull, owing to the depressed feeling in the Liverpool cotton market, and to the idea that the struggle in America will not be of very long duration.

To-day the market has been again very quiet, although the news by the Anglo-Saxon has imparted a degree of firmness not hitherto shown since this day week. There has been a few transactions entered into by continental shippers for 32s., 40s., and 42s. for mule twist in bundle, upon a basis of 20d. per lb. for No. 40s.

Cloth remains as firm as ever, holders feeling assured that the next few telegrams from India will materially enhance the value of this staple.

6 lbs. shirting are worth to-day 9s. 6d. 7 lbs. ditto 10s. 6d., and 8½ lbs. ditto, 12s. 7½d.

TOBACCO MARKET.

LONDON, July 24.

The contraction of stock begin to convince manufacturers and others that the position of holders is most secure—a desire on the part of all to increase their holding is perceptible, and considerably more business than has actually been transacted could have been done, had holders been desirous to realize.

Sales this week have been to a fair extent at rates in favour of the seller.

Western strips and leaf have enjoyed the greatest demand. The stock of Virginia tobacco is almost exhausted—a fair business done in Maryland. In Cavendish the business has been large. Of Twist, the stock is small, and business necessarily limited.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

AN English gentleman, who left Richmond on the 25th ult., on the eve of the series of great battles, states positively that General Beauregard was not, at that time, in that city, nor expected there. A serene confidence of success prevailed among the citizens. The usual avocations were quietly pursued, nor had the women and children been required to leave the city.

THE Savannah papers announce the arrival in that city of Messrs. A. P. Witro and H. Von Rooke, having run the blockade into Charleston.

THE BATTLES OF THE 27th AND 28th OF JUNE.

(From the Richmond Papers of June 28.)

The greatest battle ever fought on this continent has been raging near this city since four o'clock Thursday afternoon, and at the time of writing these lines (Friday afternoon) is progressing with great fury. We shall not attempt to go into details at this time, simply because it is impossible to speak with anything like accuracy. The lines between the city and the camps are rigidly guarded to keep away a damaging crowd of spectators, in consequence of which we are forced to avail ourselves of casual arrivals from beyond the lines as almost our only means of information. Such sources are necessarily imperfect, and it is only the facts in which they corroborate each other that are to be received with any confidence.

One great fact is certain, and is proved by the ears of every man in Richmond; that whereas the fight began at Meadow Bridge, across the Chickahominy—a point almost due north of the city—it progressed the same evening to Mechanicsville, several miles to the east, where it became very furious, and then rested for the night. The explanation is, that our forces first drove the enemy from Meadow Bridge to Mechanicsville, and then drove them out of their strongly entrenched position at Mechanicsville, which at nine o'clock we took possession of.

Another fact is certain, and on the same evidence. About four o'clock, yesterday morning, a tremendously heavy fire commenced a few miles east of Mechanicsville, at Ellyson's Mills, and lasted until about seven. There was then a suspension of fire until nearly twelve o'clock, when it opened with great fury still farther to the east, and apparently in the direction of New Bridge, which is about north-east from the city. About mid-afternoon yesterday we heard the heavy roll of artillery still resounding in the same quarter.

The engagement of the early morning near Mechanicsville was an attack by our troops on another strong fortification of the enemy, ending in the subjection of the latter, and their retreat, and our pursuit to New Bridge—a point probably eight or nine miles from the place where the battle commenced on Thursday evening. Thus far had our forces driven the enemy's right wing, or that portion of McClellan's army which lay on the north side of the Chickahominy, and between that river and the Pamunkey.

The information received from the battle-field is that we have been successful in every attack, and are steadily and surely driving McClellan before us. The supposed plan of the battle was to destroy or rout the right wing of the enemy, and at the same time throw a column behind them to cut off McClellan's supplies and deprive him at the same time of the means of retreat. To this latter service it is said that Jackson's army was specially appropriated; and that his path was the track marked out by General Stuart in his late eavalry expedition.

At a late hour yesterday we had not learned that any engagement had commenced between our right wing and the enemy's left. There is reason to think that on Thursday night McClellan drew a large force from his left to reinforce his right, already so badly worsted; it is certain that great cheering was heard in the enemy's camps on his left wing; which indicated either that the troops had received marching orders, or that McClellan had sent a despatch telling of his “great victory” at Mechanicsville. The heavy and protracted fighting at New Bridge yesterday afternoon would seem to indicate that McClellan had gathered his strength there, and that we were meeting it with ours.

The impression founded on many assertions rather than on very certain information, is that Jackson has accomplished his purpose, and is between Lincoln and his gunboats. If so, it would seem that we have got him and his army between the upper and the nether millstone; we trust they will be ground to powder!

At the time of writing this, we do not think it probable that the battle will end with Friday's sun. It will probably rage along our right to-morrow. There are reports, and some of respectable parentage, that the enemy on yesterday fell back in that quarter, or perhaps retreated across the Chickahominy. If true it will not avail them much, for Jackson will head them and our right wing will follow. We are satisfied, however, that it is not true, unless perhaps in part; for a gentleman who was near, assures us that there was a sharp engagement near Seven Pines yesterday afternoon, commencing about three o'clock, and still in progress when he left.

In short, the appearances and the belief, at the time of writing this, are that God is about to favour our cause with one of the greatest victories ever won on the field of arms. For which, if indeed it shall be consummated, as at present we cannot doubt, from every heart in the Confederacy will ascend the incense of gratitude and joy for so inestimable a mercy!

We will add to this that we have just been made acquainted with the contents of a letter from an officer belonging to our right wing, written from the camp to a friend in this city, as late as half-past two p.m. yesterday. It stated that Longstreet, Jackson, and A. P. Hill were then engaging the enemy in the rear, with a force of 60,000 men. A vigorous attack, it said, was to be made from our front, to co-operate with the rear attack; and the most gratifying results were expected. The messenger who brought the letter stated that, among the spoils captured was a large number of beaver collected for the Federal army.

Such further tidings or probable reports as may reach us, will be found in another column.

RENEWAL OF THE ENGAGEMENT BEFORE RICHMOND ON YESTERDAY.

Our forces having driven the enemy from his rifle pits and batteries on the right of his position, about Mechanicsville, on Thursday, pursued their success with redoubled vigour and gallantry on yesterday. Fire was opened at the earliest hour of dawn, and the enemy, now almost driven back to the base of his lines, commenced to retreat slowly about eight o'clock. The troops engaged on the Confederate side, consisted of the divisions of Generals Longstreet, A. P. Hill, and H. Hill. The pursuit was conducted with skill and impetuosity, and the enemy suffered severely on all sides. His direction was down from the right of the Mechanicsville Turnpike, towards the rear position of his centre, about four miles north of the Chickahominy, and six miles from the Turnpike. All the enemy's dead and wounded on the previous day, with few exceptions, had been carried off, and they managed to remove also a large number from the field of this running engagement. As they retired, they set fire to immense quantities of their commissary stores, spiked their cannon, destroyed tents, and smashed up all of the waggon wheels they could not run off. Our forces captured several fine batteries, consisting in all of eighteen fine rifled cannon, and several minor pieces of artillery. A portion of them were spiked, and reached the city in the afternoon, to undergo repair and restoration. About ten o'clock the pursuit ceased for the time, and the battle raged until late in the evening. The enemy had now fallen back upon his strongest position, and fought with desperation. When night came on the firing on both sides was discontinued, and the burial of the dead and the care of the wounded occupied the attention of our victorious army.

The retreat of the Federal army inspired our men with strength and encouragement. Not a man faltered, and while scenes occurred which would spread dismay under other circumstances, or in another cause, all pressed on, fired with the determination to render the battle-field one sea of blood, rather than suffer defeat to hover for a moment above their heads.

The regiments which seemed to have suffered the most, in the three days' engagements, were the 14th and 44th North Carolina, the 4th and 19th Georgia, and the 1st Louisiana. The Virginia troops suffered severely. The Purcell battery of this city, which went into the engagement with about seventy-five men, came out with thirty-seven wounded and three killed. The Maryland battery sustained a loss of forty wounded and none killed. About 500 wounded from various regiments reached the city on yesterday, and nearly as many more from the battle of yesterday alone, which will conclude the list up to last night, will be brought in to-day. Our killed numbers about 300; the enemy's loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, is estimated at between 3000 and 4000 men, besides about $1,000,000 of stores destroyed and several batteries lost.

An interesting incident occurred in the Pamunkey on Thursday. A raft battery, protected with iron sides, was annoying our troops in that direction, when a regiment of sharpshooters was detailed to capture it. They proceeded to the brow of a hill immediately commanding the battery, and opened fire down into it. About a dozen Yankees were killed and wounded by the volley, a shock which took them so much by surprise that they concluded to give up; so, hoisting a shirt out upon a pole, the survivors sang out, “We surrender!” Our sharpshooters immediately went down, took possession, and sent the craft to the bottom of the river.

The fleetness of the Yankee army in its retreat prevented the capture of many prisoners; in fact, the capture of prisoners was not particularly cared about by the pursuing army.

The advantage to us, so far, is materially unimportant, but the prestige which it adds to the lustre of our arms, is most cheering. The men are inspired with an elation which has impressed them with a sentiment of invincibility. They look upon the issue of the fight with that presentiment of success which only a heart nerved by the consciousness of a noble purpose can feel. To day will probably draw the issue nearer, and perhaps complete it. The general engagement has yet to be fought.

VERY LATEST.

At twelve o'clock last night we conversed with an Aid to one of our Generals, who informed us that we have driven the Yankees from all their strong positions, taken a large number of prisoners, a great many cannon, &c.

At one time during the day the Yankees gained an advantageous position, and were compelling the falling back of our forces, when General Longstreet's division was ordered up. The gallant men of this division went in with a yell, and drove the Yankees into the Chickahominy at the point of the bayonet, without firing a shot.

McClellan is now represented as holding an awkward position, being almost completely hemmed in. His telegraphic wires have all been cut, and the railroad doubtless torn up before this. In answer to an inquiry, “if there was no way of McClellan getting to his gunboats,” our informant replied “none under Heaven, that he could see, except with his balloon.” In short, the fight of yesterday was a glorious victory.

The engagement in the afternoon is said to have been a general one, extending along the entire line. The fight will doubtless recommence this morning at an early hour.

THE CRENSHAW BATTERY.

This battery, commanded by Captain Crenshaw, and composed of young men from this city, was in the engagement of yesterday, and behaved with much gallantry. We hear of the following casualties:—Killed:—Shields; wounded:—Corporal Wm. B. Allen and Private George Young, both slightly.

Several other members of this battery were wounded, but we could not learn their names.

The telegraph, which has remained silent for several days past, at last brings us some interesting news.

Porter's mortar fleet had been repulsed at Grand Gulf by light batteries. On Saturday the enemy opened on Vicksburg for one hour.

The Cincinnati papers report that Count Mercier had engaged passage to sail in the next steamer to that carrying out Lord Lyons. The report excited considerable sensation in Yankeeedom.

Butler, the beast, has again gotten himself into trouble, by the seizure of some sugar belonging to foreign residents of New Orleans. A sharp correspondence ensued between Pleytane and the British, French, and Greek Consuls, in which Butler is said to have used the coarsest and most pointed language.

Our selections from Northern papers, bearing date as late as the 25th inst., will be found interesting. We particularly call the attention of our readers to the European news in another column. It will be seen that the beast, Butler, is handled without gloves.

JACKSON'S DEFEAT OF FREMONT AND SHIELDS.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

We have the pleasure of presenting the following description of the late brilliant victories near Fort Republic, from the pen of one of the clearest and most dispassionate minds in the Commonwealth. The writer visited the battle-fields, and conversed with many who took part in them, and from his power of deducing the connected truth from fragmentary and various statements, we have no hesitation in commending his narrative as historically reliable:—

THE BATTLES NEAR PORT REPUBLIC.

When General Jackson retreated from Winchester, after routing Banks, he managed with great address, boldness, and energy, to carry off his prisoners and spoils, and to bring off his army between the converging columns of Fremont, who approached his rear from the West, with eight brigades, and Shields who approached from the east, with four brigades. If these brigades averaged 2500 men, the force of Fremont was 20,000 and that of Shields 10,000 men. At Harrisonburg Jackson left the main turnpike road of the valley and marched towards Port Republic, the distance between these two places being about twelve miles. Port Republic is situated at the junction of South River flowing north, and North River flowing east. Jackson could retire no further without crossing North River, which was swollen, and there was then no bridge over it except at Port Republic. The two rivers uniting at that village form the Shenandoah, which flows north, and which could not then be crossed by an army. On the east side of the stream was the army of Shields, and on the west side were the armies of Fremont and Jackson. The latter halted near North River without crossing it, and, while in that position, his rear was approached and attacked by Fremont's whole army, and on the morning of Sunday, the 8th instant, and, at the same time, Shields' force appeared on the east side of the Shenandoah, near Port Republic.

That part of Jackson's army which engaged Fremont on Sunday was commanded by General Ewell, while the rest of the army under General Jackson held Shields in check with artillery firing across the Shenandoah, near Port Republic. The battle of Sunday took place about five miles from that village in the direction of Harrisonburg.

It began early in the morning, and lasted all day, with occasional intervals. It was mainly an artillery fight, but now and then, here and there, the infantry became hotly engaged. The force under Fremont was much larger than that under Ewell, but the latter was strongly posted on eminences which favoured the effectiveness of artillery and sheltered the infantry, while the enemy could only approach through open fields. Ewell's command was handled with remarkable skill, while Fremont's generalship was indifferent. Ewell's artillery was served with admirable precision and effect, and his infantry, whenever engaged, displayed great steadiness and gallantry. The result was that, when night put an end to the contest, Fremont had been driven back between one or two miles with a loss, in killed and wounded, not less than 2000, and probably much larger, while our loss did not exceed 300, and probably not 200. The judicious selection of a position in which to receive the enemy favoured this result, but it was largely due to the superior fighting qualities of our men.

Soon after nightfall, General Jackson began to withdraw his men from this battle-field, and pass them over North River by the bridge at Port Republic, with a view to attack Shields the next morning. He left in front of Fremont a small force to amuse and detain him, and, after retiring before him to Port Republic, to burn the bridge behind them, and thus to prevent Fremont from rendering any aid to Shields. All this was accomplished.

On Monday morning, Jackson passed the greater part of his army across the South River (the smallest of the streams) by means of a bridge made of planks laid on waggons placed in the river. Early in the morning a sufficient number had crossed to commence the battle, and they were led to the field between one and two miles distant, on the east bank of the Shenandoah. The enemy's force was found drawn up awaiting the attack.

The enemy's line extended from the river about half a mile across a flat bottom, free from timber, and covered with wheat, grass, &c. His left rested on the point of a low ridge coming out from the woods which skirt the bottom. On a slight elevation there, and in some small knolls in the bottom, he had his artillery, commanding the road and the wide uncovered level plains, over which Jackson's army was obliged to advance. The level and exposed ground offered scarcely any suitable positions for planting our artillery. The advantage of position belonged altogether to the enemy. The capital fault of his disposition for battle was that the battery on his extreme left was posted near the woods without any infantry in the woods to defend it. By availing himself of this circumstance, and by a brilliant manoeuvre and charge, Jackson turned the fortunes of the day at a critical moment.

For some two hours the battle raged with great fury. Our infantry, at first but few, advanced with marvellous intrepidity in the face of a withering fire of artillery and musketry. At one moment the enemy advanced a section of a battery several hundred yards so as to enfilade our left wing, which already suffered terribly from the fire in front. It seemed that nothing could withstand the fury of the enemy's fire of all arms. His artillery was very fine and was served with great effect by regulars. But other troops, coming at double quick from Port Republic, came on the field, and, at the same time the Louisiana Brigade, under Taylor, emerged from the woods on the enemy's left. They had been sent by a considerable circuit through the woods which extend all along the battle-field between the cleared ground and the neighbouring mountain. By a slight error of direction they came out of the woods a little too soon and found themselves almost in front of the battery, which instantly began to shower grape upon them. But, immediately rectifying their direction, they charged the battery with irresistible impetuosity, and carried it. The contest then was speedily ended. The enemy's whole line gave way, and was presently retreating in disorder, pursued by our cavalry. The pursuit was kept up about ten or twelve miles, but the flight continued all that day and the next. About 500 prisoners were taken that day, and others have been brought in daily ever since. The loss of the enemy in killed and wounded was heavy, and so was our own. Six splendid cannon were captured on the field, another was taken in the pursuit, and still another had been captured on Sunday. The force of the enemy engaged was about 6000 or 7000, and ours a little larger. Shields was not present, but his troops were commanded by General Tyler.

After the rout of the enemy had commenced, the last of our troops crossed over the bridge at Port Republic, and burnt it. Fremont, cautiously following, appeared some time afterwards, and drew up his army in line of battle on the heights along the west bank of the Shenandoah, from which he overlooked the field of battle. While he stood there in impotent idleness, Jackson's army, having finally disposed of Shields, moved at leisure to Brown's Gap, and there encamped, to rest for a few days from the fatigues of a month's campaign more arduous and more successful than any month's operations of the war. The exhaustion of our men and the interposition of a river, no longer bridged, secured Fremont from a second battle or a hasty flight. The next day he commenced his retreat down the Valley. He and Shields had set out to catch Jackson, and they caught him. It is hoped that the judicious reader, from the circumstances which we have gathered into a connected form from various sources, will be able to discover the masterly strategy of our general, as well as the dauntless valour of our men and the favour of a benignant Providence.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, July 4, 1862.

SIR,—The rules of political economy are beginning to prove true, the bubble is bursting, Wall-street is in fear and trepidation. Exchange in London has advanced, and gold commands a higher premium than ever known. All classes of stocks have fallen, the markets, closing very heavy. This stampede, as it is called, has been suddenly brought about by the disasters to McClellan's army, but it was due anyhow, and most old-fashioned people have expected it to come long since. The delay is quite capable of explanation. It is owing to the great credit system upon which the chief branch of internal trade, the dry goods business, is carried on. The usual transactions took place in the spring of 1861, prior to the war, the bills for which did not mature until the early part of the present year, and no paper having been made to fill up the vacuum created by their retirement, Mr. Chase's bills, as well as the quarter-masters' vouchers, certificates of indebtedness, &c., merely filled into the place formerly occupied by promissory notes of mercantile houses. The amount of Government unfunded debt having now become greater than that of the commercial bills usually floated, the period of depreciation has of course arrived. The demand notes, too, merely drove the bank circulation out of existence; but they are now in excess of the wants of the community; hence "paper money" is quoted "easy." Every obligation of the Federal authorities adds to the weight. Government paper, unlike business paper, has no maturity: the former goes on augmenting from day to day, the latter merely repeats itself.

Although the day for putting into force the direct tax bill is so close at hand, no one seems to think seriously of accelerating it. The President seeing the difficulty, will probably defer executing the law, or Congress may yet extend the time in the hopes that something may turn up. The tariff bill is a source of great annoyance to the importers; the increase in the duties and the rise in exchange, will make foreign goods very costly to the consumers. Cotton at forty cents per pound causes domestic manufactures to be expensive also. So the people are going to feel the pains of war in many ways.

To all these troubles may be added, the clouds in the political world, which are thickening, and likely to soon "lower upon the heads" of the powers that be. Many strange things have happened since the breaking out of this war; many stranger things are yet to occur. Do not be at all astonished if some early Cunard steamer announces the arrival of Messrs. Lincoln, Seward, Stanton, Chase, and others, who may suddenly take passage in order to fly from the vengeance of the very mob they created. The masses are indignant at the falsehoods and corruption of the officials at Washington, and begin to discover that they are a deceived people.

BERLIN, July 21, 1862.

There are only a few Southerners in this city at present, but they remember with unfeigned joy that to-day is the anniversary of the Battle of Bull Run. With what different emotions the Northerners residing here must think of the fortunes of that day! It was the shameful rout of the Federal forces one year ago that first caused the Germans to doubt whether in reality the secession of the Southern States was the "rebellion of a few wicked men, dissatisfied with a benignant Government." How wonderful are the changes in public opinion within a short time! One year ago the Southerners had not probably a sympathizer in all Germany. Slow as the Germans are in general, they have learned to appreciate the merits of the American war astonishingly well for their opportunities within a short twelvemonth. If Mr. Stanton has succeeded admirably in sending only news of great victories to Europe, the press of Germany has ably co-operated with him in giving him the benefit of their colourings and suppressions. Nevertheless, the truth has found its way to the people, though clouded with much uncertainty. A few journals in Germany have commenced to advocate the Southern cause, one of the most conspicuous of which is the Conservative organ of Berlin, the Kreuz-Zeitung. The sympathy of the better classes in Prussia, and of the Government, seem now to be well enlisted in favour of the South. Military men of the present day, and veterans of the war of 1812, alike ridicule the war-bulletins of Mr. Stanton. They urge that the gross misrepresentations are so palpable that any officer can detect the deceptions at a glance. The system which pervades every branch of the Prussian Government is what is needed in Washington to secure any plausibility whatever for the correctness of war-despatches. Had the North a well-organized general staff attached to the army, all contradictions at least might be avoided in despatches, and only such details published as would not bear their denial on their face. Any one who now reads the German journals cannot fail to perceive how completely the North has succeeded, by its system of mendacity, in destroying all confidence with the Germans. No American news is now accepted until substantially confirmed by subsequent information, unless it be favourable to the South. The announcement of a Federal victory is now taken to mean a complete Federal defeat. For this state of public opinion the Yankees have to thank none others than themselves.

Every one knows that the Prussians do not like the English Government, and, unfortunately, the history of the past only too well justifies this feeling. So deeply seated in the Prussians is the conviction, that the English Government, especially when it is a Liberal one, is not to be depended upon for action in anything, where the force of circumstances does not absolutely compel it to move, that when the English flag was violated on the Trent, no one expected to see the English Ministry proceed to extreme measures in order to obtain satisfaction. The Germans still persist in saying that had France, Austria, and Russia not sustained England in its demands in that case, the demands would not only have been less peremptory, but perhaps have met with no compliance on the part of the United States' Government, which seems to appreciate the virtues of Lord Palmerston's Government.

What the Germans cannot comprehend is the persistency with which the English Government refuses to recognize the South. It has been a source of perplexity to understand why England has so often refused the co-operation of France in recognizing the Confederate States, seeing that the material interests of England all conspired to dictate such a course. In general, it is thought that the English Government is actuated by only two principal incentives; the first, by non-interference, and non-recognition, to give time to the North and the South so to weaken each other, that for a long time to come, if not for ever, England shall lose her most dangerous and most powerful rival on the seas. The other reason is, that the Government, by remaining entirely passive, hope to give such an impetus to the cultivation of cotton in their Indian possessions, that English manufacturers shall not be dependent on American supplies for the future. Were this result certain, it could readily be conceived that England might well decide to endure her present sufferings, in order to become the producer and manufacturer of cotton; in other words, to monopolize the cotton trade of the world. Fortunately, this is impossible. The English Government will not dare to give direct aid to India sufficient to realize this project, and a differential duty on American cotton, besides producing general dissatisfaction among all English manufacturers, would fail of its object; for then France and Germany would take the American cotton, which is demanded less for its quantity than for its quality, and thus exclude English manufacturers from the markets of the world. It is evident that England could no longer compete with Germany and France, if the English manufacturer had to pay a differential duty of 6d. per lb. on the American article. But apart from this consideration, it is well known that the uncertainty of the Indian supply of cotton is too great, by reason of insurrections, and the system of labour there used for its cultivation, ever to allow the importation of Indian cotton to become successful in this sense. The Germans may, then, well inquire what motives do really influence the English Government not to recognize the South. Most persons here consider the secret to be a positive fear of the United States. How far this is correct the world must judge.

The Persian Embassy has just left Berlin to be replaced by the Japanese. Of course, these, as their Oriental colleagues that have just left, are objects of unbounded curiosity and admiration.

In consequence of the recognition of the Kingdom of Italy, Prince Carini, the Minister of His Majesty the King of Naples at this Court will soon take his departure from Berlin. The Prince is highly esteemed personally, and before his departure, a banquet will be tendered him by his friends of the Diplomatic Body.

PARIS, July 23.

General Forey has received from the Emperor himself his last instructions previous to his departure for Mexico. Within a very few days this future Marshal of France will sail for the land where he has to carry on his master's designs, and the importance of his mission and the responsibilities resting on him are certainly well worth the reward which he may eventually expect. It is confidently asserted that the force under him will not be less than 30,000 men, of choice troops, and these equipped, organized, and provisioned in a manner befitting an army of this great military nation.

The Emperor will prolong his stay at Vichy for a couple of weeks. It is a positive fact that his Majesty is engaged in correcting the last proofs of the first volume of his great work on Caesar, and spares no pains to perfect this book, which will have an historical interest of the highest importance. He paid a visit to Gergovie with the view of modifying one chapter, and remained over three hours on the mountain, bearing the heat of a summer's day, studying the aspects of the spot, and reading, in the vestiges which have been preserved the story of the past.

It was on the 19th that M. Thouvenel returned here from Vichy, and it was the next morning that appeared in the Constitutionnel, with all the well-known appearance of a semi-official communication, M. P. Limayrac's remarkable article, which all of your readers must have undoubtedly noticed.

Both in official quarters, and in diplomatic circles, this article is held up as a warning, and, if need be, as a threat, to the Washington Government. As for the fact that negotiations have been and are still actively followed up between London and Paris for the purpose of a collective mediation in America, no one can be found to deny it. Many people have construed the English Premier's very words on Friday last in the House as an acknowledgment of these negotiations, with which it was impolitic to interfere. The debate, however, has been read with deep interest. The people are getting every day to understand better the American question, and the newspapers persisting in calling the cause of the South the cause of the "esclavagists" are making perfect fools of themselves, but no more of their readers.

The Independence Bølge, which ought to be ashamed of its partial and dishonest course on the subject of American affairs, and which recently was representing as a victorious strategy McClellan's retreat, had the following, "from the most reliable source," in one of its last "Paris Letters":—

"France and England are not alone in wishing to interpose their good offices between the belligerent parties in America. The Emperor of Russia has proposed to make, as a preliminary to any concerted action, a personal appeal to President Lincoln, in order to induce him to accept in principle the negotiation of a compromise between the North and the South. If this negotiation were accepted, it would have the effect of suspending any mediating action whatever, and intervention or mediation would only be undertaken in case the North should positively refuse to come to an understanding directly with the South.

"The proposition of the Cabinet of St. Petersburg was communicated to the Foreign Office by M. Brunnow during the stay which our Minister of Foreign Affairs made in London. It is announced that it has been accepted, but also that it has been decided that after the month of respite which it would give, England would no longer hesitate to bring about a collective mediation, in case the Cabinet of the President of the American Union should reject the individual good offices of Russia. It is in these terms that M. Thouvenel was charged to transmit to Vichy the decision which I intimated three days ago had been arrived at by the British Government."

There is a large amount of political gossip going on, and the Bourse is rather weak. The recognition of the Kingdom of Italy by Russia and Prussia, the rumoured matrimonial alliance between the Czar's relative and Victor Emmanuel's son and heir, the proposed meeting of the Emperors Napoleon III. and Alexander II. and King William of Prussia, the war in Montenegro and the troubles in Servia, Garibaldi's stump speeches, even the fighting in China, not to speak of the Roman question, of the Mexican expedition, and last, not least, of the American war,—are certainly enough to engross public attention.

All those attached to the Imperial dynasty were highly gratified by the birth of Prince Napoleon's son on the 18th. The King of Italy and the Empress Eugenie are to be his godfather and godmother, and it is said that the ceremonies of the baptism will be most brilliant. He will be christened Napoleon Victor Jerome Frederic.

The first stone of the exterior of the new opera-house was laid in great state by His Excellency Monsieur le Ministre d'Etat.

The prospect of the crops in France are tolerable up to this time, and farmers rely on an average crop of wheat. I hope that the prospect of your corn crops in England is good; for we hear, with consternation, of the frightful misery in your manufacturing districts.

Your great English "Thunderer" has had recently some masterly leaders on America. It will do more honour to the Times than its former pendulum-like articles, and even more than its recent astounding announcement that Prussia had at last been induced to enter the Zollverein. The Times was extremely severe on the Northern commander for lying despatches, and every honest man says "served him right."

McClellan's Order of the Day has been read with great disgust by the French people. They compare it to the dignified address of Jefferson Davis after the reverses of the Southern armies. They remember also that the Southern people have borne defeat without a murmur against their leaders, without a dispute among themselves, without an insult to their enemies; and they compare that dignified patriotism to the mad vituperations of the Northerners against their generals, against one another, against the nation who dares to resist being crushed. They see on the one side a man whose mercenaries preferred, on the field, to be shot down by their own officers than to face the Southern soldiers; they see that man who declares, on the morrow, that he shall enter Richmond, "whatever may be the cost in time, treasure, and blood," and they have, on the other side, the spectacle of a people fighting for its independence—fighting only to repulse invasion, fighting only for peace. The French, I can tell you, have their eyes open to the true merits of the American question, and whenever their Emperor wishes to make the voice of France heard to put a stop to that sanguinary struggle his people will follow him. The Northern lies have had a good time of it; but—"Magna est veritas et prevalebit."

WASHINGTON, July 1, 1862.

The public attention begins to turn very anxiously now to your side, as the impression is palpably gaining ground that there is an evidence of prospective intervention, if not of immediate interference. Whether these opinions have a good foundation or not, the anxiety is very apparent. I have always stated that I should look for important movements in Europe during the Midsummer, provided our war was prolonged and offered no indications of settlement.

We have had an exciting time since my last letter to you. On Saturday and Sunday the town was filled with rumours of every description relative to army affairs before Richmond, and the excitement culminated on Sunday night, when a despatch was received from Baltimore that the agent of the Associated Press had reached there with news of the events that were transpiring in Virginia, and would soon send over the particulars; but an hour later came a despatch that the Secretary of War had suppressed the news. This was the information communicated to the public yesterday morning, and the rumours thereupon of every description were multiplied. Later in the day, however, the newspapers, notwithstanding the veto of Stanton, began to publish the accounts that had been received, and they came out by instalments during the course of the day. I have read over very carefully all that has appeared, and have obtained some information not published, and after comparing notes, I think I can give a pretty correct idea of what has occurred.

On Wednesday, June 25, the lines of the Federal army commenced on the right at a place called Michawinle, about eight miles north of Richmond, and near the line of the Virginia central road. The line then proceeded in a south-easterly direction for about five miles, when it crossed the Richmond and York River Railroad, which is the road running from Richmond to the White House on the Pamunkey River. This White House has been the depot of supplies for the army, everything being landed there, and conveyed by the railroad to the camp. The line of this road was, of course, in possession of the Federal troops, and was guarded out to White House—say about eighteen miles. The main body of the Federal army, however, continued their lines after crossing this railroad in a southerly direction, having at this point crossed the Chickahominy River, and being south of it. The larger portion of the forces was massed at this point, whilst the outer lines were stretched southward towards James River.

On Thursday the Confederates, having crossed over the railroad bridge, commenced an attack on the right wing of the Federal army. This attack is supposed to have been made by Jackson, the great and brilliant leader of the Confederates. The position was strongly contested, with great loss on both sides. The fighting continued throughout the afternoon and evening. Next morning the contest was renewed with great fierceness. The Confederates had been reinforced in the night, but McClellan had also brought up reinforcements, and had at least 45,000 men on the ground. The battle was maintained all day on Friday, and towards afternoon McClellan was compelled to withdraw his forces, and cross the Chickahominy, having retreated about seven miles. This threw open the entire line of the Richmond and York Railroad, and the advancing columns of Jackson immediately moved forward to the White House. They did not get there until Saturday. Returning to the battle of Friday, it was evidently a severe and bloody affair. The newspapers speak of the loss on the Federal side as 1200. I have never been mistaken in any of my estimates of the losses, generally under estimating them, and from all the facts I have gathered I am satisfied that the Federal loss will be fully equal to the Battle of Fair Oaks (or Seven Pines). The Federals have also lost a large number of guns. Not only the battle-field, but the whole country north of the Chickahominy and east of it is now in the possession of the Confederates, and the truth is just this: that at the last dates McClellan's army was hemmed in a space of about six miles square—with the Chickahominy in his rear, the James River on his left flank, and the Confederate armies in his front, on his right, and in his rear across the Chickahominy. He must now either capture Richmond and drive away the Confederate armies, or he is in most imminent danger of being surrounded. He has but one outlet, and but one source of supply, which is the James River. If the Confederates can march down upon his left flank, and cut off his communication with the river, he is ruined. It all turns upon this, so far as an immediate issue is concerned. It is stated that at eleven p.m. on Friday night a council was held, to take into consideration the propriety of abandoning the siege and retreating. Its results are not known, but at the last advices the fighting had again commenced on Saturday. The newspapers keep these impressions from the public, and have heralded the news of the battle as a grand strategic movement. After what I have written, you can understand precisely its strategy. The plain fact is, that McClellan's right wing has been driven in upon his centre, and that a successful attack by the Confederates upon his left wing will cut him off from his only source of support, the James River. Such is the state of affairs now that the fighting must go forward. I do not believe that the Confederates will pause in the midst of their success, and McClellan has no hope unless he can signally defeat them, and hold on to the James River base until he can get assistance or succeed in taking Richmond. Of this, at present, the prospects are certainly not favorable. The telegraphic communications are suspended, as the lines are now in possession of the Confederates. We may, therefore, have to wait some days for further news, but in the meantime the fighting will continue. There is exciting news, no doubt, close at hand.

That portion of the public who permit the editors to do their thinking see no disaster in this position of things, but all those who think for themselves, after reading the accounts, which have been prepared as far as possible to give the most flattering and charming aspect that their nature will admit, are fully impressed with the adverse results to the Federal side; and I think that the movements in financial and stock operations to-day will show it. I am writing this early in the morning. I could now write you at length, with many speculative ideas and views growing out of the aspect of matters at this moment, but as at any minute they may be changed, I will not do so. I can only say to you, that you must be prepared for very momentous news by this or any succeeding steamer.

In addition to the exciting character of the Richmond events, we have accounts that the Federal army in Arkansas is in danger of being surrounded, and that it is retreating. The attack was about to be made on Vicksburg. Faragut's squadron having gone up with the mortar boats.

Great expectations are induged as to the results that are to flow from the appointment of Pope to the command of the army in the valley of the Shenandoah. This is the general who reported the capture of such innumerable prisoners after the evacuation of Corinth. Beauregard, upon reading the report, published a letter, stating that it was all a falsehood, and that his army had not lost 200 men in his withdrawal from Corinth. It is very well known that if Pope did capture these men, that they have never been heard from. It is now stated that both Beauregard and Price are in Richmond, and that Beauregard was in the battle of Friday.

Immense numbers of sick and wounded continue to arrive at the Northern cities from the Virginian army. I do not think that the entire force of the Federal armies is over 300,000 men to-day, such has been the havoc from sickness, death, and other casualties. I doubt whether McClellan has over 80,000 effective men in front of Richmond, and it is said that the Confederates have 200,000. This cannot possibly be true. I estimate the Confederate army at about 120,000 at that point, and possibly not so many.

This news has affected sterling and gold, which declined about 1 per cent. on Saturday, but has now gone back to former rates. Still I look for considerable falling off in rates during this week, as large amounts of gold will undoubtedly come upon the market.

Cotton remains about the same in New York, say 38 to 39 for middling uplands, and no probability of any receipts.

Money is getting to be more in demand, and rates on call are placed at 5 to 6 per cent. If this continues, a considerable amount now deposited with the Sub-Treasurer will be called for, and I do not know where he is to obtain it.

The weather is getting very warm, and we have now the summer full upon us.

From the tenor of the latest accounts from James Island, I think the Federals are going to abandon all their positions on this island, and postpone their operations against Charleston until next fall.

THE DEFENCE OF RICHMOND.—The Richmond Whig of the 27th of June gives an account of the formation, by permission of President Davis, of a patriotic company of official employees:—"Yesterday the first organization to this patriotic end was formed in the General Post-office Department. At an early hour of the day a meeting of all the officers connected with that Department was convened by the direction of the Acting Postmaster-General, Hon. H. St. George Offut, and was organized by calling that officer to the chair. After eloquently explaining the object of the meeting, and communicating the wishes of the President, a company was at once formed, to which no name has yet been given, though we are informed it will probably be the Reagan Rifles. The following are the officers elected:—Captain, John L. Harrell, Alabama; First Lieutenant, B. Fuller N. C.; Second do., J. Frank Boone, Md.; Third do., T. D. Atticus Bibb, Alabama."

MR. LINDSAY'S MOTION.

The following is a summary of the debate that took place on Friday night on the American war. We shall next week present our readers with a full and corrected report, so that our friends in the South may be able to appreciate the views and sympathies of the English people.

On the order for going into a Committee of Supply, Mr. LINDSAY moved the following resolution:—"That, in the opinion of this House, the States which have seceded from the Union of the Republic of the United States have so long maintained themselves under a separate and established Government, and have given such proof of their determination and ability to support their independence, that the propriety of offering mediation, with the view of terminating hostilities between the contending parties, is worthy of the serious and immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government." Adverting to the spirit shown by the press of the Northern States towards this country, he expressed his hope that that press did not reflect the real feelings of the people, and his conviction that the opinion of the British House of Commons could not fail to have a salutary effect. In considering the origin of the present struggle, he showed that the dissatisfaction of the Southern States with the Federal Union was not of recent date; that for a quarter of a century they had had grievances, and complained of the oppressive taxation of the North. He dwelt upon the offensive manner in which the appeals for justice and the prayers for relief of five millions and a-half of people had been received by the Government of Washington, which had precipitated the war. He denied that slavery had anything to do with its causes; the main cause was that the Southern States had been slowly losing their influence in the Lower House of Representatives, and their people, whose interests were bound up with free trade, found that practically they had no voice in taxation, and that the tariffs were framed in the interest of the Northern States, which pursued a policy of protection. The Southern States had, therefore, a double ground of complaint; the taxation was not levied upon the principles of the Constitution; practically, it was taxation without representation; and the taxes were levied for the benefit of particular States of the Union. The end of the war, he believed, must be separation; that re-union was hopeless; and, if so, it behoved England to offer her mediation, and to ask the Northern States to consider the great distress which the people of this country were enduring through this unhappy war. He read letters from Unionists in America acknowledging the hopelessness of the contest, and pleading for the mediation of England.

Mr. TAYLOR, who had given notice of an amendment to Mr. Lindsay's motion, to leave out all the words after the word "House," in order to insert the words "it is desirable that this country should continue to maintain the strictest neutrality in the civil war unhappily existing in the Republic of the United States," said he thought Mr. Lindsay had not acted prudently in disregarding the suggestion of Mr. Clay, to forbear to move his resolution, which would, he believed, add to the bitterness of the feeling in America. He complained that a portion of the press of this country had not acted fairly towards the Northern States. The resolution meant the recognition of the Southern States and intervention by force, which was another war for war with America. He had never heard, he said, such tremendous issues so raised. The reasons which Mr. Lindsay had assigned for the war were fallacious. It was no casual strife; it had been inevitable for years; it was the Nemesis of that system of slavery which condemned to chattelism millions of human beings. The Northern States had endeavoured to postpone this crisis by discreditable compromises; but there was at length a sacrifice they could not make. He implored the House not to adopt the resolution.

Lord A. V. TEMPEST, who had given notice of a resolution, "That it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to endeavour, either by itself or in combination with other European Powers, by mediation or otherwise, to bring to a termination the existing contest in America," said he thought the House should not separate without expressing an opinion upon the subject of this war. He justified the interference of this country on the grounds of humanity, and of its responsibilities and duties. Laying out of view the hostility and insult evinced by the North towards England, and putting aside the motive of interest, and even moral responsibility he thought the people of the South, who had courageously maintained their independence for sixteen months, claimed the sympathy of this country and of Europe. Mediation, however, he thought would be worthless unless backed by ulterior measures.

Mr. W. FORSTER, after replying to some remarks of Lord V. Tempest, said, in his opinion, the motion of Mr. Lindsay and the manner in which it had been supported by the last speaker were not calculated to terminate the war, but were more likely to aggravate and prolong it, and even to drag us into it. He advocated the principle and policy of non-intervention. Was the object of this resolution, he asked, mediation or forcible interference? If the former, the less that was publicly said about it there the better, and the mediator should be considered a friend by both parties; whereas Mr. Lindsay had avowed his partiality to the South. Then, if the mediation was to be accompanied by a threat, it would be justly regarded as an insult, and would aggravate the evil. If the North were let alone, it was not improbable it would find out that the subjugation of the South was too hard a task. Forcible interference and a war would not only be wicked and unjust, but foolish. He insisted that this civil strife was a great revolution; that tariffs had nothing to do with it, that slavery was the real cause of the war, and that it would be the end of slavery.

Mr. WHITESIDE observed, that although this question was difficult and delicate, that was no reason why the House of Commons should not express an opinion upon it; to shrink from doing it would be a cowardly proceeding on our part, and he thought Mr. Lindsay had deserved well of the country in giving the Government an opportunity of making their sentiments known. Considering the distinctions between the Southern and Northern States, the fact of Secession was not surprising. The assertion that slavery was the true cause of the war was contradicted by the denunciation in the North of those who made this assertion. If there was an opposition of interests between the Northern and Southern States, why should they not be recommended to separate quietly? If the quarrel was, as had been stated, deep-rooted, the mutual hatred malignant, when would they be reconciled? When would other States be entitled to interfere? It was not proposed to interfere, as Mr. Forster supposed, by force, but in the spirit of the resolution. If it was possible to check the waste of human life, it was criminal calmly to stand by. The interference proposed by the resolution, he argued, was perfectly compatible with neutrality. Recognition was a mere acknowledgment of a de facto Government, nothing more; and no ground of war, as he showed on the authority of Sir James Mackintosh and by reference to analogous cases. In all these cases the question, he observed, was one of time and of events, and in his opinion the time had come when, upon the principles of international law, the Southern States, which had so long maintained their independence, might be recognized, without giving just ground of war or umbrage to the North.

Mr. GREGORY contended that though the war was, as Lord Russell had said, for independence on one side, it was not for empire but for revenge on the other, in pursuit of which object every other consideration had been lost sight of by the North, and he insisted that we had a perfect right to endeavour to put a stop to such a state of things. Recognition he considered to be clearly involved in the resolution of Mr. Lindsay, and he added other instances to those cited by Mr. Whiteside to prove that it was the policy of this country, and the practice of the United States to recognize de facto Governments. He enumerated the titles which the Confederate States had established to recognition—in the long maintenance of their independence, in the power to carry on their Government, as well as in their commercial policy, and the stringent provisions they had enacted against the slave trade, the real encouragers of which traffic, he maintained, had been in the North. Those who hated slavery in their hearts must be mad, he said, to suppose that the reconstruction of the Union would be favourable to their views. The slavery pretext was a gross imposture attempted to be palmed upon public credulity. The question had been asked,—If the House adopted the resolution, and mediation was offered and refused, what should next be done? He did not think it would be refused; but if it were, should we recognize the Southern States, it would most probably produce war; but he believed if we acted in conjunction with other States we should hear nothing of war, and meanwhile the impulse would arise from within.

Mr. S. FITZGERALD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Lord PALMERSTON.—I should hope, after the length to which the debate has gone, that the House will be disposed to come to a division to-night (cheers) on the motion of the hon. member for Sunderland. The subject which we have been debating is one of the highest importance, and one also of the most delicate character (hear, hear), and I cannot think that the postponement of the conclusion of this debate till next week can be attended with any beneficial result, either one way or other. (Cheers.)

I confess I regret very much that my hon. friend has thought it his duty to bring this subject under discussion in this House in the present state of things. (Cheers.) There can be but one wish on the part of every man in the country with respect to this war in America, and that is that it should end. (Hear.) I might doubt whether any end which can be satisfactory, or which could lead to an amicable settlement between the two parties, is likely to be accelerated by angry debates in this House. (Cheers.) We have had to-night the American war waged here, in words, by champions on both sides. It is quite true that many things have been said which must be gratifying to the feelings of both parties now fighting in America; but, on the other hand, things have been said in the warmth of debate which must tend to irritate and wound the feelings of both sides, and it is in human nature to think more of things that are offensive, than of things which are gratifying and friendly. I confess, therefore, that I regret that the debate has been brought on, and I should earnestly hope that the House would not agree to the motion of my hon. friend, but would leave it in the hands of the Government, to deal with the future, content as I believe the country is with the manner in which the past has been conducted by them. (Cheers.) I don't ask this upon the ground of confidence in the Government of the day, because I think that whatever party might have the rule in this country—whether might sit on these benches—it would be wise and expedient in the House to leave a matter of such difficulty, of such delicacy, and of such immense importance in the hands of the responsible Government of the day (hear, hear), to deal with it according to the varying circumstances of the moment, and not by a resolution to dictate and point out a specific course, and to tie up their hands, thus taking upon the House of Commons the responsibility which ought properly to belong to the Government. (Cheers.) The motion of my hon. friend points to two courses—mediation and acknowledgment. We have heard a very learned and well-argued speech from the right hon. gentleman opposite on the question of acknowledgment. I am not going to dispute that if this country thought it right to take that course we should be perfectly justified in acknowledging the independence of the Southern States, provided only that that independence had been—in the words which he used—"firmly and permanently established." (Hear, hear.) Moreover, I quite concur with him that our acknowledgment of that independence, if we thought right to make it, would be no just cause of war, no just cause of offence on the part of the United States against this country. But the cases which the right hon. gentleman cited—more especially the cases of the South American republics—were totally different from that which is now presented to our consideration. (Hear, hear.) The South American republics were not acknowledged till a great many years after they had practically achieved and obtained their independence. That was a war between them and Spain—separated by the wide Atlantic from her revolted subjects—and unable with any degree of power to re-establish her authority over them; and, I believe, it was nearly fifteen years—certainly a great many years—before their independence was acknowledged. But what was the state of affairs in this case until the uncertain rumours we have received this day? A fortnight ago it was doubtful whether the Confederates or the Federals would be in possession of Richmond. It was but a few days ago that we imagined that the whole course of the Mississippi was in the hands of the Federals—we knew that New Orleans, and possibly Charleston, were in their hands, and, I contend, that up to the present moment, whatever may be the opinion which anybody may entertain of the resolution of this great determined nation of the South to fight to the last for the maintenance of its independence, practically the contest has not yet assumed the character which would justify this country in assuming that that independence was permanently and fully established. (Cheers.) But, then, many people who talk of acknowledgment seem to imply that that acknowledgment, if made, would establish some different relations between this country and the Southern States. But that is not the case. Acknowledgment would not establish a nation unless it were followed by some direct active interference. (Hear, hear.) Neutrality, as was well observed by the right hon. gentleman opposite, is perfectly compatible with acknowledgment. You may be neutral in a war between two countries whose independence you never called in question. Two long-established countries go to war; you acknowledge the independence of both, but you are not on that account bound to take part in the contest. (Hear.) The right hon. gentleman argued that we had taken a step towards acknowledgment by admitting that the South had belligerent rights, but Vattel and all the best authorities on the law of nations hold that when a civil war breaks out in a country, and is firmly established there, other nations have a right to deal with those two parties as belligerents, without acknowledging the independence of the revolted portion of the country. (Hear, hear.) Admitting that the war has been established on such a footing that each party is entitled to be regarded by other countries as belligerents, the mere fact of our having acknowledged that those two parties are belligerents in the international sense of the word does not imply a step towards acknowledging one or other of them as an independent nation. Nobody can be insensible for a moment of the vast importance to this country of a speedy termination of that war. (Hear, hear.) We all know the privations and sufferings which a great portion of our population are enduring in consequence of that unfortunate war; but, on the other hand, it has been well put by an hon. gentleman who spoke in this debate that any attempt to put an end to it by active interference would only produce greater evils, greater sufferings, and greater privations to those who interfered. (Hear, hear.) There is no instance, I believe, in the history of the world, of a contest such as that which is now going on in America—a contest of such magnitude between two different sections of the same people. The Thirty Years' War in Germany was a joke to it in point of amount and magnitude. It was but the other day that I saw a map sent by the Quartermaster-General of the Federal forces, on which were marked out the positions of 720,000 Federal troops. We now hear that 300,000 more men are to be called into the field—making 1,000,000 of men on one side and probably there is something not much less on the other. Irritation and exasperation on both sides are admitted by all who have taken part in the debate, and is that the moment when it can be thought that a successful offer of mediation could be made to the two parties? (Hear.) My hon. friend said "I don't care for that; we had better offer mediation and let it be refused, and if that were followed by acknowledgment, that acknowledgment would ultimately lead to a satisfactory settlement between the two parties." I wish to guard myself against anything in regard to the future. The events of this war have been so contrary to all anticipations, from time to time, that he would be a bold man indeed who should attempt to prophesy from month to month what character the war would assume. (Hear.) I believe the country and this House are of opinion that the Government has up to the present time pursued a wise and prudent course. (Cheers.) We should be too happy if any opportunity should present itself which would afford us a fair and reasonable prospect that any effort on our part might be conducive to establish peace between these two parties who are carrying on a desolating and afflicting contest, but I think that the House had better leave it to the discretion of the Government to judge of the occasions which may arise, and of the opportunities which may present themselves. (Hear, hear.) It is upon that ground that, without going into any investigation of the rights on either side as to which may be right and which wrong, without expressing any judgment—because I think it is the duty of the Government of this country to abstain from expressing any judgment upon the two parties—I ask the House not to sanction this resolution. If at any time we should be able by friendly offices to contribute to the establishment of peace, it can be only by presenting ourselves in the shape of impartial persons not tied by opinions either one way or the other, anxious only to promote that settlement between the two which may be consistent with the feelings and interests of both. It is only in that way that we can render any service, and, in order to remain in that position, to enjoy that character, it is necessary that we should avoid pronouncing any judgment or opinion. I therefore do not follow the example of those who have expressed opinions upon the merits of the two parties. I only entreat the House not to adopt the resolution of my hon. friend (hear, hear), but to leave to the responsible Government the task of judging what can be done, when it can be done, and how it can be done. (Cheers.)

Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said Mr. Lindsay proposed that Her Majesty's Government should attempt mediation, upon the ground that the Confederate States had long preserved a separate Government, and shown a determination to maintain their independence; and he must say that until he heard the speech of the noble lord, he should have thought it difficult for any one to disagree with the terms of the resolution. The Confederate States had maintained not only a separate Government, but an established Government, with a recognized Constitution, a President, a Senate, and House of Representatives duly elected, constitutions who exercised an independent choice, and elections freely conducted. They had not only a large army in the field, but for upwards of a year had maintained and paid a body of troops numbering not less than 300,000. He thought that we should be wanting in our duty to our own population, as well as to humanity in general, if we did not step forward and, by peaceful mediation, try to put an end to this odious contest. He did not know what course the Government might hereafter take, but he felt assured that if they were only prepared to accept the responsibility of being the first to initiate in Europe the policy of inviting—in conjunction with the Powers of the Continent—the contending States of America to come to a settlement of their differences, they would have the satisfaction of knowing that they had taken a step which might have the effect of restoring peace to one hemisphere, and contentment and prosperity to the suffering people of another.

Mr. HOWARD, in whose name a notice stood on the paper to the effect that it was his intention to move "that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to use every means consistent with the maintenance of peace, either in concert with the Great Powers of Europe or otherwise, as they may think it expedient, to endeavour to terminate the civil war now raging in America," said he did not feel disposed to take the course suggested for the adoption of the hon. member for Sunderland, and withdraw his motion. Very little had been said in the course of the discussion with respect to the distressed operatives of Lancashire and Cheshire, of whom 197,000 were working short time, while 58,990 were altogether without employment. He implored the Government, in the name of justice and charity, as well as in the interests of humanity, to take some steps to put an end to the misery which the unhappy struggle in America was creating, not only in that country, but our own.

Mr. LINDSAY then asked the permission of the House to withdraw his motion, observing that he would rest satisfied with the statement of the noble lord at the head of the Government, and the hope which it held out that he would take the earliest opportunity to bring about the termination of the war.

The motion was then withdrawn.

DISAPPOINTED HOPES.—On June 30 the New York World said:—"There are several obvious theories to account for the suppression of the news. The first and most probable is that the final result was not officially known, and that General McClellan, if he was following up the enemy to Richmond, had not time to compose official despatches to the War Department. We incline to the belief that a victory has been won, and that General McClellan is now in or near Richmond."

THE BATTLES BEFORE RICHMOND, AND THE FEDERAL REPORTS.(From The Times of Monday.)

For some days past the tidings of the battles before Richmond have vibrated with every hour. Telegrams and mails have succeeded each other with discordant rapidity. The pendulum has swung from the point of Federal victory to that of Federal destruction. No one could tell what had really happened, because no one could believe the Government assurances, and it was not safe to give credence to the panic fears which in the general ignorance arose in the popular imagination. Everything which lay between a successful strategic movement and the utter destruction of the army of the Potomac was possible, and every possible contingency had its advocates.

At length, however, the truth begins to become apparent, and there really is very little difference between the facts as they are now told in sober phrase and the worst version which was blurted to the world in startling telegrams. If it be not true that McClellan is a fugitive, and the whole of his army pressed to the necessity of capitulation, it appears that there was a moment when this appeared so natural a result of the position that they who asserted those facts might fairly have believed that they were justified by what was happening around them. A series of six days of battle and six days of defeat is now described in the letters received at New York. Routes wherein officers often led the way of flight, and in which they never succeeded in staying the headlong scamper of their men, a general "stampede" to the cry of "The Rebels are coming," a run from post to post, the enemies ever pursuing, and the dead and wounded left in the hands of the pursuers,—these are the events which are now detailed in horrible minuteness by those who have survived them. Six days and seventeen miles of flight and slaughter are the real facts which have been sickened over by pale, ghastly boasts of strategic success. The dead had no more to fear, but the wounded were left in the swamps where they fell, necessarily deserted by their flying friends, passed over by their enemies, and without hope of seeing other faces in this world than those of men and women who had a right to detest them as mercenary plunderers and invaders. Such a scene arouses every sense of horror and pity; but these feelings are turned half into contempt when we find that the leader of this panic-stricken host, having left all his siege batteries and his stores behind, having fled to his ships, and being momentarily safe under the protection of their guns, complacently in a General Order the ragged remnants of his army upon their achievements and their valour, and volunteers the conspicuous falsehood that "they have saved all their material and all their guns, except a few lost in battle."

Such a dreadful carnage as that which has just taken place in America is unknown in modern times. As the horrors of the French Revolution crept out of peaceful-looking votes of general fraternity and the abolition of capital punishment, so the bloodless sieges and battles which gave the commencement of this civil war an air of pastime have deepened into a furious struggle. In which populations seem to join with no other idea than that of mutual extermination. With a great army completely beaten and demoralized, it is painful to find the defeated general fabricating portentous estimates of the amount of men his conquerors must have lost in beating him. It is sadly ludicrous to see him making a pretence of stealing back towards the city he lately beleaguered, feeling his way along the banks of his protecting river with cautious leisure, and venturing only where his gunboats can accompany him, and can shell the woods in his front to make sure there is no Confederate force that can harm him. While his flags of truce are refused, and while he is unable to count his own dead or gather his own wounded, it is pitiable to hear him talk of the Confederate loss. Perhaps we might pardon him, under the circumstances, for stating in his despatches to Washington that at "one o'clock on July 4—the great Day of Independence—the bands were playing, the national salutes being fired, and things looking bright;" but it is not pardonable in a general so utterly beaten and so nearly destroyed to reassert in that same despatch that "our forces were not beaten in any conflict, nor could they be driven from the field by the uttermost efforts of the enemy." Neither is it pardonable in a general addressing an army yet panting from a seventeen miles' run, to parody the language of Napoleon, and tell his wretched followers that they may always say with pride, "I belonged to the army of the Potomac." We understand the fortitude and determination of a brave man under defeat, but these qualities never lack the dignity of truth, and are never seen draped in tawdry falsehood.

But we shall probably be asked what it is to us that General McClellan should talk this trash to his army and to his Government. We answer, first, that official documents are the materials of history, and that it is the business of every man to expose those who falsify them. Veracity in men who hold conspicuous positions is also a quality which it is the interest of all mankind to insist upon on pain of infamy. But principally it is in the interest of humanity that we desire to cry down this newly-adapted custom of systematic falsehood. While the American Press is gagged; while private opinion in the Northern States is under the suppression of a terrorism; while the Government prints what it pleases, and points to its public despatches as the only proof of current facts, it is important that every free voice should cry a warning against the deception which is being practised upon the people of America. These falsehoods, which are so ridiculous here, where we can compare them with the accounts of eye-witnesses transmitted from the spot, may have the effect of hardening the North to the further prosecution of this hopeless and sanguinary invasion.

We believe that, if the history of those six days' fighting could be fairly told all over the Northern States, the effect would be to put an end to the war. Not that the North would be daunted by the carnage, or think itself unable to continue the contest, but that the object would be seen to be too difficult to be further pursued, and not worth the sacrifice demanded. It is very different to give up the desire to possess another man's house, and to surrender the determination of defending your own. You may easily come to find the first to be an imprudent adventure; you can never come to find the last an object to be abandoned. This difference is forgotten by the few shallow reasoners in this country who are constantly telling us that 20,000,000 must in the end beat 8,000,000. So they would, no doubt, if the two populations would meet in some great prairie and fight it out at once. But, as the 20,000,000 can only send a part of their numbers against the 8,000,000, and must maintain these numbers at a distance from home, the figures are by no means conclusive. In practice the 20,000,000 dwindle down to that fraction of them who choose to go out and fight, whereas the 8,000,000, being attacked in their own homes, are compelled to muster their whole fighting force. The practical refutation of this silly fallacy, as it is to be read in every page of former history, is now also to be seen in every fact of our contemporary experience. A population of 20,000,000 ought to give about 4,000,000 of fighting men, but so far from any such number being ready to become invaders of the South, there seems to be no probability of even the new levy of 300,000 men being obtained. The more the truth is known, the smaller will be the probability of volunteers coming forward to feed this waste of human life. If real accounts were allowed to circulate in the Federal States of the hardships which are endured, the slaughter which is suffered as well as inflicted, and the fevers and agues which destroy the hostile hosts, small chance would there be of any bounty drawing even the necessitous and ill-used Irish emigrant to such a death as that offered by the White Oak Swamp. These false despatches and these bombastic General Orders are, then, something more than mere breaches of veracity; they are bolts to catch mere food for powder and more prey for pestilence. McClellan's real position is along the bank of the James River, sheltering under the guns of his gunboats, which protect him from his enemy. So long as he stays where he is he must lose largely every night by fever; if he moves, he must move over a swamp into the clutches of a victorious enemy.

THE SECESSION OF THE WEST.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—Happily for the Confederate cause, it has become superfluous to heap up arguments for the purpose of proving, not only that Secession is an undeniable fact, but that it is an indisputable right. Those to whom such arguments were originally addressed trusted to refute them with the sword. The Federals would not listen to reason, because they fancied themselves omnipotent in the battle-field. They believed that cannon-balls had more cogency than syllogisms, and that thousands of sharp bayonets were the best logical weapons for vindicating the correctness of their opinions, and triumphantly refuting the reasonings of the Confederates. In so thinking they resembled those persecutors of a bygone age, of whom Addison neatly remarked that they "convicted their adversaries with a sortes, commonly called a pile of faggots." Moreover, in setting up an abstraction called the "Union" as a worthy object for which to do battle, they acted like Don Quixote when he sallied forth to maintain against all comers the peerless charms of the imaginary Dulcinea of Toboso. The victories about which the Federals have boasted so much have been as unreal and fruitless as those which the Knight of La Mancha fancied he had achieved, while the title with which the latter dubbed himself may be appropriately bestowed on the great Federal commander. There may be great doubts as to the kind of honours which General McClellan has earned by his victories on paper and his wonderful strategy in the field. At this moment, he may be truly styled the "Knight of the Rueful Countenance."

For the present it is unnecessary to enlarge on the wickedness of the North and the weakness of General McClellan. Let me rather endeavour to show the folly of the conduct recently pursued by the Federals, and the consequences which will follow from it. Never, perhaps, did the leaders of a powerful nation display greater imprudence and perversity than President Lincoln and his ministers have done in wilfully prolonging this lamentable contest. President Lincoln is not personally responsible for the secession of the Southern States. The "Union" was dissolved before he entered upon the duties of his office. Disbelieving the evidence of his senses, he denied that the "Union" was at an end; overrating the measure of his power, he declared that it should be maintained by force of arms. It may be that he honestly believed in the existence of a desire for reunion among the people of the Southern Confederacy; if so, he should not be too severely blamed for acting in accordance with that belief. But this delusion was soon dispelled. The Confederates testified by their deeds the unanimity of their sentiments. They have since shown not only that they are unanimous in asserting their rights, but that they are capable of defending them. Thus the circumstances under which President Lincoln originally acted having altered, his policy should have been changed also. Having found that certain States had definitely seceded, he ought to have acted so as to bind together the remaining ones by the ties of interest, if not of affection. A wise ruler would have done this; but unfortunately for the North it is ruled by a man to whom his eulogists cannot ascribe any virtue, save honesty. To call a man honest, is equivalent to saying of a woman that she is plain; it is merely the polite way of stating that the man is an unmitigated fool, and the woman is deplorably ugly. Now, honest President Lincoln had it in his power to end the war, and thereby prevent the speedy secession of the Western States. He may still conclude peace with the South; but he has made it impossible for the Western States to continue members of the "Union." Like the Confederate States, they have agricultural products to exchange for manufactured goods. Hence, it is essential that whatever they import must be low-priced. For some years back the Western farmers have got barely remunerative prices for their grain. If those prices should remain stationary, while those of manufactured goods should be doubled or trebled, it will be impossible for them to continue tilling their fields at a profit. When that time arrives, the prosperity of the Western States will be at an end, and the inhabitants of the now flourishing territories will be reduced to beggary. If, in addition, they are compelled to pay heavy taxes, their condition will be most wretched. These results will necessarily follow the virtual prohibition of the importation of low-priced European manufactures into the Federal States by the imposition of high protective duties, as well as the levying the crushing war taxes for the purpose of carrying on the war against the South. The dwellers in the West will then perceive that nothing but Secession can save them from utter ruin. They will then discover, not only that Secession is a sacred right, but an imperative duty. They have never loved the Yankees, and they will hate them as fervently as the Confederates now do when they find out, by bitter experience, that the chief objects for which the war is being waged are that the manufacturers of Pennsylvania and the contractors of New England may fatten on the spoils afforded by protective tariffs and remunerative war contracts. When the inhabitants of the Western States associate Secession with free trade and riches they will become stubborn Secessionists to a man; the "Union" will be again broken up, and the mighty Confederacy of the West founded on its ruins.

The gigantic levies which President Lincoln has decreed, the tax bill and protectionist tariff sanctioned by Congress, are hastening that consummation. Already have associations been formed, with a view to resist the payment of war taxes. Not only are the Federals sowing the seeds of war with the West, but they are running the risk of losing several of the States and cities which they now occupy. General McClellan has declared that the Southern capital must fall; at this moment Washington is more liable to capture than Richmond. His army is now encamped in Virginia: it may not be long before Maryland is in the possession of the Confederates. The Federals have boasted that, should the South refuse to return to the "Union," the Southern States will be subjugated, and Southern property confiscated. The Confederates have confined themselves to fighting instead of boasting; to winning victories instead of fabricating idle prophecies. But they may yet teach the Federals that subjugation is a game which two can play at. Hitherto they have battled to maintain their independence, and to defend their property and their lives from the grasp of a ruthless foe. Unless the Federals speedily abandon their hopeless and infamous enterprise, the Confederates may be forced to carry the war into the North, and may there humiliate as well as vanquish their opponents, by dictating terms of peace upon Northern soil.

R.

COLONEL STEWART'S CAVALRY EXPLOIT.

The correspondent of the New York Tribune thus criticises this brilliant enterprise:—

"The Confederate Government knows not how to honour merit, nor encourage enterprise, if it does not make a Brigadier-General out of the Colonel who led the 160 dragoons in the amazingly impudent and amazingly successful raid of Friday night. The officer is said to be Stewart. He had resided at the Tyler Mansion, near the Baltimore Cross Roads, and consequently was familiar with the country. But the enterprise was bold, shrewd, and soldierly, thorough and thorough. The account of it in the Richmond papers ought to be good reading—for Richmond people. There has been no laughter over it in this army. Nor has there been much open criticism of the military condition which permitted a squadron of cavalry, in a moonlight night, to go through and through our lines, fire upon a train bearing sick soldiers to a hospital, and crowded with employees in the transportation service, kill, wound, and capture numbers of them, then break up the railroad, to gallop off away and pillage and burn two valuable vessels under charter to the Quartermaster's Department—then pounce upon a forage and goods train of a hundred waggon, and make the surprised drivers hitch Uncle Samuel's mules, over three hundred in number, to the poles, and start off amid roars of laughter to Richmond—scatter terror to the very wharves of the White House Landing, and cause a general and hasty arming of every driver, soldier, and stevedore that could be gathered up, and made to hold a Secesh or Union musket, whichever was nearest at hand, and cause the hasty shipment of the wounded and women, and the raising of steam and the slipping of cables by every vessel in this crowded harbour, and, to crown its marvellous industry, allowed this handful of men to summon forth the surgeon of a large hospital, and to demand of him a parade of every soldier and civilian in the Tyler Mansion fit for duty, and when this muster and parade were made, by the light of the moon, permitted it to march them off to Richmond as prisoners of war—all of them, save a few courteously left with the surgeon, on his representation that they were indispensable to the hospital as assistants. Courteously left, I said. Generously I should have said—for of courtesy, the camp story is, there was not much, but of derision a good deal. 'Tis said of the Colonel, that when the surgeon's request for his regular assistants was reported to him, he laughingly replied, 'Let him have them. It won't do to break the concern up, for we shall want to make an occasional run on it.'"

RELIABILITY OF NORTHERN REPORTS.—The following, printed in large type, appeared in General Butler's paper, the New Orleans Delta, on June 12:—"On May 31, Richmond was evacuated, and General McClellan took possession of the city. General Banks had, with reinforcements, driven Stonewall Jackson headlong towards the foot of General McDowell, who has probably, before this, kicked him over the border. So ends the drama for the Mother of Statesmen. The home of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and all the numerous fathers of liberty, is cleansed from corruption. It is enough."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names, or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through Henry Forze, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 28s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JULY 24, 1862.

New Features of the War.

If the last Northern reports of the progress of the war are true, and since they are unfavourable to the Federal cause, we may reasonably conclude that if they do not reveal the whole truth, they are reliable as far as they confess to Confederate triumphs and to Federal disasters, accomplished or threatened, the area of warlike operations has rapidly extended, instead of being contracted and reduced to narrow limits, according to the Washington programme. Whilst Mr. Lincoln is calling for more men to recruit the army in Virginia, and meets with such a languid response, in spite of the urgency of the situation, the offer of a liberal bounty, and a payment in advance, that a conscription is imminent, the South is cheerfully arming in every direction to do battle with the invader; so that the Federal armies are not only in a hostile country, but are surrounded by hostile camps. We do not intend by these remarks to paraphrase the Federal boasting of crushing the enemy in thirty or ninety days; for though the difficulties of the North, and the successes that have lately been vouchsafed to the Confederate arms, may reasonably be regarded as indications of the approaching termination of the struggle, it is possible that the war of independence is yet in its infancy; but, at all events, the extension of the war will make it necessary for the North to bring larger armies into the field than heretofore, and to increase the already ruinous expenditure; and, further, the new features of the war must convince even the partisans of the North that the conquest of the South, if ever effected, must be preceded by the extermination of the Southern people, and by the prostration and desolation of the North.

The Confederates, under the command of General Van Dorn, have captured Baton Rouge, near to New Orleans, and taken 1500 Federal prisoners. The proximity of the enemy must be unpleasant to General Butler, and, but for the gunboats, would be dangerous; as it is, this movement cannot fail to inspire the people of New Orleans with the hope of relief from the despotic rule under which they now suffer.

The operations in Tennessee are very menacing to the Federals. The Confederates, in considerable force, have captured Murfreesborough, a place about thirty miles from Nashville, with which capital it is connected by a railroad, and it is supposed that Nashville will shortly be attacked; and we may be sure that the people of that city, whose patriotism was lately manifested by the clergy preferring imprisonment to taking the oath of fealty to the United States, will do all in their power to aid the good cause.

Near Frankfort, the capital of Kentucky, the Confederates, we are told, are in great force, which means that the Kentuckians have risen to throw off the Federal yoke; and that the rising is general, we infer from the report that "considerable excitement exists at Louisville." Thus the capitals of Tennessee and Kentucky are menaced, and will probably pass into the hands of the Confederates. More than ever has the Washington Government cause to be anxious for the safety of General Halleck's army. The Confederates near Nashville and in Kentucky are in its rear. General Curtis, as we announced in our last issue, has been obliged to withdraw from Arkansas, which leaves General Halleck exposed to attack from the Southern forces in that State. If, as reported, 50,000 men have left the Federal army in Tennessee to join McClellan in Virginia, and if, as stated by Mr. Lane in the United States' Senate, Halleck lost 50,000 men in the marshes before Corinth, the Federal hold upon Tennessee is very weak, and General Halleck can only carry on the war with his marvellous pen. If, however, he has still a considerable force, and the capture of an express train between Memphis and Corinth was due to negligence, and not to weakness, his power of aggression and means of defence must be crippled, if not paralyzed by being thus encircled by the enemy, who may close upon him and compel him to follow the example of General McClellan, and execute the brilliant strategic movement of a disastrous retreat to the cover and protection of the Federal gunboats. Thus dark and forboding is the Federal position, according to Federal accounts; that the actual position is much worse we may readily conceive.

The Confederate triumphs have not been compensated by Northern successes. The operations against Charleston have been abandoned by the withdrawal of the Federal forces from James Island to Port Royal. Mobile is strongly fortified, is defended by a large army under the command of a resolute and able general, and we learn that in the bay are two Confederate gunboats and a ram. The preparedness of Mobile has, we suppose, cooled the ardour of the North, for we do not now hear even a whisper of an intention to make any immediate attack upon that city. By the latest advices we are informed that Vicksburg, though assailed, was still holding out, and further, that reinforcements under General Breckinridge were en route for that place. The uncertainty as to the movements of General Beauregard, who has not gone to Richmond as reported, for we are enabled to state positively that he was not in the Confederate capital on the 25th of June, is very harassing to the Federals. Altogether we cannot imagine a more gloomy state of affairs for the invader.

Let us now turn to Virginia, which still mainly engrosses public attention on either side of the Atlantic. The memorable seven days' fight is more than a nine days' wonder, and some time must elapse before we can thoroughly appreciate the momentous consequences and the fearful character of that bloody struggle, which, by the consummate generalship and stern resolution of the Confederates, resulted in the overthrow of one of the largest, if not the largest, and best equipped armies that has ever been sent forth to battle. The details of the slaughter are sickening. In that retreat the wounded were left by their comrades to perish from lack of assistance, and the dying and dead were mingled together. The exact losses are still uncertain, but the lowest estimate reveals an unparalleled carnage. Perhaps we may get some idea of the extent of the losses by considering that the Federals already admit that four generals and forty-three colonels of regiments were killed, wounded, or taken prisoners: that the 55th Regiment had only left fifty men fit for service; that the 4th New Jersey Regiment lost 559 men out of 640; that the 22nd Massachusetts lost 560 men out of 780; that the Mozart Regiment lost 780 men out of 1100; and that the 12th New York Regiment is literally annihilated. With such facts before us, we are almost driven to conclude that when the entire loss is stated at between 30,000 and 40,000 it is not an exaggeration.

And what position does the bleeding, decimated army now occupy? It is encamped on ground whereague and fever are supreme during the present and two succeeding months. In front of it is the enemy, numerically superior and flushed with victory. In its rear, too, on the opposite side of the river, the enemy is erecting batteries, firing into the Federal transports, and threatening to cut off the supplies of the army, or, at all events, to make those supplies wretchedly uncertain. No wonder that an uneasy feeling prevails at New York; no wonder that the Government dreads to let the truth be known, and seeks to conceal it by a rigid censorship of the press, and by the dissemination of false reports as to the safety of the army and the reinforcements that are about to join it; no wonder that in Congress there should be a cry of indignation, and we are scarcely surprised that, in the hour of bitter disappointment and justifiable panic, Mr. Chandler, the Senatorial representative of Michigan, should call for vengeance on the President, or on the Commander-in-chief, and say, "the criminal, in his judgment, should not only be deprived of office, but suffer the extreme penalty of the law;" no wonder the people of the North, engaged in a war of aggression, should, as Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, told the Senate, "dread being employed in swampy, unhealthy places," and that he should have proposed that the poor negro should be impressed into the Federal service to perform the deadly work from which the white people shrink. But it is a wonder that at such a time the Federal President and the Federal Commander should dare to call defeat victory; a proceeding that cannot be too strongly denounced.

Does General McClellan think that, by boasting of victory he can blind his soldiers to the fearful chasms in their ranks, and make them forget the comrades whom they left dead and dying on their retreat? Does he think that by his address he can drown the remembrance of officers leading the flight of their troops, and that, at the cry of the "rebels are coming," order and discipline were at an end? Does he think that, though with the 200,000 men he led from Washington, he could not get into Richmond, yet that he may do so by arrogant assurance with the remnant of that powerful army?

Mr. Lincoln told the troops "they had not been whipped and never would be," and that he knew they "would never give up without going into Richmond." Surely this was a ghastly mockery, and no good can come from endeavouring to raise the spirits of a defeated army by such flagrant falsehoods and such wild predictions. The soldiers who listen to this address of the Chief Magistrate of the United States may have applauded it, but in their hearts they knew it was completely untrue. Perhaps Mr. Lincoln may again bid the people return thanks to Heaven for a pretended victory, or it is possible Mr. Lincoln regards himself, or would have others regard him, as the Supreme Arbiter, else how is it he unfalteringly proclaims that the army never will be beaten. If this is madness there is much method in it. If the army of the Potomac has not been defeated, then, truly, it never will be defeated, for there is no such thing as defeat. And if the future efforts of the South should, through the blessing of Providence, be crowned with triumphs commensurate with those that have lately rewarded her endurance and devotion, and the army of the Potomac should have to surrender to the victorious foe, and be taken to Richmond, as 12,000 of its number have already been taken there, as prisoners of war, then Mr. Lincoln may say he foretold that the men would "never give up without going into Richmond."

Yet, in the midst of these military disasters, at the moment when the prospect is everywhere clouded, with national bankruptcy inevitable, with political dissensions in the North, with the threat of the West not to contribute to pay the taxes levied by Congress, with the certainty of being obliged to resort to conscription, the people and press still clamour for war with England or France, and do what they can to threaten and insult those nations. It seems as though the United States was to illustrate the truth of the well-worn saying, "that whom the gods destroy they first make mad."

The Position of Canada in the American War.

At the same time that the debate on Mr. Lindsay's motion was progressing in the Commons, on Friday night, the Lords were engaged with a subject which, though indirectly, had scarcely a less important bearing upon American policy. On the subject of colonial fortifications, and relative to the refusal of the Canadian Parliament to pass a Militia Bill, Lord Ellenborough pronounced the following pregnant sentences:—

Every man must see that in whatever manner the present civil war in America terminates, whether in the success of the North or in the separation of the South, the immediate result will be an irruption into Canada. If the people of the North fail, they will attack Canada as a compensation for their loss. If they succeed, they will attack Canada in the drunkenness of victory.

If Lord Ellenborough is right—and the Peers seemed to have so far agreed with his opinion as not to deny the extreme probability of Canada being endangered by the pacification of America—the inference will be drawn by many that the termination of the war is not a proper object of British policy, and the heartless remark ascribed to Mr. Carlyle, “that the war is the burning out of a very dirty chimney, which the neighbours may witness with composure, and even self-congratulation,” becomes, in a measure, justified. We venture, however, for reasons which to us appear conclusive, to differ from the opinions expressed by this high authority, as well as from the inference which may be drawn from that opinion.

First, as to the new and nearer danger which peace on any terms between the present belligerents would bring upon Canada. We have on former occasions stated our conviction that the true defence of that dependency lay in the exposed condition of California, which is practically nearer to our ships of war than to those of the United States, and the value of which, to its possessors, more than compensates the value of Canada to us. Without the Great Pacific Railway, which can alone bridge over the vast gulf placed by an impassable desert between the Atlantic and Pacific States, without an adequate naval force on that remote coast, which they can only reach by the circumnavigation of a continent, and without available defences of its scanty harbours, the Americans will not care to attempt the execution of their boastful threats. We have also pointed out the danger which, in a war with us, would threaten the United States from the somewhat questionable loyalty of the people of Maine in such an event. But there are stronger reasons still. Exhausted of men and means, as the United States must be whenever this war ends, whence shall they muster the energies for another as great and, perhaps, even more dangerous. What has sustained them thus far, almost as much as the feverish frenzy which actuates them, has been their uninterrupted communication with the world, while their opponents were almost wholly excluded from such communication. In a war with Great Britain they would be in the same position to which their naval superiority has reduced the South. Their ports would be virtually blockaded, the military stores of Europe would fail them, and their chief supplies of recruits be hopelessly cut off. With a currency already depreciated to an extent which the South did not reach until after six months of blockade, how shall the armies now existing be paid and supported when the streams of gold from California are dried up, and a foreign enemy holds unchecked sway of the seas? Let it be borne in mind that the conquest of Canada affords no such stimulants to popular passions as the conquest of the South. The South has heretofore furnished two-thirds of the exports of the Union; the monopoly of her trade has built up the great cities of the Northern Atlantic seaboard; its recovery would not, perhaps, be too dearly purchased even at the enormous price it has already cost. Canada is not, at best, a wealthy country; it produces none of the great staples of the world's commerce, and it would be difficult to show that its incorporation would add one pound to the net revenue of the Union. The same motives of cupidity—of retaining spoils which long possession had caused to be considered as lawful property—of recovering outlays, which otherwise would be ruinous, by further desperate efforts—do not, therefore, exist in the two cases. Besides, the conquest of Canada would be a foreign war, and as such could not have the same hold upon the minds of an entire people as a war professedly waged in support of their own Government, and in defence of the integrity of their own territory. The conquest of the South, though differing neither in theory nor in fact from any other foreign conquest, has this pretence, and the North can hardly be blamed for clinging to it, so long as foreign statesmen, by publicly declaring the war “a civil war,” and foreign Governments, by an exceptional disregard to the claims of nationality of one of the belligerents recognize the validity of that pretence. The war upon the South has been actually undertaken; it has been attended with just sufficient success to give delusive hopes of greater successes; too much has been staked on it to make it easy to abandon the stake. The war upon Canada has yet to be begun. Important practical distinctions these, when we judge of the aggressive powers of the North in the one case by those it displays in the other. We cannot help thinking that a disposition has recently been manifested in our public counsels to grossly exaggerate the substantial strength of America. A phenomenon, startling indeed, but yet traceable to causes which never existed before, and can never occur again, is mistaken for a normal fact, and it is forgotten that both the North and the South are now displaying a strength of which, under any other circumstances than those in which they are actually placed, they would be utterly incapable.

But admitting to the fullest extent, for the sake of argument, Lord Ellenborough's statement of the danger, the conclusion by no means follows that the prolongation of the war is an object of British policy. The war, it is a mere truism to say, cannot last for ever. The danger, then, admitted to exist, must be met at some time or other, and the question simply is at what time it would be best to meet it. The war must end in one or the other manner to which the noble Earl refers, and here the question is to decide which of the two possible terminations brings the preponderance of danger. In other words, whether the North would be more formidable in the “drunkenness of victory,” or in the search of “compensation for its loss.” Nations, like men, are wiser in the hour of adversity than in that of prosperous fortune, and to nations as to men the intoxication of the passions lends transitory powers which cool calculation never gives. Without entering into a detailed examination, it must be apparent that the relative and absolute ability of the North to inflict injury upon England is greater if, by the reconquest of the South, it can bring commercial as well as military weapons to bear upon her, than if helplessly thrown upon its own exhausted resources. The possession of the South would give the enemy of England the monopoly of cotton and tobacco, as well as that of grain, and these might prove in that enemy's hands more formidable engines of war than huge muster rolls of foreign hirelings, or old merchant ships improvised into a navy. Great Britain's interest, therefore, were there no other consideration than that of Canada, would obviously point to a separation which removes such dangerous weapons from such threatening hands. Further, it would be her manifest interest to endeavour to use these very weapons against the enemy who lately wielded them.

This leads us to another inference from Lord Ellenborough's statement, namely, that we cannot prudently remain passive spectators of the contest until it shall have ended by the triumph of either of the parties to it. If one of these parties is so dangerous a foe as Lord Ellenborough represents, it behoves us to seek an ally in the other. This we can scarcely hope to achieve by a cold indifference to the party whose alliance we desire, and even less by a persistent disregard of just claims upon us. With the South as the warm friend of England, the invasion of Canada means the invasion of the North by a military Power whose frontiers extend to within a few miles of Washington, and it would only be according to human nature if the Southerners, who now claim only justice, did not regret so tempting an opportunity for revenge. Great Britain cannot send 100,000 men into Canada, but she can, without cost to her in time of peace, keep 300,000 men ever ready for its defence. We are answered, that Great Britain needs incur no present risks to ensure these future advantages, which she will obtain under any circumstances from the necessity and self-interest of the Southerners. The fact that the great object of separation appears now on the eve of being permanently accomplished by the efforts of the South alone, gives to this argument a weight which it did not have while the uncertainty of the issue still involved momentous British interests. It is true that the South is impelled by every motive of policy and self-interests into the most intimate alliance with this country, and that on this account we might expect to obtain from necessity what we could not expect from gratitude. But we have too many lamentable proofs before us that nations are not always—nay, are seldom—swayed by an enlightened view of their true interests. On the other hand, we know that the aggregates, like the individuals that compose them, are the prey of passions and prejudices, of hates and loves. It is in great crises like that through which the South is now passing that these national passions are contracted, for it is in them that the national character is formed. In ordinary times the quarrels of great societies of men, however angry, are soon forgotten, because they make but a superficial impression; but in the infancy of nations, and during that baptism of blood to which all nations worthy of the name have at some period of their existence been compelled to submit, the national mind is like a red-hot fusible mass on which impressions are indelibly stamped. We may rest assured of a liberal commercial policy of the South in every event, but its love or its hatred, its active co-operation and sympathy, or its passive indifference, we are now acquiring, according as we now shape our policy towards it, unalterably for long generations to come.

So far, then, from affording a strong argument, as we have heard it stated, against any action whatever of the British Government and people during the continuance of this war, Lord Ellenborough has, in our opinion, adduced the most powerful reasons why we should extend to the young nation now struggling for its existence in the Western Hemisphere the most generous sympathies and the most friendly offices which are consistent with justice, international usages, and international obligations.

The “Mean Whites” of the South.

If the Southern States of the late American Union were a newly-discovered country, now for the first time brought to the notice of wondering mankind, inhabited by tribes of strange natures and customs and of a different species from ourselves, it would be impossible to invent more extravagant travellers' stories than are now told and very generally believed of a country which for fifty years has furnished two of the greatest staples of commerce, and which is peopled by men of our own lineage and tongue. We read about the Southern States; we travel in them; friends and relatives go there to reside; there should, then, be no lack of accurate and authentic information. But so long has Europe been accustomed to view these States through a distorting medium that even the friendly disposed find it difficult to see them in their proper light. Travellers who, like the Honourable Miss Murray and Miss Frederika Bremer, instead of the expected horrors, report having found hospitable homes, and men and women like those they are wont to meet at home, are excused for their amiable credulity and their want of opportunity for observation. Englishmen who take up their abode among this barbarous people, as a rule, soon adapt themselves to its manners and customs, and are quick to unlearn the prejudices with which they came; but they, of course, are not impartial witnesses. What everybody believes must be true, and one sensation story, well told is worth more than all the biased statements of the friends of the South. Those who write to be read flatter the prevailing prejudice, and thus it happens that to this day a portion of the English people still look upon the Southern planters as a something between the Turk of tradition and the Arab of the desert, resembling the former in the sensuous luxury of his pleasures, and the latter in the cruel savagery of his manners. There are well-informed, well-read, travelled persons who picture to themselves the man of Alabama or of South Carolina, with straw hat, striped cotton jacket, lash in hand, driving before him his embruted human cattle, just as he was represented in certain tracts in our childhood, and who still believe that the revolver and bowie-knife are used in the Southern country with scarcely less frequency, and quite as much unconcern, as in happier regions the domestic knife and fork. We smile at the grotesque sketches of English manners which, in this year of grace and of the Exhibition, are given for the instruction of a sister capital not a day's journey from us, but we are daily committing the same folly in regard to a people whose manners, whose laws, whose language, whose mode of thought, are essentially our own.

The most stupendous blunder, which is almost universally made in treating of the Southern States, is that of speaking of their population as divided into two great classes, one of which is supposed to revel in Cæsan wealth, and the other, and by far the more numerous, to be sunk in the deepest depths of destitution and degradation. It has become usual of late years to designate this latter class as the "white trash" or "the mean whites" of the South, terms which, we believe, were first invented by Mrs. Beecher Stowe, but which are sought in vain either in the books of the South or in the language of its society. A member of the British Parliament, in a recent debate, even improved upon the use of these words, and spoke of "mean whitisun" as though it were a familiar and well-defined noun in the English vocabulary. A writer who styles himself a political economist has classified and enumerated by name the different varieties of the genus "mean whites." We can imagine the mingled feeling of grief and puzzled wonderment with which Southerners read such things. The same writer has also favoured us with statistics on this subject, and fixes the number of "mean whites" at five millions, out of a population of eight millions, and these five-eighths of the population of the most productive country in the world lead, we are told, "a life alternating between listless vagrancy and the excitement of marauding expeditions."

Southerners, when interrogated on this subject, point to the steady increase in the population—white and black—of their country, and the truly astonishing increase of its productiveness, as the best proof that the people of that country cannot be the thriftless, wretched vagabonds which their revilers represent them. They point to the number and extent of railways they have constructed, and which, within the last eleven years of peace, actually exceed the similar progress of any other country, as a corroboration of this proof. They also point to the general prosperity and solvency of all corporate enterprises within this supposed thriftless region. They do not pretend that the South is an earthly Elysium; they admit, regretfully, the imperfections of its social and political institutions; they recognize the existence of much of that lawless passion which is the characteristic of sparsely and newly-settled countries, and they are not blind to the vast tasks of material and moral improvements which lie before them; but, on the other hand, they refer with pride to the universal absence of pauperism in their country, to the fact that no human being, whether white or black, need ever beg for bread, and to the sanctity with which everywhere the laws of property are invested. "Did you ever hear," said a highly intelligent Southern gentleman to us, "of a mail-coach or a traveller being robbed throughout the vast and often almost waste expanse of the Southern States, or of bands of banditti prowling through the country, as is the deplorable case in our sister Republic of Mexico? Did you ever notice the small number of punishments for theft, as compared with the annals of crime in other countries? Life," he added, "is often wantonly taken in the cities on the banks of the Mississippi, where the lust of gain attracts a large mongrel migratory population, and where the municipal organization is often sadly defective; but even this is grossly exaggerated, and if we are the savages some of your writers describe us to be, at least you must give us credit for those savage virtues which raise us above the viler crimes." Wealth, the defenders of the South say, is not very unequally distributed; but poverty exists, as it does everywhere, although pauperism does not. But the existence of a distinct class, designated by a specific name of opprobrium, all Southerners emphatically deny. Thoughtless and narrow-minded persons there are in all countries, who apply contemptuous epithets to the poor, and the sleek and well-fed negro, with the instinct of servility, is peculiarly prone to this, but no white man who respects himself or the good opinion of others, would apply the terms of "mean white," or "white trash," to his poorer neighbours. Primitive customs, modes of life not adapted to the fastidious tastes of the dweller in cities, do obtain in the more remote agricultural districts, and there also ignorance, sometimes ludicrous, and sometimes lamentable, is to be met. This is the case mainly in districts where the sterility of the soil or the climate of mountain ranges, repel the wealthy settler, and where slave labour is unknown and unprofitable. These districts find their precise counterpart in portions of the Northern and of the Western States, and in newly-settled countries on both hemispheres. The backwoodsman, with his rude cabin home, his semi-wild cattle and his trusty rifle for his support, is not peculiar to the South. We find him in the Western wilds of North America, in the bush in Australia, and everywhere he is the pioneer of an advancing civilization. The native poor of the South, in whatever circumstances they are found, have the pride of a dominant race. They are quick to resent an insult, they are jealous of the chastity of their women; and whatever may be their faults, they cannot be said to be a morally debased people. If labour is despised by, and if the aptitude and taste are alike lacking to, the great bulk of the Southern population, how comes it that this population, never much addicted to manufactures, has been able to supply, not only its necessities of daily life, but even those of war, during a blockade, by land and sea, of fifteen months? How could a country, whose population consists of luxurious drones, of lawless vagabonds, and of embruted slaves, in the midst of a great war, build iron-clad frigates and steam-rans, though at the outbreak of that war it had not a rolling-mill within its entire boundaries? If law and order is so repugnant to the Southern mind, and to Southern habits, whence comes that admirable discipline of the Confederate armies, which astonishes the veteran commanders of the Old World, and extorts reluctant admiration even from a vanquished foe?

So argue the Southerners. We shall take neither their assertions nor those of their revilers without proof. We turn, then, to official statistics, which cannot be suspected of partizan bias. On consulting the census of the United States for 1850, we find that during the ten years preceding, the white population of the Southern States increased, with but little help from foreign immigration, from 4,543,000 souls to 6,113,305 souls. This, though not so rapid an increase as that of the slave population, which was from two and a half to upwards of four millions, does not, according to the Malthusian theory, argue any serious physical discomfort or "marauding" habits on the part of the great bulk of the white population. A corresponding increase is known and admitted to have taken place for the period between 1850 and 1860, for which the census statistics are as yet only partially published. Out of this number there were, in 1850, 840,929 white males engaged in agriculture, one-third of the entire white male population. It appears further, that there were nearly 600,000 farms, so that upwards of two-thirds of these agricultural labourers tilled their own lands. What room do these figures leave for the five-eighths of the population who are said to alternate "between idle vagrancy and the excitement of marauding expeditions"? Now, let it be remembered, that the exports of the South are not confined to cotton, tobacco, and cereals; naval stores form no inconsiderable item in these exports, and the felling and shaping of timber, the collection and preparation of resin and turpentine, employ the industry of large sections of the Southern States. These pursuits are not classed as agricultural. The transportation of the rich crops to the various seaports and market-places alone employs a population equal to that engaged in their production, and mainly free. A great variety of other occupations arise from and find scope in the handling and disposal of the crops before they are marketable. It would thence appear, to an impartial observer, that the South not only requires, but actually makes the best use of all its available labour, whether slave or free, and knows how to combine both in such manner as not to bring them into competition and conflict.

We must refer the reader for further details on these instructive statistics to another part of this impression. One interesting fact which they reveal we cannot, however, pass unnoticed, as it has an important bearing upon our subject. The number of families owning slaves in 1850 is given at nearly 350,000, which at the usual rate of computation gives about 1,750,000 persons, or somewhat less than one-third of the whole population as directly interested in the ownership of slaves. The addition of those who do not own but hire slaves, would no doubt materially swell this number. If we consider that the bulk of the slaves are engaged in agricultural pursuits, and that therefore the professional classes, the merchants, the barristers, the physicians, ministers of the Gospel, and teachers, etc., etc., form but a comparatively small portion of the slaveholders, though they are connected by ties of interest and relationship with the planters, we perceive that the class of those who are neither directly nor indirectly interested in the ownership of slaves, must be very small indeed; and that the institution of Slavery enters far more largely into the social fabric of the country than many have supposed on this side of the Atlantic. These figures dispose at a sweep of the often repeated allegation that the South is ruled by a numerically small but all-powerful "slaveholding oligarchy." It is also an unavoidable inference from these figures that the number of large slaveholders must be exceedingly limited; and on this the census leaves us no room for doubt. The number of men who held 1000 slaves in 1850 was but two in the whole South. The number of those holding more than 100 slaves was 1100. On the other hand we find that full one-half of the whole number of slaveowners held not exceeding five slaves. Many interesting speculations might be based upon this fact. We content ourselves with pointing to it as the proof of an even distribution of wealth, which is probably unequalled in any other country. Slaves are accepted in the South as the most reliable standard of property, and, with the land they till, may with sufficient accuracy be estimated at £200 per head. It follows thence that the fortunes of one-half of the slave-holding families of the South are limited within £1000; that not above 600 of these families range between £10,000 and £20,000; that not more than 1100 reach the last-named figure, and that in all the South there are but two men whose wealth in land and slaves exceeds £200,000. Not only then is the wealth of the country distributed with astonishing equality, but its enormous productiveness is the result of the industry, skill, and economy of a people of small landed proprietors. Truly it is as difficult to find in the statistics of the South the traces of a class revelling in oriental luxury, as it is to find those of that degraded class of "idle vagrants," and "lawless marauders." If those who speak and write for the instruction of the public will condescend to ponder over these facts and figures, which will become more eloquent the more they are studied and the deeper the study penetrates, perhaps they might be less reckless in the use of terms which brand whole populations of a friendly country with infamy. The evil and wrong of slavery is sufficiently manifest to the eyes of civilized Europe not to require for its demonstration wholesale fabrications and common slanders like those expressed in the words "white trash" and "mean whites," when applied to the bulk, or even any considerable portion of the Southern people.

The Debate on the American Question.

THE British House of Commons is the best-abused institution in the world, and the most respected; for the Radicals, who are indignant at the strong aristocratic element in the Lower House; the ultra-Tories, who regret the infusion of professing democrats; our Gallic neighbours, who look upon St. Stephens as a comfortable, respectable, but somewhat prosy club; the politicians of the United States, who speak of it as the tool of an effete despotism,—severally evince a very deep and natural anxiety as to the utterances of the oracle they somewhat depreciate or utterly condemn. With all its faults, it is felt that the House of Commons represents the interests of the British Empire, and consequently the opinions of the classes who have a stake in the safety, honour, and welfare of our dominions. A debate that leads to no immediate decision may exercise an important influence by shaping, developing, and strengthening public opinion; and by informing other nations who are concerned in the issue discussed, of our sentiments and of the policy we shall pursue when the time is ripe for taking action. Thus on Friday last, though Mr. Lindsay withdrew his motion, the frank exposition of the unanimous determination of Englishmen not to sanction the perpetuation of a hopeless and ruinous struggle, cannot fail to stimulate and invigorate the policy of our constitutional Government; it will be a strong moral support to the Emperor of the French, who, with that prescience which so distinguishes him, saw from the first the futility of the Northern attempt to conquer the South, and who has all along manifested a patriotic desire to end a state of affairs injurious to the industry and commerce of France, and a generous anxiety to recognize the independence of a people, who have, against great odds, and with unflinching determination, fought for and maintained their national existence. The debate of Friday will tell the United States that England, too magnanimous to avenge the frantic insults of a nation in the throes of anarchy and insolvency, is likewise too powerful to be deterred by arrogant threats from doing an act of simple justice; and finally, the South will learn that, though our movements are slow and cautious, we do not look coldly on the sufferings and privations of a kindred race; that we acknowledge the sacredness of her cause, and that we are ready to welcome her as a new, but not untried, member of the community of nations. The debate, of which we propose to notice the main points, was particularly significant from the complete abnegation of party feeling. The Conservative Party was eloquently and ably represented; but on this occasion the sentiments of the Conservative speakers were coincident with those who spoke from the Liberal benches.

Mr. Lindsay, in introducing his motion, which had been frequently modified and changed, so that the substantial unanimity of the House might not be disturbed by any differences as to the mere form of expression, avowed his determination not to criticise the acts of the Federal Government, either with respect to sinking a stone fleet at Charleston, or the proclamations of Federal generals; and from the beginning to the end of his speech the hon. member appealed to the calm judgment of his audience, and based his arguments upon the indisputable and legal rights of the South. The first part of the motion, "That in the opinion of this House, the States which have seceded from the Union of the Republic of the United States have so long maintained themselves under a separate and established Government, and have given such proofs of their determination and ability to support their independence," is a full and formal recognition of the Confederate States; and the second part, "that the propriety of offering mediation, with the view of terminating hostilities between the contending parties, is worthy of the serious and immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government," does not call for forcible intervention, but simply affirms the propriety and expediency of offering mediation. The terms of the motion are logical and well considered, for without recognition mediation is impossible. It is proper and lawful to offer mediation between belligerent nations, but international law forbids foreign interference in a civil war. It is important to bear in mind the construction and meaning of the motion which was so favourably received by the House of Commons.

Mr. Lindsay, having reviewed the Federal compact, pointed out that Secession was not a sudden impulse, but had been preparing for a quarter of a century, and that the North and South were, in manners, customs, feelings, and policy, essentially separate nations. He also dilated on the claims of the South to nationality on account of her geographical position, her territorial extent, and her enormous trade. Secession was constitutional, expedient, and inevitable. The hon. member then gave an account of the formation of the Confederate States, dwelling upon the efforts of the South to separate peaceably during the months that Secession was an accomplished fact, and yet not held by the North, as rebellion. With regard to the causes of the war, Mr. Lindsay refuted the assertion that it was for the emancipation of the slaves, quoting Mr. Lincoln's emphatic declaration, and the reiterated protests of the Northern press, that the institution of Slavery was to be maintained; and he indicated the true cause of the disruption—that the agricultural South was anxious for free trade, whilst the non-agricultural North was bent on protection, which gave her a virtual monopoly of the Southern trade, and made the South her tributary; and that the system of representation by numbers had deprived the South of her due political influence, so that she could not oppose the schemes of the North that crippled her trade and placed her wealth at the disposal of the dominant section. Having clearly set forth the right, expediency, and justifiability of Secession; that the South had to choose between Secession and political serfdom, and the fettering of her commerce; and that the Confederate States had since seceding proved their ability to maintain their independence, Mr. Lindsay contended that mediation was not only just, but urgent, in consequence of the distress engendered by the cotton famine, and he expressed his conviction that mediation would be acceptable to the respectable and reasoning classes in the United States.

The Member for Sunderland was followed by Mr. Taylor; and the North may reasonably complain of an advocacy that damaged its cause, but did not harm the South. Mr. Taylor, at the outset of his address, paraded a stale and not very reverent joke, about Providence always fighting on the strongest side. Does the hon. member ever read history? In the war between Spain and the Netherlands, in the contest between the Spanish Armada and the English fleet, in the struggle between England and her revolted American colonies, on which side did Providence fight? Not on the strongest, but on the side of justice. But how can we expect a gentleman to understand the past who so little comprehends the present as to say, "20,000,000 of the North were not likely to be put down by 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 of the South, encumbered by 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 slaves." Passing by the misrepresentation of the relative populations, we should like to know when the South ever attempted to put down the North. The hon. member forgot that the North was invading the South; he forgot that the Confederate States only want to be let alone, that they do not seek for an inch of Northern territory, and are merely determined not to resume a connection that has for years been galling, and of which the mere notion has now become hatefully, loathingly distasteful. This gross misstatement is, however, a very fair specimen of the arguments used by the partisans of the North. As for the slaves being an encumbrance, we can assure the hon. member, and he may satisfy himself of the reliability of our assurance if he will read the history of the war, that the slaves have proved themselves true and faithful, and so far from being an encumbrance have been a source of strength by tilling the earth whilst their masters have been engaged in driving back the invading and mercenary hordes. Mr. Taylor thinks that we have badly used the United States, and that "America had a right to expect that, with our anti-slavery opinions, we should have looked with calmer eyes upon the struggle between the North and South." Yes, we should have endorsed with our approval the efforts of the North to rob the South of her slaves, not to emancipate them, but to grind them down with true Northern greed. Yes, we should have rejoiced at the prospect of the subjugation of 8,000,000 of a kindred race. Yes, we should have applauded the infamous edict and inhuman atrocities of General Butler. Yes, because of our anti-slavery opinions, we should have given our moral support to the proslavery North in its attempt to crush 8,000,000 of white people. We will not follow Mr. Taylor's arguments, or rather ravings, which were consummated by his speaking of the "hell-hounds of the South." "Hell-hounds!" Well, that is a coarse, strong expression. To whom is it applied? To men of our own lineage, who speak our language, who inherit our love of freedom, who are sacrificing their property and offering their lives for the defence of their national honour, and who believe in the same holy religion as we do. "Hell-hounds!" The South has not made war on women, nor blasphemed Heaven by returning thanks for fictitious victories; nor insulted foreign nations; nor does it treat the negro like an accursed leper, and refuse him a home and a country. But the North has done these things. If, then, the term "hell-hounds" is a fitting cognomen for the people of the South, what epithet can we find to fitly designate the people of the North? We will not look for any such epithet. It is not meet that the fair cause of the South should be disgraced by scandalous vituperation. We know that Mr. Taylor has considerable experience in addressing Radical meetings, and this explains the success with which he has studied the American standard of oratory.

Mr. Forster, who thinks it unworthy of a civilized and Christian nation to seek to put an end to a cruel and bloody war, and who recommends us to look on until one side is exterminated and the other desolated, joined with Mr. Taylor in thinking this country will have war with the United States if we offer to mediate. Mr. Forster could not cap the "hell-hounds" of his co-partizan, but he did his best by comparing the present war to the late rebellion in India. We cannot say it is the first time the comparison has been instituted, for men of the highest position in England, and our leading journals, have not hesitated to compare the doings of a Federal General, endorsed as they have been by the Government and people of the United States, to the acts of Nana Sahib; and we think Mr. Forster would have done wisely not to have recalled the analogy. Do these gentlemen mean to tell us that the people of the United States are so savage, so eager for bloodshed, that the mere offer of mediation would stimulate their fury and make them turn upon the proposed peacemakers? Certainly, if these assertions are true, they prove that mediation would be unavailing; but they loudly call for intervention. And this threat of war is ridiculous. Many persons suppose that war between this country and the United States is inevitable. What then? Will it be stayed by our refusal to recognize the South, and by our abstaining from offering mediation? What effect has been produced by our non-interference? Is not the animosity to England bitter and increasing? Are we not daily insulted and reviled by the press and people of the United States? Are we not loudly threatened with war and annihilation? In the hope of impairing our trade, has not the North consented by a protective tariff to ruin its own trade? Non-interference has brought about a hatred that cannot be exceeded, and, therefore, if mediation does not make us better friends it cannot make the United States our more bitter enemies.

The partisans of the North were completely answered by those who advocated the cause of justice and humanity and the interests of this country and of Europe. Lord A. Vane Tempest contended that, independently of the mighty interests involved, and the moral responsibility to put an end to the wicked strife, the South, by her conduct during the last sixteen months had an unanswerable claim not only for recognition but for the sympathy of Europe. His lordship, though willing to try mediation, thought if that failed stronger measures should be resorted to. Mr. Whiteside, with that brilliant and convincing rhetoric and that legal acumen which has placed him in the foremost rank of forensic and parliamentary orators, demolished the sham plea of slavery, showed the impossibility of reconciliation, and remarked that secession was commendable when Florida left Spain, when Texas seceded to the United States, but was a crime when Texas seceded from the United States. Mr. Whiteside further remarked that the United States was even now inciting Canada to secede from England. The hon. and learned gentleman argued that recognition and mediation were not grounds of offence, and to sustain this view quoted Sir James Mackintosh, an authority that the most ardent Abolitionist must respect.

Mr. Gregory, in a speech remarkable for its close reasoning and statesmanship, reminded the House that at the commencement of the war the North denied any intention of conquest, represented Secession as a conspiracy, and promised in ninety days to overthrow it, but that the North had not found any Union sentiment in the South, and so to further parade that excuse would be a mockery. The hon. member, after referring to the advantages that would ensue to European commerce and industry from the independence of the South, observed that the politicians of the United States had always hurried to recognize de facto Governments, that in 1849, an embassy was despatched to recognize Hungary on behalf of the United States, "if the revolutionary Government were stationary for only thirty days in any one place," and, therefore, by the precedent of the United States, we were bound to recognize the South, which had been an established Government for a year and a half. Mr. Gregory expressed his belief that, if mediation were offered in a fair spirit, it would be gladly accepted by thousands in the United States.

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, in supporting the motion, dwelt upon the peculiar horrors of the war, and the terrible calamity it has brought upon our own people. Mr. Hopwood, also insisted very strongly upon our duty to do all we possibly can to stop an unjust war that is fraught with such affliction to our community.

The leaders of the Peace Party did not address the House. Mr. Bright is ready enough to denounce war as atrociously wicked when it is waged to defend England or vindicate her honour. He is very tender for the lives of bloodstained Sepoys, and for the lives of the Chinamen who brutally torture and murder his fellow-countrymen, but he has no bowels of compassion for the slaughter of the people of the South, and gives a tacit, but not less decided, approval of the continuance of the war. Henceforth, when the Member for Birmingham protests against the wickedness and folly of war, we shall understand that he only objects to it when it is for the honour of England, and that when it is a war of aggression, carried on by a people whose system of government includes universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and demagogism, he no longer regards it as reprehensible. Mr. Bright is not a skulk or a coward, and if he did not approve of the American feast of blood, he would not hesitate to openly and unequivocally condemn it.

Lord Palmerston did not essay to reply to the arguments adduced in favour of Mr. Lindsay's motion, nor did he express disapproval of the terms of that motion. As we understand his lordship's observations, and as Mr. Lindsay explained them, without any contradiction from the noble lord, the Government is only waiting for what in their opinion is an opportune moment for recognition and mediation. Whether the North is to have another ninety days we know not, and we should have been glad if Lord Palmerston had thought it consistent with his official position to have defined what he meant by "any opportunity." But, after the late debate, we presume the Government will feel bound to fairly embrace the opportunity that from the crisis in commerce, the conduct of the North, the sympathy for the gallant people of the South, and the unanimous public opinion must eventually, and we believe shortly, be presented.

WE direct attention to the following extracts from the debates in Congress, since the defeat of General McClellan's army. From the antecedents of the North we did not expect any display of dignity and calm resolution under defeat, but we were not prepared just yet to hear of a Senator threatening the Federal President with "the extreme penalty of the law." On July 7,—

Mr. Chandler (Rep. Mich.) said the Senator from Pennsylvania wanted to know where the army was, or who placed them there. The army of the Potomac, when it marched on Manassas, numbered 230,000 men, and the enemy less than 30,000. They marched on Manassas, and found thirty-two wooden guns, and 1100 dead horses. That army could have marched to Richmond in thirty days, and not lost 1000 men, and there was no impediment to its marching to Charleston or New Orleans. But the Senator from Pennsylvania wants to know who placed the army where it is. The press, politicians, and traitors of the country declare that E. M. Stanton put them there; but Stanton had nothing to do with putting the army in the marshes of the Chickahominy. This is a matter of criminality—of gross criminality—which should consign the criminal to eternal detestation and condemnation. The country demands sacrifice for this crime, and the press of the country are demanding the sacrifice of the mere clerk Stanton—the mere clerk to obey the orders of the President. He (Chandler) introduced a resolution which, if answered, would show the true criminal. The criminality was reduced so as to be between two persons. The great crime consisted in sacrificing and dividing this great army of the Potomac, and the criminal is either Abraham Lincoln or George B. McClellan. There is no third man at all. The criminal, in his judgment, should not only be deprived of office, but suffer the extreme penalty of the law. He called on the press and traitors of the country to stop denouncing a mere clerk, and to denounce Abraham Lincoln or George B. McClellan. Who led the army into the marshes of the Chickahominy, where they died like sheep, and where the left wing was left to maintain a savage fight, when a reinforcement of 20,000 men from the right or centre would have sent the rebels back into Richmond defeated?

Mr. Lane (Rep., Kansas) thought this was no time for criminality. Some men in the country had asked and prayed that loyal black men might be taken into the service. If it had been done he believed the war might have been closed in ninety days. Fifty thousand men were lost by Halleck in the marshes before Corinth by building fortifications, &c., which might have been saved.

The following observations were made on the question of employing negroes in military service; and in reference to Mr. Sherman's remarks about the necessity of the Federals being "part savages," we would observe that there is an impression in Europe that they have already become so to a considerable extent. From Mr. Rice's criticism on Mr. Davis's speech, we may see that the Federal Congress is anything but "a happy family."

Mr. Sherman said the time had arrived when Federal military officers should be compelled to take into service all loyal men to suppress the rebellion. He favoured giving power to the President to call into service all the slaves of the rebels. Mr. Sherman said he would organize an army of negroes and desolate every Southern State rather than that the Union should be destroyed. He contended that the Federals could not war against savages unless they became in part savages themselves.

Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, was in favour of the bill. He admitted that there was not at present in his own State the readiness to enlist as formerly, and thought that the reason of this was that the people felt that the war must be conducted on different principles than hitherto. The people dreaded being employed in swampy, unhealthy places, and to erecting entrenchments when such work could not be done by negroes. Unless negroes were employed for this men would hesitate to come forward and expose themselves to that kind of life. He strenuously urged the employment of negroes in war as perfectly legitimate and advantageous. He thought the Government made a great error in deceiving people by calling a defeat a great strategic movement, and giving false names to things under the impression that it would not do to let the people know the truth. Tell people the truth, and resort to no artifice. People were intelligent; let them know what was required, and they would respond.

Mr. Rice said the time had come when the Federals must acknowledge the Southern Confederacy, or speedily put down the rebellion, therefore he would not hesitate to use all means.

Mr. Wilson, for Massachusetts, was for fighting the battle to a successful issue, and for drafting if necessary, but said that a rose and water war must cease, and that it was better to tell people the truth, and not to deceive them. It would seem as if an organized system of lying had been established. He thought the censorship of the press had been a great disadvantage.

Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, was in favour of the slaves working in trenches but strongly opposed arming the slaves, and said,

"The Border States would resist to the death the plan to arm the slaves."

Mr. Rice, referring to the remark of Mr. Davis, said that strangers would think Mr. Davis was an emissary defending the rebel government.

WE do not like to be alarmists, but for the sake of the families, widows, and orphans, who are dependent upon incomes derived from investments in the English Funds, we direct attention to the following editorial paragraph copied from the New York Herald. It seems, though we poor benighted English know it not, that England is on the eve of a revolution, and that our community is so fascinated with American liberty that there is a near prospect of the present dynasty being overthrown, and that the same fate awaits the French Empire. The United States only is to endure and flourish. Under these circumstances, English Fundholders had better sell out, and buy United States' Government Securities, or change their gold for Federal "green backs," of which, according to the latest advices, they may purchase a large quantity for very little money:—

DANGER OF REVOLUTION IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.—It is the fear of revolution at home that has prevented the Rulers of France and England from long since mingling in our strife. It is not from any respect for the law of nations, nor from any regard for the right of the American Government to suppress a domestic rebellion without foreign intervention, that they have hitherto abstained from interference. It is because the people in those countries regard the American Republic as the hope of humanity—the shield of civil and religious liberty all over the world. Hence the French and English Governments are cautious in their movements. Their plan is to manufacture public opinion in advance against the United States, in order to prepare the public mind for war; for intervention means war. If they did not intend to attack us they would not assail the country with measureless abuse. But if they ever draw the sword in support of intervention they will find that it is two-edged, and that it will wound themselves more deeply than the United States. The democracy of Europe will fraternize with the American Republic and overthrow the dynasties which attempt to subvert it.

The Cruise of the Sumter.

FROM NOTES TAKEN ON BOARD BY ONE OF HER OFFICERS.

A YANKEE SKIPPER.

SUNDAY, the 24th of November, found the Sumter dashing into the heavy swell of the north-east trades at the rate of nine knots, with the last of the windward islands, Mariagedalante, looming up hazily far astern. Not a few of us on board that vessel believed that the admirable skill and bravery of our commander was specially aided by a kind Providence, which enabled us to escape from our powerful adversary of the night previous. At one time, lying disabled and helpless on the water, the elements came to our aid and wrapt us in friendly obscurity; again, while rushing rapidly on to destruction amid the breakers which line the coast of Dominique, the thick mist which enveloped us cleared away in time for the sharp eyes forward to discover the imminent danger, and for the Sumter to steer clear, though not before the seething and roaring of the surf was painfully audible, while the "white water" was distinctly visible from the deck.

We were now in the great track of outward-bound vessels from Europe to the West Indies, and naturally hoped to secure some rich prizes, this in some degree compensating us for the tedious cruise from Maranham to Martinique; but we were doomed, in a great measure, to disappointment, and were forced to conclude that the proud Yankee boast that, "American duck whitens the Ocean," was now a myth, for nine out of ten vessels were foreigners. This day (the 24th) the cry of "Sail ho!" from the masthead, startled us several times, and caused our hopes to run high, as some tall, heavily laden ship, with stunsails "alow and aloft," would bear down upon us; but as they generally wore the cross of St. George or the French Tricolor, we were forced to dispense with our expected bonfire, and to be content with the latest newspapers.

We were destined to better luck, however, on the 25th, for at about four p.m. we descried a large ship bearing down on us, with all her kites flying to catch the strong trade wind, and, as we watched the tall and symmetrical spars, the contour of the bows, &c., there was no mistaking that it was a Yankee ship, and sure enough, when close upon us, we saw the "gridiron" floating at her peak. She was soon brought to, and proved to be the Montmorenci (Captain Brown), from Liverpool to St. Thomas, with a cargo of coals. A very heavy sea was running at the time, but a boat was finally despatched to the prize, and returned with the Yankee "skipper" and his papers. The "skipper" in question was habited in a close fitting suit of blue, with a large "beaver" that had once been white, and his countenance reminded one more of some jolly Bonifacio than of a Yankee captain's, which we had always heretofore noticed as being rather blue; he had evidently a predilection for good living, and was by no means disconcerted by his sudden and unceremonious transfer to the decks of a pirate; but, on the contrary, seemed rather pleased, and even expressed a desire to have his ship burnt, and to go with us, just for the novelty of the proceeding.

On examination of the ship's papers it was found that her cargo was English property; we were therefore compelled to ransom her, and to forego our anticipated pleasure of a fine fire. We were occupied until near eight p.m. in removing several articles useful to us from the ship; and, amongst other things, Captain Brown's military armament, consisting of several dilapidated muskets and shot-guns, with some large cavalry sabres, and two or three huge and dangerous-looking flint-lock pistols, were transferred to the Sumter. The captain eyed these longingly, and at last requested that we should take him also, if we took his arms, giving as a reason for this strange petition, that his crew were negroes, and were wont sometimes to indulge themselves in a mutiny by way of pastime, but were always subdued by the formidable implements of destruction mentioned above. We preferred restoring the arms to depriving the Montmorenci of her captain, and, therefore, had them returned. The Montmorenci filled away, and soon disappeared in the darkness then settling on us, and no doubt many yarns were spun concerning this strange recontre with a pirate. We enjoyed many a laugh at the expense of the Yankee captain that night, while discussing some of his good things around the mess-table, and wondered at his extraordinary good-humour; the boarding midshipman gravely hinting that he was under the influence of hydraulic pressure, or, in other words, drunk.

We saw a letter, some time after, from the "Captaining," detailing his valorous deeds in confronting the white-bearded pirate-chief in his own cabin, and of his having actually asserted his utter ignorance of the existence of such a functionary as Jefferson Davis, the President of the Confederate States of America. We wished him good luck and a fair wind, and stood on our course.

BURNING PRIZES.

At 2.30 p.m., on the 26th inst., we captured the schooner Arcade (Captain Smith), of and from Portland, Me., for Guadalupe, with a cargo of staves. She ran right into our clutches, or, to use the words of the captain, "he couldn't have hit us better if he had pined at the Sumter from Portland." She was a very valueless prize; and belonging almost entirely to the captain, who said that she was all he had, it was a pity to destroy her, but the usages of war are inexorable; our orders were to burn, sink, destroy, &c., and these must be obeyed if owners were broken. The captain and his crew were removed on board the Sumter, together with their personal effects; two boats were sent to obtain what was valuable, and to set fire to the prize. There was a heavy sea running at the time, and one of the boats made a very narrow escape, through some negligence of the crew, while alongside the Arcade; she was allowed to take a position directly under the heavy bow-ancher of the vessel; the anchor-stock struck her with great violence as she tossed on the heavy sea, and this, together with the spray which continually dashed over the boat, so alarmed and confused the men, that their destruction seemed inevitable for a few minutes. They succeeded finally, however, in shoving clear, and we all felt relieved when we saw her in safety. The only "plunder" obtainable was a few barrels of potatoes for the use of the crew, and nothing remained but to set fire to the vessel. This exceedingly piratical operation was performed generally as follows:—one party is despatched to the cabin, another to the main-hold, while a third is sent forward into the fore-castle; axes are in quest to chip the decks, and render them more susceptible to the flames; papers, old feather beds, and everything that will increase the inflammability of the pile, are collected, while the sails are cut partially adrift in order to burn more readily. When all is ready the piles are lighted simultaneously, and all scamper for the boats; we have hardly time to shove off clear before the smoke is pouring up the hatchway, the flames begin to shoot up from below and to lick the rigging and cordage of the vessel.

The above formula was performed on the Arcade, and the Sumter filled away. We could see the glare of the burning vessel for hours after illuminating the horizon miles around.

It was amusing to notice the almost natural instinct for plunder which a sailor possesses; one fellow would have a dilapidated beaver, which the owner had long since laid aside as useless; another an odd shoe, or pair of gloves; while all had something of some description. They were generally inspected at the gangway, and made to disgorge themselves of all such articles as were thought by the strict first-lieutenant to be incompatible with the cleanliness, order, and discipline of a man-of-war. The Yankee captain seemed to regret more than anything else the loss of some thirty barrels of potatoes which he had on board for speculation, or, in the vernacular, "on a venture."

We steamed rapidly on until the evening of the 27th, when we let fires go down, uncoupled the propeller, and made sail on the ship, in order to save coal, and to repair our damaged machinery. The weather was fine, and for several days nothing occurred to vary the monotony of sea life; sometimes a sail would startle us all into activity for a few moments, but it generally turned out to be English or French, and we again relapsed. Being thrown entirely upon our own resources for amusement, some would pass away time in reading and in playing games, while others would be content in watching the bright waves rippled under the influence of the gentle trade wind, and the crowds of flying fish as they fled from their pursuers, the dolphin and bonito; perchance they were thinking of the loved ones at home, and of our brothers battling in the valleys of Old Virginia for the rights of the sunny South. We knew that they often remembered the lone cruiser on the ocean, and that many a prayer was offered up for our safety and success.

Reviews.

SOUTHERN STATISTICS.

III.—THE DISTRIBUTION OF PROPERTY, SCHOOLS, AND CHURCHES.

THE enemies of the South have been untiring in their efforts to represent Southern society as semi-barbarous and demoralized, and that, with the exception of the slaveholders, assumed to be few in number, the whole population is mean and degraded, or, in the expressive language of Professor Cairnes, is merely "white trash." We no longer hear so much about the South being enriched by the North, for, since the commencement of the war, our men of business have examined the matter for themselves, and find that the North has been enriched by the South; and those who will be at the trouble of examining the following statistics, taken from the census of 1850, will be equally convinced that the South is as educated and religious as the North, and some of the returns would lead us to infer that the South is even more refined and more religious than the North.

In order that the rest of our figures may be appreciated for the value of statistics is comparative—we abstract a return of the population of the Southern States for 1840 and 1850, and to that we subjoin the population of the rest of the States for the same periods:—

	White Population.		Free Coloured.		Slave.
	1840.	1850.	1840.	1850.	1840.	1850.
Alabama....	335,185	426,514	2,039	2,365	253,522	342,844
Arkansas ..	77,174	162,189	405	698	19,335	47,100
Florida	27,913	47,293	817	932	25,717	39,310
Georgia	407,695	521,572	2,755	2,931	280,914	386,682
Kentucky ...	590,253	761,413	7,317	10,011	182,258	210,081
Louisiana ..	158,457	255,391	25,292	17,462	105,452	244,809
Mississippi ..	179,074	295,718	1,366	330	135,211	309,878
Missouri	325,388	592,004	1,571	2,618	58,249	87,422
N. Carolina..	484,870	555,028	22,732	27,463	215,817	288,548
S. Carolina..	259,084	274,563	8,276	8,060	327,038	384,384
Tennessee ..	610,427	736,856	5,524	6,122	183,657	239,459
Texas	—	164,034	—	307	—	58,161
Virginia	740,853	894,809	43,852	51,333	449,087	472,528
Maryland ...	318,204	417,013	62,078	74,723	89,737	90,360
	4,513,212	6,115,398	170,335	210,555	3,519,087	5,112,806
Other States of the Union	9,615,534	13,347,780	215,968	223,218
			1840.	1850.
Southern States total Population....			7,232,753	9,527,137

The free-coloured return is worthy of observation. In the South, from 170,000 the number increased in ten years to 210,000, being an increase of 40,000. In the North the increase upon 215,000 was only 7,500. The free-coloured do not find a welcome home in the North.

The chief pursuit of the South is agriculture. In 1850 the total free population was 6,300,000, of which about 3,200,000 were males, and of these not more than 1,700,000 were above twenty years of age, and without making any allowance for those who were unfitted for labour, either by infirmity or age, we may say that 1,700,000 is a very full statement of the number of free males in the South who could labour in 1850. Of these there were employed in agriculture:—

		Brought forward
Virginia.....	108,364	458,545
N. Carolina ..	81,982	25,299
S. Carolina	41,302	28,942
Georgia	83,362	118,979
Florida	5,977	115,017
Alabama.....	68,635	65,561
Mississippi....	50,284	28,588
Louisiana	18,639
		Total..... 840,929

Carried forward 458,545

Thus 50 per cent. of the free male working population was entirely engaged in agriculture. The number of farms in the Southern States, together with their average acreage and their average value, is thus given:—

	No. of Farms.	Average acres.	Average value $.
Alabama.....	41,964	289	1655
Arkansas.....	17,756	146	950
Florida	4,304	371	1622
Georgia	51,759	441	1964
Kentucky	74,777	227	2142
Louisiana	13,422	372	6111
Mississippi....	33,960	309	1782
Missouri.....	54,458	179	1234
N. Carolina....	56,963	369	1261
S. Carolina....	29,967	541	2889
Tennessee....	72,735	261	1419
Texas	12,198	942	1533
Virginia	77,013	340	2901
Maryland	211,860	212	1222

563,138

Thus, out of 840,929 free males engaged in agriculture, 563,138 were farming on their own account; and, allowing for family and other partnerships, we perceive that the whole of the free agricultural population of the South consists of farmers, and not of farm servants. "Every man his own master is not the way to make "mean whites," or "white trash."

A very prevalent idea in England is that the slaveholders are few in number; that every slaveholder has at least a score of slaves to attend upon him personally; that slaves are treated as heads of cattle, and that the individuality of the negro is as much lost sight of as the individuality of a sheep in a flock. Let us consult our impartial authority, the census.

In 1850 the number of families, white and free coloured, in the Southern States—and "a family in the census is either one person living separately in a house or part of a house, and providing for him and herself, or several persons living together upon one common means of support," so that every one occupying a separate building is counted as a family—was as follows:—

	White and Free Coloured families in 1850
Alabama.....	73,786
Arkansas.....	28,416
Florida	9,107
Georgia	91,666
Kentucky	132,920
Louisiana	54,112
Maryland	87,384
Mississippi....	52,107
	529,498
	Brought forward 529,498
Missouri.....	100,890
North Carolina	105,451
South Carolina	52,937
Tennessee....	130,004
Texas	28,377
Virginia	167,530
	Total..... 1,114,687

The number of families owning slaves were as follows:—

	Brought forward
Alabama.....	29,295
Arkansas.....	5,999
Florida	3,520
Georgia	38,456
Kentucky	38,385
Louisiana	20,670
Mississippi....	23,116
Missouri.....	19,185
	178,626
	Brought forward 178,626
N. Carolina....	28,303
S. Carolina....	25,596
Tennessee....	33,864
Texas	7,747
Virginia	55,063
Maryland	16,040
	Total..... 345,239

The following is the classification of slaveholders throughout the United States :—

Holders of 1 Slave	68,820
" 1 and under 5	105,683
" 5 " 10	80,765
" 10 " 20	54,593
" 20 " 50	29,733
" 50 " 100	6,196
" 100 " 200	1,479
" 200 " 300	187
" 300 " 500	56
" 500 " 1000	9
" 1000 and over	2

Thus, it appears that one family out of three own slaves, and if we allow for single persons being taken for families, the number of families owning slaves becomes much greater. Out of a population of 65,000,000, 174,503 families own one or less than five slaves. The negro, then, is domesticated in the South, and not, as Abolitionists assert, mere field cattle.

What provision is made for education in the South? The following is a return of the educational establishments :—

COLLEGES, ETC.
	No. of Colleges.	Public Schools.	Private Schools.
Alabama	5	1152	169
Arkansas	3	353	190
Florida	—	69	34
Georgia	13	1251	219
Kentucky	15	2234	330
Louisiana	6	664	143
Mississippi	11	782	171
Missouri	9	1570	204
N. Carolina	5	2657	272
S. Carolina	8	724	202
Tennessee	18	2680	264
Texas	2	349	97
Virginia	12	2930	317
Maryland	13	898	223
	120	18,313	2838
Other States	118	62,649	3247

The South, in 1850, had absolutely more colleges than the North, though her population was more than 100 per cent. less. The proportion of public schools was less, but the proportion of private schools was greatly in excess.

The white population at school in 1850 was :—

Alabama	62,670	Brought forward	434,324
Arkansas	23,332	Missouri	91,991
Florida	4,638	North Carolina	100,041
Georgia	76,914	South Carolina	39,993
Kentucky	129,667	Tennessee	145,963
Louisiana	29,576	Texas	18,768
Maryland	58,770	Virginia	109,500
Mississippi	48,757
		Total	940,474
Carried forward	434,324

We have, we presume, sufficiently refuted the implication of ignorance ; for the number of scholars, as given above—being one-third of the population under twenty years—is equal to the number of children of an age to attend school. We further give the returns of illiterates over twenty years of age, which, though creditable to the North, is honourable to the South, when we consider her large free-coloured population :

Virginia	88,520	Maine	6,282
North Carolina	80,423	New Hampton	3,009
South Carolina	16,564	Vermont	6,240
Georgia	41,667	Massachusetts	28,345
Florida	4,329	Rhode	3,607
Alabama	33,992	Connecticut	5,306
Mississippi	13,528	New York	98,722
Louisiana	24,610	New Jersey	18,665
Texas	10,583	Pennsylvania	76,272
Arkansas	16,935	Delaware	10,181
Tennessee	78,619	Columbia	4,671
Kentucky	69,706	Illinois	41,283
Missouri	36,778	Indiana	72,710
Maryland	41,877	Ohio	66,020
		Michigan	8,281
		Wisconsin	6,453
		Iowa	2,158
		California	5,235
	557,931		469,440

With regard to religion, we shall quote a return of the number of churches, and it shows that neither absolutely nor relatively is the South an irreligious nation :—

NUMBER OF CHURCHES.
Maine	945	Virginia	2383
N. Hampshire	626	N. Carolina	1795
Vermont	599	S. Carolina	1182
Massachusetts	1475	Georgia	1862
Rhode Island	228	Florida	177
Connecticut	734	Alabama	1373
New York	4134	Mississippi	1016
New Jersey	813	Louisiana	306
Pennsylvania	3566	Texas	341
Delaware	180	Arkansas	362
Columbia	46	Tennessee	2014
Illinois	1223	Kentucky	1845
Indiana	2032	Missouri	880
Ohio	3936	Maryland	909
Michigan	399
Wisconsin	365
Iowa	193
California	28
	2121		16,445

The population of the North in 1850 was 50 per cent. in excess of the population of the South, including the slaves ; but the number of churches in the North was not more than 35 per cent. in excess of the number of churches in the South. Such a fact disposes of a quarter of a century of ceaseless calumny.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST OF 1860.*

THE future historian of the disruption of the United States, and the birth of the Confederate States of America will have abundant materials for a minute and graphic account of the great struggle, from its commencement until its consummation ; and far from being deceived as to the cause thereof by the allegations of the partizans of the North, he will marvel that such excuses should have obtained a momentary currency, even in the madness of the hour, and he will point out to posterity, as a remarkable curiosity, that on July 18, 1862, a member of the British House of Commons seriously asserted that Secession was brought about by slavery, and that the desolating war now raging was waged on the one side for the defence of slavery, and on the other, for the abolition of slavery. Besides, if we admit the facts of the Northern advocate, we must dissent from his conclusions, for assuredly, a war of abolition would violate the Constitution of the United States, both in spirit and in letter, would dissolve the Federal compact, and would be a direct infringement of the laws of civilized communities, which are strenuously opposed to interference with the internal affairs of sovereign nations, and properly regard it as a crime to enforce opinions by fire and sword. Without dealing with the absolute right or wrong of slavery, we may observe that an abolition war would have been consistent when it was thought a duty to convert infidels into Christians by means of carnage and rapine, when the Jews' denial of the Saviour was regarded as justification for plundering him, and when the battle-field, or a general massacre, was considered the best and, indeed, only agency for transmuting a heretical Protestant into a faithful member of the Catholic Church ; but in this 19th century, when we wisely reverence the text which saith, " he who takes the sword, shall perish by the sword," and recognize the folly as well as the utter wickedness of warring for opinion, the Northern plea is self-condemnatory. However, the North is not fighting for abolition, the Washington Government has denied the imputation, and the people of the Northern States are too " smart " to waste the " almighty dollar," and risk their precious lives, for any fancied benefit to a race whom they hate with a wonderfully bitter hatred, and whom they treat with a loathsome tyranny infinitely more horrible than any system of slavery that could be imagined. If all the monstrous calumnies that have been told about the treatment of the negroes in the South were true, their state of servitude would yet be infinitely better than an existence under the dominion of the North. Still, we do not deny that slavery has had, incidentally, something to do with the present war of independence and its continuance. It has been used, and with a vast amount of success, to prejudice Europe against the South, and to separate the South and the West, whose interests are equally inimical to the commercial policy of the North. This success is due not to suggestions of the abstract wrong of slavery, but to the most persistent and unscrupulous misrepresentations of slavery as it exists in the Southern States. We therefore think that Mr. Williams has wisely prefaced his comments on the Presidential election of 1860 by some able letters on slavery as it is, and on the right of non-interference with the domestic concerns of the Sovereign States of the South.

Mr. Williams' book, the first entered according to the Copyright Act of the Congress of the Confederate States, is a reprint of letters written at Constantinople in 1860, and published in a political journal in the United States. The author thoroughly appreciated the gravity of the crisis. He knew the design of the North to reduce the South to a condition of political dependence, and he also knew that the South would not submit to the degradation, and so, for the sake of the Union, he earnestly appealed to the North to pause, though he had little hope that the catastrophe which had been so long preparing could be any longer averted.

We presume by this time Europe is convinced that the Northern descriptions of Southern slavery were atrociously false. Was it likely, was it possible, that men would be so blind to their own interests as from mere wanton cruelty to injure their own property? The injury or premature death of a slave is a heavy loss to the master. It is not like Cooly labour, where the employer has an advantage in getting as much labour out of his hands as he can during the years they are bound to him.

The owner has only by contract an estate for eight years in the sinews of the freeman. His only interest, therefore, is to concentrate all the physical capacity of the man within that compass of time ; and rarely, indeed, is it that there is any substance left in him at the expiration of his period of enslavement. If there is, what means has he to return to his native land? The miserable pittance allowed to him has in all probability been paid in such manner as to be exhausted before the period of his freedom commences, and he must sell himself for another term of eight years, for the doubtful prospect of again revisiting his far-off home.

Unfortunately, the slanders of the Abolitionists were too gross to be answered except by a laugh. Suppose M. Assolant, who lately represented the English people in rather an unfavourable light, had asserted that we were habitual wife-beaters, that we were as brutal to our domestic servants as we could be without coming into collision with the law, and that we used the skulls of the Russian soldiers slain during the Crimean War for drinking cups, their hack bones for children's toys, and their finger bones for shirt studs, we should have laughed aux éclats at the raving of the Frenchman, and should have felt it would almost have been an admission of the charges to have condescended to have answered them. As wild stories have been invented of the treatment of the slaves in the South, and of the manners of the Southern people, and whilst we are surprised that they could have been in any degree believed, we cannot but respect the contemptuous silence of the 8,000,000 of the Anglo-Saxon race who were so malignantly libelled. Moreover, there was the actual state of the negro in the South to bear witness against the slanders of the North. He had become superior to the rest of his race ; he was industrious, well fed, well clothed, cared for in sickness and in health, and was taught the saving truths of the Gospel. That the negro appreciates his advantages is proved by his fidelity during the past year ; instead of rebelling against his master, he has been ready to defend his master's home and his master's family. Some " contrabands," rather too sharp for the Northerners, have told the Federal generals some very pretty yarns about the Confederate plans, and have led the Federal generals into some rather serious errors ; but it is notorious that neither by black nor white treachery has any of the movements of the Confederates been betrayed. All the tales about the ill-usage of the negro in the South, are, then, utterly false, and betray an unparalleled depth of moral depravity in their authors, who can so diabolically transgress the commandment, " Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour." Had it not been for reliance on the effect of these slanders, the North would not have ventured on the invasion of the South ; for, on the one hand, it would have dreaded the protest and interference of Europe, and, on the other, the steady opposition of the West. As it is, the cunning game is nearly played out. Europe is becoming rapidly undeceived, and there are mutterings in the West which threaten to precipitate the inevitable separation of the North and West. Mr. Williams very plainly exposes the Northern scheme :—

It has ever been the aim of the manufacturing interests to enforce, under various pretences, the payment of a portion of the earnings of the agriculturists into their coffers. Under the popular disguise of " protection to home productions," this system for a long time prevailed ; and to this day our statute-books are disfigured by the relics of this most unjust system of forcing one class to contribute to their earnings to the wealth of another class. The doctrine of " protection " became unpopular with the agriculturists in proportion as its true merits were discussed and understood. However the sacrifice they were called upon to make might be urged by appeals to their patriotism, an enlightened understanding could not fail to perceive that the real effect of such a system was to take away from the gainings of their labour, in order to add to the wealth of those who were already much richer than themselves. The numerical strength in this contest was in favour of the agriculturist, and in process of time the system fell into disfavour and into partial disuse.

For the manufacturers to wage a contest against such superior numbers, upon the direct issue, would be fruitless, because the combined South and West—both alike interested in protecting agriculture from such an unjust burden of taxes—would be able at all times to offer a successful resistance. The crusade against slavery, on the part of New England manufacturers, was designed, therefore, to detach the great agricultural interests of the free States in the West from their natural allies, the Southern States ; and thus, by dividing the adversaries of their favourite system, and creating between them an irreconcilable feud upon a collateral issue, conquer them in detail. Having wrought up the Western States to the proper pitch of enthusiasm against the existence of " the great sin," the manufacturers say " the best means of eradicating this evil is to build up the North at the expense of the South, by means of a protective tariff ; " and they call upon the Western States to " submit to a small pecuniary sacrifice," for the attainment of so desirable a result. To the South they can say : " See arrayed against you the moral power of Great Britain, exerting its ramified influence throughout the civilized world. Add to this the overwhelming numerical and political strength of the North and the West. It is not our wish to destroy you ; therefore, give us the protection we claim for our manufactures : that is, give us two hales of cotton of every ten you produce, and one-fifth of your annual products of wheat, and rice, and Indian corn, and we will find means to allay the storm which is ready to engulf you in irretrievable ruin."

The scheme has been worked far enough to break up the Union, and for a period to veil from Europe the greatness of the outrage upon the independence of the South, and from the West that it was only being used as a cat's-paw by the North, but it has not resulted in the gratification of the Northern greed, and it will eventually in the complete vindication of the high character of the South.

* Letters on the Presidential Contest of 1860, written during the penury of that struggle. By JAMES WILLIAMS, late United States Minister to Turkey. Nashville, Tennessee: Southern Methodist Publishing House.

Mr. Williams admits that slavery, like the ballot, or universal suffrage, or the expediency of a state church, may be discussed without offence, provided it is fairly discussed. Opinion and the expression of opinion ought to be free, and such is evidently the sentiment of the South, for it did not attempt to interfere with the unfair discussion of its domestic institution, and it was only roused into action when discussion was being changed into interference. The Abolitionists of the North had no right to plot for the overthrow of slavery in the South, even if they choose to denounce it. Suppose slavery had not been distinctly recognized by the Constitution of the United States, still the sovereign independence of the Southern States would have been a sufficient barrier against such proceedings. With regard to the proposed limitation of the area of the Slave States, what can be more unjust and unconstitutional?

If the government of the United States may, under the provisions, and according to the true intent of the Constitution, exclude from the territories any one article which is recognized as property by any one State, then it may prohibit the introduction of any species of property whatever. Even if there were not a slave State, no statesman in the formation of a charter of Confederation between independent States, however homogeneous might be their internal regulations, would confer upon Congress the power of excluding from the common territories any property recognized as such by any one of the States. If it would be absurd to suppose the existence of any such power in a Confederation of States, having similar local Constitutions, how can it be inferred that either the slave or free States which formed the Constitution of the United States would have authorized the exercise of such power by Congress?

To declare that the citizens of one State shall not enter upon the territory of the general Government with their property, and that the citizens of another State may, strikes down the very corner-stone of the Constitution. It would be a violation of every principle of common justice. For if these territories are common property—that is, if they have been bought by the common purse, or the common valour of the Confederacy—then there exists no power, except by the exercise of brute force, to exclude any one State from an equal participation therein.

We may be asked, if the Northerners were really sincere in their opposition to slavery, were they bound forever to be associated with it? Assuredly not. The North could have disavowed its political alliance with the South.

Upon the hypothesis that the Republican Party has no political purpose to subvert in opposition to the rights of the Southern States, by such an expression of anti-slavery feeling, the force of its significance, as a demonstration of sentiments adverse to the longer continuance of the Union, is doubly enhanced. Truthfully interpreted, according to the rules of common reason, such an expression of antipathy to the Southern States or their institutions, conveying no intimation of a design to give a practical effect to their victory by any act inimical to slavery, would mean, that they had ceased to regard the Union as worth maintaining. After the expression of such a deliberate sentiment of repugnance to the fifteen Southern States or their domestic institutions, would they not be driven by the force of public opinion without, as well as by their own feelings, to repudiate a longer political association with those whom they had thus formally insulted and pronounced unworthy of respect; or to attempt their subjugation and, if successful, hold them as vassals? Would it not be, in effect, a virtual dissolution of the Confederacy upon the terms previously existing? The unbiased mind can arrive at no other conclusion, than that such a result would of itself, and in itself, dissolve the union between the two great geographical sections.

A Northerner, conscientiously objecting to slavery, would, of course, be justified in opposing its introduction into his own State; and if the people of the South changed their views as to slavery, they would be justified in abolishing the institution, but a domestic change is an affair that does not concern foreigners. The volume before us contains a letter addressed to Lord Brougham, who was invited to Boston to celebrate the execution of John Brown, and in reply to which his lordship wrote, "I feel honoured by the invitation to attend the Boston Convention." This was surely most unjustifiable interference with the internal affairs of the South; and an encouragement to those who think assassination a proper and virtuous proceeding:—

The day may come, my lord, when "even-handed justice will commend the ingredients of the poisoned chalice to your own lips." There are more shining marks for the assassin's dagger than the slaveowners of America! Millions of lives stand between the honoured felon and the accomplishment of his bloody work of philanthropy; a thousand times your lordship might have the privilege of acknowledging "the honour" of invitations to attend and participate in the celebration of events similar to those which were enacted at Harper's Ferry, and as often might "English philanthropy" palliate or excuse the crimes in which they had their origin, and still there would be a sea of living blood coursing through the veins of slaveholders? * * * If a British nobleman, of such world-wide reputation for statesmanship and philanthropy as your lordship, endeavours to instil into the public mind the belief that it is a real honour for an honourable man to be invited to join in rendering homage to the virtues, the moral worth, and the philanthropic services of an admitted midnight assassin, whose only virtue, or worth, or service in the cause of humanity, whose only claim to distinction above other cut-throats, beyond that notoriety which always attaches to the most revolting murderers, consists in the fact that he killed ostensibly in the cause of the so-called great humanitarian anti-slavery movement of the age; you need not be surprised if others, who have real or imaginary wrongs to redress, may, while rejecting your peculiar idiosyncrasy, accept this as a means of redress. There are those who from the depths of their bleeding hearts, and for the redress of grievous wrongs which they themselves have suffered at the hands of their own race, would feel and say, "If this be a real honour, which a British nobleman may covet, how much more honourable to be invited to participate in saturnalia of nobler blood!"

In the House of Lords, Lord Brougham was, doubtless, sincere in his fanaticism, and we can therefore conceive the pang it must have cost him to avow, that the conduct of the North during the war that is raging for the conquest of the South, is more horrible than any that has ever been charged to the Southerners in respect to the treatment of their slaves.

Mr. Williams' letters are a startling proof of the undisguised warnings that were given to the North that the election of a sectional candidate for President, and the consequent political abnegation of the South, would lead to the dissolution of the Union. So much has the South been misrepresented in Europe, that her people were regarded as tyrants and spiritless, and not, as they have shown themselves, a heroic and high-spirited race; it was believed that the ill-used slaves were ripe for revolt; it was thought the North had supported the South, though there were plenty of official documents at hand to show that the North derived her riches from the profligence and energy of the South; and, therefore, it was not strange that Europe should have disregarded the warnings and have believed the Northern boastings that the South dared not secede, and that it only wished she would. But how can we explain the blindness of the North? Does not such blindness seem retribution? Does it not seem that, having so long calumniated and pretended to despise the South, the Northerners fell into the pit they dug for others, became self-deceived, and "their lies caused them to err," and to immolate their prosperity on the altar of their lust and hate?

THE CHURCH IN THE ARMY.*

THAT "When Christ came on earth peace was sung; and when Christ left the earth peace was bequeathed," is a true saying, but often misunderstood. The glorious legacy was deferred, not immediate; and tribulation and strife were destined to precede millennial rest. If it were not so there would be some foundation for the indiscriminate denunciation of warfare by Quakers, who profess no other duty than getting rich, and by the Peace-at-all-price Party, except when they imagine that peace is inimical to their pecuniary interests. If peace, instead of being bequeathed, had been commanded, then the profession of arms would have been incompatible with Christianity. We do not deny that aggressive warfare is unnecessary and wicked, whilst defensive warfare is just and commendable. But the justice or injustice of the war is not the responsibility of the soldier. His duty is to obey, not to pass judgment on the commands of his superiors. Though the Roman centurions, whose conversion is recorded in the New Testament, were the soldiers of an unscrupulous, ambitious, and most aggressive Power, yet they became Christians without being called upon to give up their military service. It would be curious if German theologians, who have reduced Christianity to a system of misty metaphysics, and who regard the "Faust" of Goethe, the poems of Heine, and the Bible as of equal authority, maintained that soldiering was a transgression of the Divine law; for those who reason right cannot deem it wrong to oppose rapine, vi et armis, any more than it is wrong to oppose burglary and murder by a system of police. Indeed, in Christian lawfulness and morality, there is no appreciable difference between a soldier and a policeman, and to be consistent, Quakers ought to protest as much against blue coats as red coats; but then, to be sure, it would be impossible to obey the injunction, "get rich, honestly if thou canst, but get rich," if we had not a police to hunt down vulgar rogues. It is more than curious, it is absolutely marvellous, that men who profess to believe that Christianity is a revealed religion, and that the Bible is the record of that revelation, should think that warfare is necessarily sinful. In the Old Testament there are numerous wars described, and war in all cases it is represented as doing the work of God as a scourge and an avenger. The instigators of war are punished for their ambition, but in no instance is the vocation of the soldier condemned. The Ruler of the Universe is repeatedly designated as the Lord of Hosts, and in that glorious song, in which Miriam and the daughters of Israel celebrated the passage of the Red Sea and the escape from Egypt—a song that from typical association appeals very strongly to the sympathy of Christians—there is the graphic and remarkable expression, "The Lord is a man of war." In the New Testament the business of the warrior is not directly or indirectly condemned. The duty and position of the Christian is illustrated by the duty and position of the soldier; and, as our author observes, "Nor do we find in the New Testament any censure upon the centurions. * * * There is not a syllable like this recorded of the centurion of Capernaum, nor of Cornelius, nor of the centurion in command at the crucifixion, nor of Julius, who had charge of Paul in his perilous journey to Rome. Nor did John the Baptist, nor our Lord in preaching to soldiers, intimate that their profession was inconsistent with the ethics of Christianity." Notwithstanding the evident lawfulness of the profession of arms, ever since the days of Cromwell, who declared that "a soldier must pray before he go to fight," and until very lately, there was a growing and general impression that licentiousness and irreligion were inevitable characteristics of the soldier. Officers high in command have not hesitated to avow that religion impaired the efficiency of an army, and endeavoured to impress upon the army-chaplain that the best religious service was "a roll on the drum and a blessing." We know this to be an error; we know that religious troops, even when religion has been unhappily associated with fanaticism, have proved themselves valiant and formidable. We know that the piety of Havelock did not make him a worse commander or a less heroic soldier. It is of incalculable importance that it should be understood that there is "a church in the army," since the recognition of the fact will do more than any other agency to ameliorate the condition, and elevate the character of our army. So long as we regard our soldiers as being without the pale of Christianity, so long will they, to a great extent, be strangers to the civilizing, ennobling influences of Christianity. Dr. Scott's book cannot fail to exercise a beneficial influence, for the object of it, very successfully carried out, is thus stated in the introduction:—

Our great aim, then, in this volume, is to give an expository history of the FOUR CENTURIONS, officers of the Roman army in Judea in apostolic times, who were to a greater or less degree brought under the power of the Gospel, or at least made acquainted with our Lord's history and doctrines; and to illustrate the fact, that eminent piety in a soldier is consistent with the loftiest courage—that, in truth, the Church of God may and does exist in earthly armies. It is certainly very desirable that military men, officers and privates in the army, should be constantly reminded that there have been found in all ages in their profession, men whose piety, to say the least, would bear a comparison with that of any other profession. It is a necessary encouragement to them to know that men of their own class, men in every respect by birth and education and daily circumstances like themselves, have been truly pious. This should keep them from despairing. The cases we have tried to illustrate show, also, that God employs a great variety of means or instruments by which to bring men to a knowledge of saving truth; and that in some instances a high standard of piety has been displayed under great disadvantages. Men in the army and navy are accustomed to decision, promptness in action, and to meet with opposition and to endure discipline, to display a lofty courage and a devotion to their country and the cause they defend. It is perfectly consistent, therefore, that when it pleases God to reveal himself to them, they should show the same manful decision and courage in behalf of the Gospel.

It is surprising, considering the multitude of preachers, and the countless number of sermons written, that so few volumes of sermons are worthy of critical commendation. There is often a considerable display of learning, and frequently able expositions of doctrine, but scholarship and theological acumen, though necessary, are not the chief ingredients of a sermon. The preacher has to deal with the heart as well as the head, and his mission is not only to make men wiser, but by all means in his power to persuade them to become righteous. A sermon ought to be very practical in its application; but, at the same time, it is necessary to avoid the icy, argumentative morality of Paley and the soft, super-gentle style of Blair. Now Dr. Scott, whilst lucidly exposing the doctrines of the Christian faith, whilst giving ample evidences of his research and learning, is always practical as well as thoroughly in earnest. We will vindicate the justice of our criticism by an extract which is no better than any other we might have chosen by opening the volume at random, but we select it because it has a special reference to the title of the book:—

It was worthy of special attention that such faith was found in a soldier. Our Lord was at this time surrounded by the Scribes, and probably in the house of a Pharisee, but it was in the Roman soldier that he found the greatest faith. As the profession of arms is not in itself sinful—is not a sin per se—so neither is the term soldier synonymous with cruelty or blood-thirstiness, nor with drinking, debauchery, and lawlessness. * * * We regard war as a terrible thing, but it is sometimes the less of two evils. War is better than national disgrace, or such loss of national honour and position as should destroy our self-respect and happiness. * * * A man is under no necessity to serve Satan, because he serves the government as a soldier. * * * If the military profession was a sin per se, then, instead of having chaplains to preach the Gospel and administer the sacraments of the Church in our army and navy, they should urge the men to desertion. But when the soldiers crowded to hear John the Baptist preach, as well as the Scribes and Pharisees, did he tell them to desert, and join a Peace Society? No; but he did tell them to do no violence and to be content with their wages, and not to accuse any man falsely. Soldiers are found also listening to the words of truth as they fell from the lips of the Great Teacher himself. But He did not tell them to leave their profession because it was a sin. In the New Testament we have four different centurions brought under the power of the Gospel. The one before us owed allegiance to a heathen emperor, yet he possessed greater faith than any in Israel. And what shall we say of Abraham, Moses, Joshua, and David—men of pre-eminent faith, and yet heroes in battle? And what shall we say of Colonel Gardiner, General Burns, and General Sir Henry Havelock, and many others in our times?

If "The Church in the Army" were republished in this country it would not only be favourably received by the religious public, but would aid those who are seeking to improve the social, moral, and religious status of the British soldier. Moreover, the general reader would find Dr. Scott's volume repay an attentive perusal, for the great lessons inculcated in it are as applicable to the civilian as to the soldier.

* The Church in the Army; or, The Four Centurions. By Rev. W. A. SCOTT, D.D. New York: Carleton.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.;
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOUDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rainer-platz,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBURGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
Jos. T. Robinson & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

THE ONLY PAMPHLET ON THE AMERICAN
QUESTION WITH A MAP.

WHY PENNSYLVANIA
SHOULD BECOME ONE OF THE CON-FEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA. By a Native of Pennsylvania. With a large Map of the Federal and Confederate States, distinguished by colours.
London: J. W. Whitson, Bookseller and Publisher, 93, Great Russell-street. Five shillings west of the British Museum.

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC.
On Wednesday, the 20th, will be published, in 1 vol., 10s.

THOMAS JEFFERSON: an Historical View of Democracy in America. By GERRARD DE WYLLIE. Illustrated with the Author's signature, by R. S. H. B. London: LONDON, GREEN, AND CO., 11, Ludgate-hill.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE and NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A.
Represented by R. G. DRESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES;
Their Origin and the Remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: HOUGHTON, New Bond-street.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDER-ICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published
the following Catalogues of their Stock:—

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books—Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP-CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History,
Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign
Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The advantages of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Time and time and tide waits for no man. The commerce of the world will pause no ruinous action, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful picture of the world, and not a picture of the World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors will be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.
The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.
Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your papers, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.
We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.
By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY.—living with her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location, who is desirous of placing her daughters in the hands of a motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

GENTLEMEN requiring an excellent Tailor are recommended to the establishment of A. M. LAFFITTE, 229, Regent-street, London, above Verrill's Restaurant; and 20, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
Dr. Jamieson.
Ar. Milkenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.
OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,398,206 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.
A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.
OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 692,328 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 71
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 866,220 08
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent. interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issued
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.
At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Muspero.
R. Mouton.
C. H. Hould.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
A. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
B. F. Voorhier.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.
OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.
Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 501,576 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,959 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861;
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.
These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and laud Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, 23 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primage.

PARTIAL PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—
"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquafortis, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying, or sending the same to be shipped, he shall for every such offence be penally not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.
A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.
Published every Thursday Evening.
PRICE SIXPENCE.
Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum
Stamped. Thirty Shillings per annum.
Nos. I. to XII. NOW READY.
Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—startled Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thought; that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the slipshod and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the
friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.
The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.
Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.
A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, at 11, Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C. July 24, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 14.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JULY 31, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	209
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	210
Manchester Letter	211
THE TOBACCO MARKET	211
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
General Lee	211
The Grand Conflict	211
PRIVATE LETTERS	212
GENERAL BOTLER AND THE LADIES OF NEW ORLEANS	212
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	213
Havannah	213
Paris	213
THE DEBATE ON THE WAR IN AMERICA—
Mr. Lindsay's Motion	214
LEADERS—
A Word with our Readers	216
The Position of the Belligerents	216
The Decisive Moment	217
Financial Prospects	217
THE CRUISE OF THE SUMNER—
Capture of the Vigilant and the E. van Dodge ..	218
LETTER TO THE EDITOR	218
THE AMENITIES OF THE UNITED STATES' CONGRESS	223
ADVERTISEMENTS	224

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE state of General McClellan's army is the subject of angry discussion in Congress, as well as in the press and amongst the people. There is no longer any rumours of advance, and instead of them, it is reported that "the Confederate army has retreated ten miles towards Richmond," and this is intended to quiet the apprehensions of those who know something about the actual position of affairs. General Lee has issued a congratulatory address to his soldiers upon raising the siege of Richmond, and announces the capture of fifty-three pieces of artillery. In the United States' Senate, Mr. Chandler has again denounced General McClellan's tactics, "declaring that tens of thousands of men were killed in the swamp, and stating that 158,000 men were sent to McClellan previous to the battles before Richmond." The reported large reinforcement of the army of the Potomac is now contradicted; and it is said the Government "cannot spare any men from the existing divisions of the army." General McClellan has issued strict orders that no civilians are to enter his camp, "and great mystery hangs over all his proceedings." The vessels passing up James River "are frequently fired into from field-pieces stationed on the banks by the Confederates." The sum of these items is, that General McClellan has been routed, forced to take up a position from which he cannot advance, has the enemy in his rear as well as in his front, cannot obtain the reinforcements he so urgently demands, and is harassed by the threatened interruption of his supplies. Add to this the sickness consequent upon the climate and season, and it is not surprising that there is a gloomy feeling in Washington and New York about the future of General McClellan's army, and that very little consolation is derived from the report that the Confederates, having thus fixed the enemy, are retiring for a few miles from his front.

Nor can the account that McClellan has been reinforced from Hunter's command, be very pleasant to the Federals, as such movements are a virtual abandonment of operations in other States.

It is "expected" that General Halleck will assume the command of the United States' armies, but that Generals McClellan and Pope will retain their present positions. If this expectation is realized, it will not be an unreasonable arrangement. It will relieve Mr. Lincoln of responsibility, and General Halleck is quite as good a commander as the President. It is not likely that the services of General Halleck will be much longer needed near Corinth, and as Commander-in-Chief, he will be able to gain victories and capture prisoners, on paper, whenever and wherever he likes.

The James River has been strongly fortified by the Confederates against the operations of the Federal fleet. Besides the multiplication of obstructions in the channel, earthworks have been erected, and Fort Darling has been strengthened with iron-clad batteries.

In another page will be found the address of President Davis to the Confederate army, after the battles before Richmond. This document is marked by quiet confidence, and in the hour of triumph, it warns the defenders of their country that new labours and fresh sacrifices are in store for them.

General Pope, a worthy disciple of the illustrious despatch-writer, General Halleck, has treated his soldiers to a flaming address. We quote the first few sentences of this characteristic document:—

Washington, Monday, July 14.

To the Officers and Soldiers of the Army of Virginia.

By special assignment of the President of the United States, I have assumed command of this army. I have spent two weeks in learning your whereabouts, your condition, and your wants, in preparing you for active operations, and in placing you in positions from which you can act promptly and to the purpose. I have come to you from the West, where we have always seen the backs of our enemies—from an army whose business it has been to seek the adversary, and to beat him when found—whose policy has been attack, and not defence. In but one instance has the enemy been able to place our Western armies in a defensive attitude. I presume that I have been called here to pursue the same system, and to lead you against the enemy. It is my purpose to do so, and that speedily. I am sure you long for an opportunity to win the distinction you are capable of achieving; that opportunity I shall endeavour to give you.

No reference is made to the capture of 10,000 prisoners in ten seconds, and we congratulate General Pope upon his modest reticence. The description of the operations of the Federal army in the West is a remarkable example of unblushing mendacity. Perhaps "where we have always seen the backs of our enemies" is a pretty equivocation for "where we have never had the audacity to face the enemy." General Pope omitted to state that the army in the West was particularly careful not to look at the enemy, except from behind entrenchments. It is true that "in but one instance has the enemy been able to place our Western army in a defensive attitude," because the army of the West has never been placed in an offensive attitude.

General Pope has not been long in getting to work. It was reported that he had entered Gordonsville, destroyed the junction of the Orange, Alexandria, and Virginia Central Railroads, and thus cut off a large quantity of supplies for Richmond. On the 21st inst. it was notified that "the report that the Federals had advanced to Gordonsville was erroneous. The Confederates are supposed to be still in possession of that place." The Washington Government ought to take measures so that the victories of Pope may live at least for one mail.

General Pope has issued an order that "his army will subsist on the country in which operations are carried on;" a needless license to plunder, seeing that the Federal armies have not hitherto shown any unwillingness to plunder unarmed people.

General "Stonewall" Jackson is said to be on the Shenandoah, advancing upon Harper's Ferry.

But the movements in Kentucky are, for the moment, of more interest than the events now transpiring in Virginia. Throughout that important State there is a general uprising, and every probability that it will shortly pass from the control of the Federals. The operation is so general, so well arranged, that there is no pretence for saying the victories in Virginia brought about, though they may have been the signal of, the uprising; it has been determined from the outset of the war, and the prostration of the North, and the defeat of McClellan's army, were regarded as fitting opportunities for action. We must observe that our accounts in reference to Kentucky are solely derived from Northern sources, and that, therefore, it is certain the power and doings of the Confederates are not fully stated; yet even these reports are sufficient to manifest the loyalty of the Kentuckians to the South, and the unanimity of the State in determining to throw off the Federal yoke.

Last week we announced that the Confederates were in considerable force near Frankfort, the State capital of Kentucky. Since then, we hear, that the Confederates have captured Cynthiana, a place to the north of Lexington; that they have captured Henderson, on the borders of Kentucky; that the Confederates were advancing on Louisville and Lexington; that the last-named place has been put under martial law; that "great excitement exists at Covington, Newport, and even at Cincinnati," and that the Confederates were at Glasgow in large force. The reports that "the Confederates, under General Morgan, are reported to be advancing upon Lexington," that General Morgan was advancing on Louisville," and that "the Federals, with several pieces of artillery, left Louisville, and advanced to Georgetown to meet General Morgan's forces," show that there is more than one Confederate army in the field in Kentucky. Moreover, the Confederates have captured Newburg, in Indiana, a town opposite to Henderson, and "the Governor of Ohio has called out volunteers for thirty days to resist invasion from Kentucky." Instead of answering to the call of the President of the United States, the men of the North will have to remain at home to protect their own States. We need hardly remark that the movements in Kentucky make the position of the Federal army in Tennessee extremely critical, if not altogether untenable.

Besides the movements in Kentucky, the Confederates have captured two towns in Missouri. We learn that "General Curtis, by forced marches, has arrived safely at Helena, Arkansas," and we further know that he has withdrawn from Arkansas. The Northern account of his retreat shows that he was driven out of the State, and it is ominous to read that "several small engagements have occurred in Arkansas, in which the Federals were successful." Of course, to be forced to retreat, to be driven from position by the enemy, is a Federal success in Arkansas, as well as in Virginia.

The Confederates were within fifteen miles of Nashville. The defence of a hostile city in the midst of a hostile country is not an easy task.

The most significant item of the news is, "the South-West is overrun with guerillas." The Federals have to contend against the entire population, which is thoroughly roused to resistance; and to do this Mr. Lincoln will want more than the new army he finds it so difficult to raise.

We have a few particulars of the capture of Murfreesborough, Tennessee. It appears that the Confederates were under the command of Colonel Forrest, and that two Federal regiments surrendered—the 9th Michigan, and the 3rd Minnesota. There is a Northern report that the Confederates did not continue to occupy Murfreesborough, but retired to Chattanooga.

The whereabouts of General Beauregard is still anxiously canvassed by the Federals; the latest Federal "guess" is that he is at Chattanooga, with 60,000 men.

General Butler is further distinguishing himself at New Orleans. He has imprisoned Mrs. Phillips, the wife of an eminent lawyer, for laughing during the passing of the funeral procession of a Federal officer. We do not defend the conduct of the lady, though it is palliated by the circumstances, and by the infamous conduct of the Federal commander towards the ladies of New Orleans. General Butler's account of this affair will be found in another column. The price of bread has been fixed, and any New Orleans baker asking more will be imprisoned. The functions of the City Council have been suspended, and Bureaus of Finance, Streets, and Landings instituted. The reason of this is that the city authorities will not take the oath of allegiance. General Butler will not allow any one to leave New Orleans without taking the oath; and, on the other hand, General Grant compels all persons to leave Memphis who refuse to take the oath. These proceedings are peculiarly contradictory. The Governor of Louisiana has forbidden any intercourse with New Orleans, because General Butler has admitted persons into the city without question, and before allowing them to leave, either forced on them the oath of allegiance to the United States or endorsed on their passports a stipulation of disloyalty to the Confederacy.

The Confederates are said "to be making mysterious movements in the neighbourhood of Corinth," and it is reported that on the 12th inst. the Confederate cavalry made a demonstration against the Federals.

General Van Dorn has issued a proclamation declaring his intention to protect the banks along the river Mississippi to the last extremity.

The British gunboats Landrail and Rinaldo are at New Orleans, so that the British subjects are no longer entirely without protection.

Vicksburg was at the last news still holding out. A Confederate ram had arrived at Vicksburg, and, "after inflicting considerable damage upon the Federal fleet, had anchored under cover of the batteries." This may give Commander Farragut something else to think about besides cutting the canal to alter the course of the Mississippi. "Inflicting considerable damage" is a strong admission for the North to make.

Recruiting is going on very slowly. Federal bounty, State bounty, payment in advance, a year's or nine months' enlistment, and the threats of conscription, are of little or no avail. 300,000 men are asked for, and only 15,000 volunteered in eleven days. Congress has passed the Militia Bill, authorizing the employment of negroes for camp service, or any military or naval service for which they are competent; also to accept 100,000 volunteers for nine months' service, with $25 bounty, and one month's advance pay.

The financial position of the North is sensationally desperate. Gold is at 20 per cent. premium, silver at 15 per cent. premium, and exchange on this country at 132 to 133. The President has signed an act for issuing postage and other stamps for currency. During the session Congress has apportioned $800,000,000, and assuming this appropriation to be at par, it is equal, at the present rate of exchange, to an expenditure of £190,000,000 sterling; but this does not include the indebtedness of the Government to contractors, to the army, and to the States, or the indebtedness of the several States.

A National Currency Bill has been introduced into Congress. This Bill provides for the formation of associations for carrying on banking, with United States' stocks as a basis. Congress has no constitutional right to pass such a measure; however, at present, there is no respect paid to constitutional rights.

President Lincoln has signed the Confiscation Bill, with amendments that the provisions of the Bill should not apply to acts of rebels done previous to the passage of the Bill, and that the confiscation is to be only during the lifetime of offenders. A message was previously sent to Congress by the President suggesting some modifications in the Bill, but it was not favourably received by the Republican Party. We agree with the Times that this Bill is infamous, and further, we submit it is pre-eminently foolish to confiscate before conquering. Let nations on this side the Atlantic be careful, or perhaps Congress may confiscate England and France, and for the matter of that, the property of the Man in the Moon.

In the Senate on the 14th, the Bill for the admission of Western Virginia as a State was taken up, debated at considerable length, and passed. The Bill, as passed, provides that all slaves born within the limits of the State after July 4, 1863, shall be free. The House of Representatives has postponed the consideration of this Bill till December.

On the 15th a Bill was introduced further amending the Articles of War, so as to render it the duty of officers to furnish protection to slaves.

The following is Mr. Lincoln's Message to Congress in reference to the Emancipation Act:—

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives,—Herewith is the draught of the Bill to compensate any State which may abolish slavery within its limits, the passage of which, substantially as presented, I respectfully and earnestly recommend.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any State shall have lawfully abolished slavery within and throughout such State, either immediately or gradually, it shall be the duty of the President, assisted by the Secretary of the Treasury, to prepare and deliver to each State an amount of 6 per cent. interest-bearing bonds of the United States, equal to the aggregate value at $— per head of all the slaves within such State as reported by the census of 1860; the whole amount for any one State to be delivered at once, if the abolishment be immediate, or in equal annual instalments if it be gradual, interest to begin running on each bond at the time of delivery, and not before.

"And be it further enacted, that if any State having so received any such bonds shall at any time after wards, by law, reintroduce or tolerate slavery within its limits, contrary to the Act of abolishment upon which such bonds shall have been received, said bonds so received by said State shall at once be null and void, in whomsoever hands they may be, and such State shall refund to the United States all interest which may have been paid on such bonds."

On the 15th the Border States' representatives finally agreed upon their reply to the President's emancipation proposition. They cannot endorse his policy, and differ from his belief that the refusal of those States to act upon and adopt it may or will prolong the war.

Meetings have been held in various places to promote volunteering for the Federal army, but they have not been very numerously attended, and have not gained many recruits. The meeting in Union Square, on the 15th, was altogether a failure, though, of course, the prepared resolutions were passed, but there was not a numerous or enthusiastic auditory.

The House of Commons has this week been engaged in the discussion of the Union Relief Aid Bill. Mr. Potter made the following statement as to the extent of the distress:—

The number of hands employed in trades coming under the Factory Act in Great Britain was 451,000. Of these 315,000 were employed in Lancashire, 27,800 in Yorkshire, and 40,000 in Cheshire. Last year the wages amounted to £250,000 a week, or about 10s. 6d. per head. The number altogether unemployed was at present 80,000, the loss of wages being £42,000 a week; the number half employed was 370,000, the loss of wages being £97,125, making a total loss of £139,125. At present the average earnings of the workers amounted to 4s. 10d. per head, as compared with 10s. 6d. last year; and the 80,000 persons entirely unemployed might be said to have dependent upon them about 120,000 more, making a total of 200,000 to be supported by the public. That was exclusive of the unemployed in trades connected with the cotton manufacture, such as bleaching, dyeing, and others.

The Government was defeated on Wednesday, and Lord Palmerston agreed to introduce a clause embodying the views of the House in reference to granting the Guardians powers to borrow money on the security of the rates of parishes.

The Queen, as Duchess of Lancashire, has sent £2000 to the fund for the relief of the distress in the manufacturing districts, accompanied by a graceful and feeling letter.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, July 30, 1862.

Our last report left the market, quiet and dull, at 17½d. to 18d. for middling Orleans, and 13d. for Fair Dhollerah.

On Thursday and Friday the dullness continued, with sales each day of 3,000 bales, and some transactions took place in American cotton almost on the basis of 17½d. for middling Orleans. On the announcement of the week's business, surprise was expressed at the small amount taken by the trade—only 3,000 bales—but this is partly to be explained by the fact that considerable deductions are still making for parcels resold by spinners, and it is probable that the actual purchases by the trade last week reached 10,000 or 12,000 bales, the actual export reached the large figure of 16,000 bales, and the estimated stock in the port was increased to 171,000 bales. It is thought that the real stock is somewhat larger than these figures, and that sufficient allowance has not yet been made for the large amounts returned by spinners; and it is not unlikely that the stock of Surats in the port is still 20,000 or 30,000 bales larger than the estimates.

On Friday afternoon the Scotia's news came to hand after business hours, and though containing few fresh items of interest they were generally construed in favour of the market. Accordingly the demand improved on Saturday, and 7000 bales were sold at about ¾d. advance; out of that total no less than 5000 bales were taken by the trade, a quantity far in excess of their previous purchases, and indicating more vitality with Manchester than had generally been looked for. On Monday the good inquiry continued, and 7000 bales were again sold at rather higher prices. Yesterday the market received a further stimulus from the receipt of the Hibernian's news, which arrived about noon, and strongly confirmed the most gloomy forebodings of those who looked for a protracted war; the business reached 8000 bales, at a further advance of ¾d. in American.

In Manchester prices were also decidedly dearer, and confidence was increased in a higher range of prices for the future. Spinners in consequence have attended freely to-day, and with a strong tone in the market and sales of 10,000 bales, a further advance of ¾d. must be noted, putting the quotations for Middling American at 18d. for Bowed, 18½ for Mobiles, and 18½ to ½ for Orleans. In Surats there has been less elasticity, owing to large arrivals being placed on the market, and we quote to-day 13½d. to ¾d. for Fair Dhollerahs and Omrawatte, 14d. for Broach, and 16c. for Sawginned Dharwar.

It is easy to perceive that at the last few days the hopes previously entertained of a speedy termination of the American struggle have greatly subsided. It cannot be denied that the last news from America is most adverse to any chance of early settlement. It had been hoped that the Federal disasters at Richmond would disgust the North with their fruitless war, and lead to a revulsion of public feeling, but it must be admitted that recent advices do not bear out this opinion. The only effect of these mortifying reverses seem to be that the North is abandoning the original programme of the war, and finding it impossible to regain the South by the ordinary weapons of warfare, is preparing to crush it by the use of the negro element. The Confiscation Bill just passed at Washington, is practically equivalent to a decree for universal emancipation, and it is impossible to foretell the fearful lengths to which the carrying out of this measure may last. It is evident that if this war becomes one of abolition, and fairly involves the element of servile insurrection, it may go on till both sections of the country are utterly ruined; and even if it happily disappoints this expectation, it is hardly possible to see how any arrangement is possible between North and South, after the passage of such a barbarous measure as that which has just received the President's assent. The only hope now for an early peace lies in the difficulty of the North to find men and money; but it seems likely that such a pressure will be brought to bear in the shape of bounties and moral compulsion, that a sufficient number of recruits will be obtained to carry on the war for the present, and rather than forego that object, it appears that the North, if others means fail, will resort to a conscription. Neither is it likely that financial embarrassment will sufficiently obstruct its efforts for a considerable time yet, the currency is rapidly depreciating, but as the Government issues are legal tender, and cannot be refused in payment of contracts to the State, the Government expenditure may be supported for a considerable period yet, though at the cost of a constant depreciation in the value of its paper.

Under these circumstances, there seems a strong probability of our little handful of American cotton being run to a most extravagant figure, for it is evident now that there is little chance of its being supplemented before the end of the year. Cotton at New York had reached fifty-one cents at the latest dates, so that it is reasonable to anticipate some export demand for that quarter, and in Havre the market rates steadily 1½d. above our quotations, causing a constant strain of export in that direction; and yet an existing stock will only provide 2000 bales per week till the end of the year, for all purposes put together. The position of the market is certainly extraordinary. It may be added that the recent Confederate successes in Tennessee and Kentucky, by closing up the outlets for cotton, will put a stop to the slender trade that had commenced between Nashville and New York.

MANCHESTER, Wednesday, July 30, 1862.

Since Tuesday last our market, like that of Liverpool, has recovered in some degree from the loss of tone suffered through the American intelligence and Indian advices.

On Friday the sellers of water twist in bundles, and still more of mule yarns below 50s. are regaining firmness.

The weakness most observable is in articles partly or wholly made from Surat cotton, and is found chiefly among speculators who bought previously for resale in this market.

Sales continue to be small both to merchants and manufacturers.

The production is very much decreasing, and will soon become less than the requirements of the trade demand.

Spinners of single yarns from 60s. to 100s. exhibit less anxiety to sell than previously.

The tendency for double and single above 100s. continue to improve in price.

There was an increase of offers for some kinds of cloth, mainly Eastern shirtings, the offers were made in a great measure by speculators to speculators without, however, much result in business.

In all kinds of cloth there continues but a very trifling demand, and the business doing is but of a retail character, production is fast ceasing, and manufacturers are firmer in their prices.

As regards shirtings, jaconets, printers, T cloths, &c., the bulk of the very moderate business done has been by speculators who hold stock, and who often show a disposition to realize whenever a fair profit is obtainable.

The following report of a visit to one of our manufacturing towns illustrates too faithfully the great distress now prevailing, and which is, unfortunately, only a forerunner of what we may expect in all our manufacturing towns for an indefinite period:—

"On our way, I noticed again some features of street life which are more common in manufacturing towns just now than when times are good.

"Now and then one meets with a man in the dress of a factory worker, selling newspapers or religious tracts, or hawk numbers of the penny periodicals, which do not cost much. It is easy to see, from their shy and awkward manner, that they are new to the trade, and do not like it. They are far less dexterous and much more easily sold than the brisk young salesman who hawk newspapers in the streets of Manchester. I know that many of these are unemployed operatives, trying to make an honest penny in this manner till better days return. Now and then, too, a grown-up girl trails along the streets, with wandering steps, slow, ragged, and soiled, and starved, and looking as if she had travelled far in the rainy weather, homeless and forlorn. I know that such sights may be seen at any time, but not near so often as just now, and I cannot help thinking that many of these are poor sheep which have strayed away from the broken folds of labour. Sometimes it is an older woman that goes by, with a child at the breast, and one or two holding by the skirt of her tattered gown, and perhaps one or two limping after, as she crawls along the pavement, gazing languidly from side to side among the heedless crowd, as if giving her last look round the world for help, without knowing where to get it, and without heart to ask for it. It is easy to give wholesale reasons why nobody need to be in such a condition as this, but it is not improbable that there are some poor souls who, from no fault of their own, drop through the great sieve of charity into utter destitution. They are well kept that God keeps. May the continual dew of Heaven's blessing gladden the hearts of those who deal kindly with them all.

To-day our market has improved perceptibly in tone, and firmer and more confident feeling is exhibited by all classes of producers.

In yarns, the aggregate amount of business doing is not large, but on the whole, prices are firmer, and for some of the better qualities, especially for those spun from American cotton very extreme rates have sometimes been paid.

The German merchants appear to be the principal operators, but their purchases are much circumscribed by the advance for which spinners hold, and to which, as their production is lessening every week, they steadily adhere. We hear of some transactions in 20s. water-twist at full prices, and in 30s. (which is very scarce) at an advance sometimes of ½d. per lb. since last Tuesday. The better qualities in 40s. mule are also in fair request for the continent, but the high prices for which this class of yarn is held, has checked the demand and limited business.

In India and China qualities, next to no business is doing, but the quantity brought on the market is now very moderate, and prices are very firmly maintained. Twist and pin cops, for the home trade, are all held for an advance, as compared with last week, but the amount of business doing in this department appears to be very small. Doubled yarns are very firm, and some of the lower counts from 40s. downwards, are in fair request, and have been sold at very full prices to day.

In every kind of goods the business doing seems to be very small, but, as the quantity brought upon the market is being daily reduced, there is no pressure to sell on the part of manufacturers, and, except at extreme prices, they seem careless about parting with their cloth.

TOBACCO.

LONDON, July 31, 1862.

The markets in London and Liverpool for American descriptions have been in an excited state throughout this month, the feeling at the close being perhaps stronger than at any preceding date.

The business has been large, and prices materially advanced on the quotations at the opening of the month.

The late accounts from Kentucky are considered favourable for holders. Should hostilities be actively resumed, there is imminent danger that the crop will be greatly injured through neglect.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

IN our last impression, the types rather oddly spelled the names of Mr. A. P. Wetter and Mr. Von Barke, who lately ran the blockade at Charleston.

OUR files of Richmond papers come down to the 9th inst. We subjoin such extracts as are possible at the late hour of their receipt. In our next issue we shall publish in full the addresses of the Governors of Virginia and Louisiana to the people of those States, as also a list of the Confederates killed and wounded in the recent battles, as far as known.

GENERAL LEE.

From the Richmond Dispatch.

The rise which this officer has suddenly taken in the public confidence is without a precedent. At the commencement of the war he enjoyed the highest reputation of any officer on the continent. But his fame was considerably damaged by the result of his campaign over the mountains. The public was unable to estimate the difficulties with which he was surrounded, and was displeased with him because he did not accomplish what we are now convinced must have been an impossibility.—We confess we were of the number who allowed our previously high estimation of Gen. Lee to be considerably shaken, if not altogether overthrown, by the result of that expedition. It was not until he was placed in a situation in which he had an opportunity to display his great abilities that he was enabled to teach the country and ourselves, as humble sons of the country, the folly of forming sudden judgments upon premises not sufficiently established.

The operations of General Lee in the short campaign which is just over were certainly those of a master. No captain that ever lived could have planned or executed a better campaign. It was perfect in all its parts, and will be set down hereafter as among the models which the military student will be required to study. His first labour was to render the city impregnable, which he accomplished so successfully, that, in the opinion of military men, it could not be taken by double the force McClellan could bring against it. His next was to provide for the dispersion of the enormous force which threatened it from the Chickahominy. How was this to be done? To attack their fortifications in front was only to throw away the lives of his soldiers. To turn them with the force which he had under him here was an enterprise of infinite difficulty, since he would be compelled, in doing so, to expose his own flank during the cross march. In this dilemma, he fell upon the bold and original plan of bringing Jackson down upon their right flank and rear. But it was of the last importance to conceal this intended operation until the very last moment. The plan he devised was in the highest degree ingenious. It was generally believed that Jackson, after crushing Fremont and Shields, was to march into the enemy's country and transfer the war to its own fireside. Means were taken to encourage that belief, and one of them was to send heavy reinforcements to the Valley. When these had reached their destination, and everybody was expecting to hear the sound of Jackson's cannon on the Susquehanna, the public were electrified by the magnificent reconnaissance of Gen. Stuart. From that reconnaissance Lee learned all that he wished further to know, and while the public was still discussing the utility of an operation so full of hazard, the news arrived that Jackson had sent to Lynchburg for all the cars, that he was at Staunton, that he was at Gordonsville, that he was at Louisa Court-House, that he was at Hanover Court-House, with all his army. The truth then burst upon the public in its full effulgence. The enemy were to be attacked in flank and rear by Jackson's army at the same time that they were to be assailed in front by Lee with the main bulk of his army. The plan was worthy of the most renowned general that ever lived; and even while it was in the very agony of projection, and had not yet been tried, no man doubted its entire success. It did succeed beyond all reasonable hope, even of so wisely-conceived and well digested an operation. Its success places its author among the highest military names—on the same roll with the Hannibals, the Cæsars, the Fredericks, and the Napoleons of history.

The perfect success which attended the efforts of Lee to keep the march of Jackson from the knowledge of the enemy, is among the marvels of those marvellous operations. The writer of this was aware that Jackson was on the march for Richmond as early as last Sunday fortnight, when he heard that he had passed through Gordonsville with a portion of his forces. Not fewer than 1000 persons knew the same thing at the same time. And yet not a soul was found to betray the secret to the enemy, and he was taken, at last, completely by surprise! Was there ever such unanimity of opinion as this circumstance reveals? Where is the Union party that were to show themselves as soon as the enemy made its appearance in force!

THE GRAND CONFLICT.

The grand conflict of the immense armies near this city still progresses. Our successes have been almost uninterrupted. The nature of the country and the great extent of the lines prohibited a grand battle in open plain. The struggle has been one of successive fights of divisions of the armies thus far. But there must be a greater battle than any yet between the main bodies, when brought by concentration and strategy front to front.

The positions of the armies at this time, it is believed, insures a complete ultimate triumph to our arms. The intrepid Jackson, as our citizens have been aware for several days, is in the field here with his principal force. By a rapid march he swept down from the mountains, and, co-operating with General Lee, got in rear of the enemy. It is understood that he has cut off retreat by way of the Pamunkey, and stands a stone-wall to hold the enemy to his position, while he is pressed by our intrepid forces on the South bank of the Chickahominy. He has had some hard fighting, and has dealt the enemy some terrible blows.

The struggle began auspiciously for our arms, and has continued with daily triumphs. We refer to our details. The final blow must be given, we suppose, in a few hours. We are confident of complete victory. Let us be grateful for our signal success the past week, and continue our prayers to Heaven for final triumph.

MONDAY AFTERNOON'S FIGHT.

We have already laid before our readers such accounts of the desperate and determined fight of Monday evening as we were enabled to gather from the most authentic sources. An active participant in that memorable engagement has furnished a detailed account of the part borne by the division of General A. P. Hill in this struggle. This division went into the fight about half-past five o'clock p.m., and was actively engaged from the time it closed, after nine o'clock at night.

The 40th Virginia Regiment, Fields' Brigade, Colonel Brockenbrough commanding, was deployed as skirmishers, 300 yards to the right, separating them from the balance of the brigade, which was ordered forward. The regiment was then withdrawn as skirmishers, and placed in the rear of the division, which was advancing rapidly to the field in regular line of battle. After advancing in this order for some distance, they were thrown out upon the left, through a heavy tract of woods—emerging from which they encountered a strong force of the enemy, who threw themselves upon the ground and awaited the approach of the regiment. When within 150 yards of this body, which, we learn, was partly composed of the 57th New York regiment, a most murderous and destructive fire was opened upon them, and it is believed that not less than seventy-five of our men fell from the first volley. This, as might have been expected, produced some confusion in the regiment, and they fell back to the woods, hotly pursued by the exultant foe. Many of the regiment, it is believed, were captured in this wood, as at roll-call next morning but fifty were present to respond to their names, out of 450 that went into the fight.

On a hill, obliquely to the right of General Hill's advance, was posted a battery of some twelve pieces, which had been twice captured during the afternoon by our forces under General Lee's direction, but recaptured by the enemy. This battery, the brigade of General Fields—reduced in numbers and worn out with fatigue from their participation in every general engagement since Thursday—was ordered to charge. With spirit and alacrity they responded to the order, and with close rank and steady step they moved forward to its execution. In their approach to the battery, they fired three or four rounds, and then engaged the enemy with the bayonet. Here the struggle was bloody and determined, but after a most obstinate resistance the enemy was driven from his pieces, and pressed back some 200 yards in a hand-to-hand engagement. This charge was made by three regiments—the 47th, 53d, and 60th Virginia.

The other brigades of the division coming up to the support of Fields, finding the enemy routed, commenced cheering vociferously. The Federal general, M. Call, hearing this cheering, and mistaking the source from whence it came, rode up and said, "Hurra, boys; I am glad you have held the battery. Hold on for a short time, and reinforcements will be up to sustain you!" He was accompanied by Major Biddle, his adjutant-general, Major Williams, another aid, and two couriers. Suspecting that he had, perhaps, made a mistake, he asked what regiment it was that held the battery. An officer present replied, the 47th Virginia. On obtaining this information, Majors Williams and Biddle and the two couriers wheeled about and endeavoured to effect their escape. They were fired upon, and Major Biddle shot through the head and killed instantly. The others, so far as is known, escaped without injury. General M. Call being in advance of his party, was brought to stand by a private of the 47th Regiment, who drew his gun upon him and demanded his surrender. His sword was received by Major Mayo. The General was particularly solicitous that no indignity should be offered him, when he was emphatically assured by Major Mayo that he had not fallen into the hands of a soldiery unacquainted with the usages of civilized warfare. Under an escort, M. Call was sent to General Hill.

About nine o'clock the brigade of General Anderson was advanced to the front, and drawn up in line of battle. Several volleys were fired into the woods where the enemy had taken shelter, which had the effect to disperse them, and the fight closed for the evening. During the engagement General Anderson was knocked from his horse by the fragment of a shell striking him on the side of the head. He was missed after the fight was ended, and it was feared that he had been captured; but on Tuesday morning he came in tolerably well, but considerably bruised about the head.

TUESDAY'S OPERATIONS.

During the forenoon of Tuesday there was no regular engagement, but much desultory firing along the whole extent of the retreating and advancing lines. In the afternoon, about half-past two o'clock, a brisk fire was commenced on the right of the left wing of our army, Jackson's corps, then situated convenient to Dr. Poindexter's farm, on the Williamsburg-road, and directly opposite Turkey Island creek. The character of the country here is slightly undulating, the intervening ground between the belligerent parties, consisting of open, cultivated fields, whilst the extremes are dense woods of heavy timber and thick undergrowth. From the situation occupied by our troops, the enemy was discovered in large force deploying their troops, and placing their artillery in position. Bodies of skirmishers were thrown out from our column with a view to test the disposition of the enemy. This required but a short time to accomplish, as a brisk fire was soon opened upon them. Our artillery then opened fire upon the batteries of the enemy, which had the effect to produce another "artillery duel," lasting for one hour and a half, both parties serving their pieces with decided skill and alacrity.

Heavy bodies of infantry were advanced to the support of our artillery, and a general fight ensued, which resulted in the repulse and temporary withdrawal of the enemy; but, ultimately rallying and bringing to their aid a battery on their right, they opened a fierce oblique fire on the left flank of our forces then in action. This fire, which was excessively severe, was continued without intermission, and responded to with spirit by our own artillery until six o'clock p.m.

An intermission of some half hour then occurred, during which time, according to the representation of prisoners subsequently captured, the enemy at this point were heavily engaged, when the fight was again renewed, our centre and right becoming engaged. For three successive hours the same kept up one unbroken roar of artillery and musketry, which, for its fierce intensity, exceeded anything that has occurred in the whole series of bloody battles around

Richmond. The very earth trembled beneath the deafening and incessant peals. Notwithstanding the fatigue and well-nigh exhausted condition of our men, from their almost superhuman labours of the previous six days, they entered this fight with an ardour and readiness, plainly indicating their unchangeable determination to conquer or die. About half-past nine or ten o'clock, our artillery ceased firing, having effectually silenced the batteries of the enemy. This, however, it is due to say, was the only perceptible advantage gained by this wing of the army in the afternoon's operations. The loss sustained by both contending parties was heavy. How many on either side it is impossible to state, or even give an approximate estimate.

Whilst these operations were going on on the left wing of our army, a scarcely less severe fight was progressing on the right, where the division of General Huger was engaged. The brigades of Mahone and Armistead had been exerting themselves against a largely overwhelming force of the enemy, but being compelled to fall back in order to rest their men, General Ransom's brigade was ordered forward. It consisted of five regiments—viz., 24th, Colonel Clark; 25th, Colonel Rutledge; 26th, Colonel Vance; 35th, Colonel Ransom; and 49th, Colonel Ramsenr, all North Carolina troops. They were ordered to charge two heavy batteries, that were supported by not less than five Federal brigades, and all the while they were marching up to make the charge were under three fires. They did not falter, however, but went forward into the very teeth of the enemy without so much as the slightest indication of hesitation. It was, beyond question, one of the hardest fights, and one of the most desperate charges, that has been made during the whole war. This one brigade engaged the main body of the enemy's army at this point, and when compelled to withdraw did so in the most perfect order, and with the most undaunted spirit. General Ransom fearlessly and intrepidly led his brigade on horseback, and was, during the whole continuance of the fight, exposed to the leaden hail of the enemy.

Colonel M. W. Ransom, of the 35th Regiment, was wounded in the early part of the fight by a Minie ball in the arm, but remained at the head of his regiment, rallying and cheering his men, till struck by a piece of shell in the side and prostrated. Lieutenant Colonel Pettway then took command of the regiment, but was almost immediately killed. Colonel Ramsenr, of the 49th, was wounded, and the casualties are very large throughout the entire brigade. We held our ground, and General Ransom and his men slept upon the field they had formerly occupied, and, but for the pelting rain, would have renewed the fight yesterday morning.

There were, doubtless, other divisions and brigades engaged at different points along the line, who acquitted themselves with the same heroic and determined courage as that of the gallant Ransom; but being unapprised of their particular participation in this grand struggle for the defence of liberty, we are not prepared to notice them specially.

YESTERDAY'S OPERATIONS.

Notwithstanding the heavy rains of yesterday, the two armies were not inactive, though we have no report of any severe fighting. The latest accounts we have inform us that the enemy, finding some difficulty in getting off the bulk of their forces by the way of Turkey Island, had not moved to their left, in the direction of Deep Bottom, where there are good landings and deep water. But their retreat was cut off by our troops occupying the New Market-road, while they were also being attacked along the lines of the Long Bridge and Quaker roads. These three roads form a triangle of about one and a half or two miles area of low and heavily timbered land, with thick undergrowth, and which in wet weather is almost impassable.

If this information is correct—and we cannot doubt it—the total surrender must be only a question of time; and, in the absence of supplies, cannot be postponed more than one or two days.

LETTERS from Havannah state that the Federal authorities at New Orleans enforce a quarantine of forty days on every vessel coming from a foreign port, which virtually suspends all commerce.

We clip the following from the Louisville Journal, a paper under the patronage and control of the Federal Government, and a consistent opponent of Secession, both before and since the war. It will be seen that the "infamous" Butler has at last found a rival in the person of the Astronomer Mitchell:

FEDERAL GENERAL MITCHELL.—There seems unhappily to be no room for doubt that the course of this officer in North Alabama has been marked by conduct, not only injurious to the Government, but disgraceful to humanity. We are assured of this fact on authority we do not doubt and cannot doubt. The fact is thoroughly attested. We believe it, and, believing it, we proclaim it. We proclaim it with emphasis. General Mitchell and a portion of his command have perpetrated in North Alabama, deeds of cruelty and of guilt, the bare narration of which makes the heart sick. The particulars in the case will be laid before the authorities at Washington, in the course of a few days, when, we take it for granted, the honour of the nation and the welfare of the national cause will be promptly vindicated. The case will not brook delay. It cries out for investigation and determination. Let it be investigated and determined at once. We at present forbear to go into the heart-sickening particulars of the case, but, if necessary, we will not hesitate to do so hereafter. Meanwhile, we invoke the authorities, as they value the national honour and cherish the national cause, to visit swift justice upon the epauletted miscreant who has recklessly sinned both at defiance. General Mitchell is now in Washington, and can answer the charges against him, if they are answerable, without delay. We hope, for the country's sake, there will be in the matter no delay, and no clemency. The matter justly admits of neither. Feeling deeply, we speak strongly, but not certainly without the keenest sorrow. General Mitchell's villainous misconduct is a national calamity. It must pierce with sorrow the heart of every patriot, as of every man.

THE ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT DAVIS TO THE ARMY AFTER THE BATTLES BEFORE RICHMOND.

To the Army in Eastern Virginia: Soldiers—I congratulate you on the series of brilliant victories which, under the favour of Divine Providence, you have lately won, and, as the President of the Confederate States, do heartily tender to you the thanks of the country, whose just cause you have so skillfully and heroically served. Ten days ago an invading army, vastly superior to you in numbers and in the material of war, closely beleaguered your capital, and vauntingly proclaimed its speedy conquest. You marched to attack the enemy in his entrenchments; with well-directed movements and death-dealing valour, you charged upon him in his strong positions, drove him from field to field over a distance of more than thirty-five miles, and, despite his reinforcements, compelled him to seek shelter under the cover of his gun-boats, where he now lies cowering before the army so lately derided and threatened with entire subjugation. The fortitude with which you have borne toil and privation, the gallantry with which you have entered into each successive battle, must have been witnessed to be fully appreciated; but a grateful people will not fail to recognize you, and to bear you in loved remembrance. Well may it be said of you that you have "done enough for glory," but duty to a suffering country, and to the cause of constitutional liberty, claims from you yet further effort. Let it be your pride to relax in nothing which can promote your future efficiency. Your one grand object being to drive the invader from your soil, and, carrying your standards beyond the outer boundaries of the Confederacy, to wring from an unscrupulous foe the recognition of your birthright, community, and independence.

(Signed) JEFFERSON DAVIS.

PRIVATE LETTER.

Extract from Letter dated New Orleans, July 27, from a commercial house there to another in London:—

There has been very little change in our business affairs since the date of our last letter (May 10). Our part, as you will have learned, has been declared open, and, in consequence, we have had a number of arrivals, bringing full cargoes of provisions and general merchandize. The former being in extreme scarce supply, the first shipments found ready sale, at good prices, for our city consumption; the general merchandize, however, met a dead market; there being still no trade whatever yet with the country, our merchants have no occasion to make purchases. Communication with the interior is in no better shape than it was at the date of our last, the Federal forces having made no headway yet, since the date of their arrival, towards the country, except along the river above us, where they have taken possession of some small towns. No business can be carried on outside of the city; and, with the exception of an occasional arrival from the country of some provisions, no cotton or any other article of produce is coming to hand. The people in the country maintain the same hostile attitude as before, and persistently refuse to let anything come to our city, and, in particular, not a bale of cotton. We hear of continued burning of crops in the neighbourhood of those districts where the Federal forces are approaching. Some little business has been done in the way of exports, by shipments of our Louisiana sugar and molasses to New York and the other Eastern markets, which is the only article that we have a large supply of, and which numerous parties are sending forward, even at unusual high rates of freight. The few hundred bales of cotton which escaped destruction at the time nearly all the stock on hand here was burnt on arrival of the Federal fleet, have lately gone forward, together with what has since been put into hales, consisting of picked cotton and old samples. We suppose the total amount cleared to date may perhaps run up to 1000 bales, and expect that at the present moment there is but very little left. We have no hope of any cotton being sent to market here from the interior, as the people continue unchanged in their determination to do nothing which might be of advantage to the Northern people.

A British vessel, arrived from Liverpool via Havannah, since the opening of the port, is advertised for freight to Liverpool, but thus far has made no engagement. The rate asked is 13d. for cotton.

We find ourselves here in a most disheartening position, not the least sign of a prospect for a favourable change. The Southern people continue in their feeling of extreme enmity towards the United States' Government, and a quasi submission exists only where the Federal arms are in overpowering force; consequently wherever in the country, no army holds power yet, the people continue in their open hostility. The sentiments of our city people remain, like those in the country, unchanged towards the old Government; though everybody expresses the greatest anxiety for peace, all remain stubbornly determined not to do an act which might show a willingness to return to allegiance to the old Government.

Of the so-called Union people, a very small number indeed have shown themselves of those belonging to the respectable class; most of those who have taken the oath of allegiance are either of irresponsible character, or of the lower class of people and such as have no great scruple to side with any party in power, thousands of whom are always found in every large city; or they are persons who had to take it by compulsion. How then, and when, can we look for a change for the better?

GENERAL BUTLER AND THE LADIES OF NEW ORLEANS.

General Butler has written the following letter to a friend in Boston, purporting to defend his infamous Woman Order:—

Head-quarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, July 2, 1862.

My dear Sir,—I am as jealous of the good opinion of my friends as I am careless of the slanders of my enemies, and your kind expressions in regard to Order No. 28 leads me to say a word to you on the subject. That it ever could have been so misconceived as it has been by some portions of the Northern press is wonderful, and would lead one to exclaim with the Jew, 'O Father Abraham, what these Christians are, whose own hard dealings teach them to suspect the very thoughts of others.' What was the state of things to which the Woman Order applied? We were 2,500 men in a city seven miles long, by two to four wide, of 150,000 inhabitants, all hostile, bitter, defiant, explosive, standing literally on a magazine! A spark only needed for destruction. The devil had entered the hearts of the women of this town (you know seven of them chose Mary Magdalen for a residence), to stir up strife in every way possible. Every opprobrious epithet, every insulting gesture, was made by these ho-jewelled, beer-coloured and laced creatures, calling themselves ladies, towards my soldiers and officers, from the windows and houses, and in the streets. How long do you suppose our flesh and blood could have stood this without retort? That would lead to disturbances and riot, from which we must clear the streets with artillery—and then a howl that we had murdered these fine women. I had arrested the men who hurrahed for Beauregard. Could I arrest the women? No. What was to be done? No order could be made save one that could excuse itself. With anxious careful thought I hit upon this: 'Women who insult my soldiers are to be regarded and treated as common women plying their vocation.' Pray how do you treat a common woman plying her vocation in the streets? You pass her by unheeded. She cannot insult you. As a gentleman you can and will take no notice of her. If she speaks, her words are not approbrious. It is only when she becomes a continuous and positive nuisance that you call a watchman and give her in charge to him. But some of the Northern editors seems to think that whenever one meets such a woman one must stop her, talk with her, insult her, or hold dalliance with her, and so, from their own conduct, they construed my order. The editor of the Boston Courier may so deal with common women, and out of the abundance of the heart his mouth may speak; but so do not I. Why, these she-addressers of New Orleans themselves were at once shamed into propriety of conduct by the order, and from that day no woman has either insulted or annoyed any live soldiers or officers, and of a certainty no soldier has insulted any woman. When I passed through Baltimore on the 23rd of February last, members of my staff were insulted by the gestures of the ladies there. Not so in New Orleans. One of the worst possible of all these women showed disrespect to the remains of gallant young De Kay, and you will see her punishment, a copy of the order which I enclose, is at once a vindication and a construction of my order. I can only say that I would issue it again under like circumstances. Again thanking you for your kind interest, I am, truly your friend,

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
Major-General Commanding.

The Herald's correspondent at New Orleans writes as follows on the 30th ult.:—"Lieut. G. C. De Kay, who, it will be remembered, was shot at Grand Gulf, Mississippi, about a month since, died last Friday morning from his wounds. The funeral, which took place on Saturday evening, resulted in a scene so shocking that it is difficult to believe that it occurred in the nineteenth century, among a people who profess to be not only civilized, but christianized. As the cortege moved through the streets, women in the garb of ladies flaunted Secession badges, and mocked and jeered at the poor dead body of a brave boy who, in life, would have scorned to treat even his enemy with dishonour. At Christ Church, where the services were held, the front pews, the aisles, and the gallery were filled with a rabble of negroes, rowdies, and ragged boys, the women showing Secession badges freely. One of the women who scoffed at the remains was the well-known Mrs. Philip Phillips, who, with Mrs. Greenhow, was arrested last summer at Washington for treason, and who, it will be remembered, caused her house to be illuminated from basement to attic on learning of the Union defeat at Bull Run. When the funeral procession passed her in Charles-street, she, with other females, sat on the balcony and laughed and jeered at the sad display in an intentionally offensive manner. On General Butler's return to this city from Baton Rouge, learning of the disgraceful proceedings of the day before, he was greatly enraged, and declared that if he had been here he would have bombarded the church with his artillery. This morning he ordered Mrs. Phillips to be arrested and brought before him. Accompanied by her husband she arrived about noon. General Butler asked her if it was true that she had behaved as above described; she answered in the most flippant and contemptuous manner, 'I was in good spirits that day.' That was enough for the general; he at once issued the following order:—

"Head-quarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, June 30, 1862.

"Mrs. Phillips, wife of Philip Phillips, having been once imprisoned for her traitorous proclivities and acts at Washington, and released by the clemency of the Government, and having been found training her children to spit upon officers of the United States, for which act of one of those children both her husband and herself apologized and were again forgiven, is now found on the balcony of her house during the passage of the funeral procession of Lieutenant De Kay, laughing and mocking at his remains; and upon being inquired of by the commanding general if this fact were so, contemptuously replies, 'I was in good spirits that day.' It is therefore ordered that she be not regarded and treated as a common woman, of whom no officer or soldier is bound to take notice, but as an uncommon, bad, and dangerous woman, stirring up strife and inciting to riot, and that therefore she be confined at Ship Island, in the State of Mississippi, within proper limits there till further orders, and that she be allowed one female servant, and no more, if she so choose. That one of the houses for hospital purposes be assigned her as quarters, and a soldier's ration each day be served out to her, with the means of cooking the same; and that no verbal or written communication be allowed with her except through this office; and that she be kept in close confinement until removed to Ship Island.

"By order of Major-General Butler,
"R. S. DAVIS, Captain and A.A.A. General."

"STONEWALL" JACKSON.—A Baltimore paper publishes the following in reference to the appellation of "Stonewall" being conferred on General Jackson:—

"Messrs. Editors,—I see in your paper, as well as in many Northern journals, a continual reference to the Confederate General Jackson by his well-earned name of 'The Stone Wall.' As many use the title given the General and his renowned brigade without knowing its origin, I ask you to insert the following in the columns of your paper, for the benefit of those who have had no opportunities for learning the circumstances under which the title was first acquired. It was earned on the plains of Manassas, and was given by the lamented General Bee, of South Carolina. His brigade was giving way at one period of the engagement, which circumstance so distressed General Bee, that he exclaimed, with a world of agony in his voice: 'Look! look at my men falling back, while there stands General Jackson and his brigade as firm as a stone wall!' He was shot a moment after, and did not live to see his men rally and share the triumphs of The Stone Wall Brigade.

"This brigade is composed almost entirely of volunteers from the Valley of Virginia.

"A LADY OF THE VALLEY.

"June 16th, 1862."

Numerous inquiries are constantly made as to the derivation of the now famous prenominal of General Thos. J. Jackson, and one of our contemporaries has lately published what purports to be a correct statement of its origin, but which is in fact the Northern version of it.

At the Battle of Bulls Run General Jackson was ordered to hold a position with his brigade near Stone Bridge, which he did so heroically and effectually against repeated attacks, that after the battle was over he was complimented on the field by General Beauregard, who told him that his brigade had stood like a "Stonewall." Since that day he has been known by the name of Stonewall Jackson.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, July 16, 1862.

The troubles in Wall-street are on the increase. Exchange and gold have advanced 2 per cent., and would have risen still more, but for the importers, who, being unused to such figures, and incapable of realizing the emergency, have withheld from purchasing bills on London; they, however, will soon be obliged to enter the markets, as they are largely in debt to Europe. Our exports are about $5,000,000 per month, while our imports are $20,000,000, and the sales of securities, on account of foreign holders, are believed to be $5,000,000; this makes a deficit of $20,000,000 that has to be met by shipments of specie. The silver and copper coins have disappeared from circulation. The masses for the first time are feeling the war, its horrors being seen by the number of maimed persons in the streets. Stocks of all kinds are falling daily, except the securities of a few of the railroads to the West, that have had a temporary increase of traffic by the large business in grain; their shares will now decline. Our people are beginning to appreciate the blessings of a sound currency, and to be aware that promissory notes and bank bills were merely the representatives of value, the former of merchandize and the latter of money; not so, however, with Mr. Chase's issues, they having nothing at their back but "greenness," as if in derision of the verdancy of the community. The machinery of finance in the Northern States, based upon a system of credit, has so far assisted the Secretary of the Treasury in carrying the heavy load of debt; but that system is now breaking down, and there is a general disposition to do business on the cash principle; this is owing to widespread fear. Every person who can do so is hoarding.

The most glaring depreciation is in real estate, which, in the city of New York, was valued, in 1856, at $1,200,000,000; the commercial panic of 1857 reduced it to $900,000,000, and at the present time shrewd appraisers estimate it at $400,000,000, making a total decline of $800,000,000. The enormous investments in mill property in the New England States, and the absence of the raw material to work up, entail a monstrous loss upon the Yankees. The West and the South, being purely agricultural, will suffer comparatively little, nor can a financial crisis appear in the South; their mercantile transactions ceasing for four months every year, has prevented them from adopting the credit system; hence they never had any inflation in their affairs.

The reign of terror is fast subsiding; Mr. Stanton appears timid about issuing more orders. The Peace Party is gaining strength, and daily becoming more bold in its expressions. The war meeting in Union-square was a perfect failure.

HAVANNAH, July 7, 1862.

We have had no direct news; no arrival from New Orleans since the French war-steamer Milan brought us the intelligence of the taking of that city by the Federal forces under General Butler, and of the infamous conduct of that General immediately after his occupation of the city. The Federal pledge, that the port of New Orleans should be open to the commerce of the world, has been intentionally, shamefully violated. The Spanish steamer Cardinas, with passengers and cargo, sailed from this port for New Orleans immediately after the promulgation of the proclamation opening that port, and, by order of General Butler, was quarantined for forty days. The United States' steamer Roanoke sailed from Havannah a few days after the Cardinas, and was permitted to discharge her cargo at New Orleans, and reload, or rather take passengers, and clear for New York, via Key West, without delay. A strict quarantine is imposed on all foreign vessels, while vessels of the United States are permitted to come and go without detention. We get this news, via Key West, from twenty different sources; no vessel will, therefore, leave this port for New Orleans, except those sailing under the United States' flag. Under the pledge of the United States' Government, to open to trade the Southern ports, many millions of dollars' worth of goods have been sent from England, France, and other countries, to Havannah, to be shipped to New Orleans immediately upon raising the blockade, and several vessels have retained their cargoes on board, awaiting the result. All this commerce is fraudulently interrupted, to give to a few favourites of General Butler, and others high in authority, the benefit of first sales and high prices; but even this trick did not avail them, for the people of New Orleans only buy bread and meat sufficient to sustain life from the enemy—ship nothing. Will European Governments longer stand this humbugging?

The cotton at New Orleans, as I remarked in my last letter, was all burned, and none has, and none will be, sent in from the country; the sugar was also destroyed, except about $2,000,000 worth, in the hands of foreigners. It was believed that the rights of neutrals, in their undisputed ownership of property not contraband of war, would be respected by the invaders, and therefore the Confederate generals, in retiring, left this property under the protection of the English, French, and other neutral flags; but General Butler has seized all this sugar, under the absurd pretext that the purchasers of this sugar sold bills of exchange on England and France, and accepted in payment Confederate notes, which they paid out for sugar—thus, as he says, giving aid and comfort to the enemy of the United States' Government. Confederate notes were the chief currency at New Orleans when these sugars were bought, and it could make no possible difference whether the Englishman or Frenchman gave his bill on his house in London or Paris to the planter, or first sold his bill in New Orleans, and paid over the proceeds for the sugar; the seizure of the sugar in either case is an outrage which ought not—we hope will not—be tolerated.

You will see from the Northern papers that the Confederates burned 30,000 bales of cotton on retiring from Memphis. I have certain information that more than double that amount was burned at and near that city, and on the opposite side of the river, in Arkansas. It is now conceded, even by the Northern press, that the Confederates are ready, and will make any sacrifice necessary, either in property or life, to protract the war. That granted, can they be conquered? Never! The first prisoner taken by the Federals was Lewis Washington, grand-nephew of George Washington. All the Washingtons are in arms on the Confederate side—General Lee, now in command at Richmond, wears the sword bequeathed by Washington to Virginia's most gallant son. All the descendants of Jefferson, of Madison, of Monroe, of the thousand Southern worthies whose patriotism and valour first planted the standard of liberty in the New World, are now engaged in this struggle for separation from a people whom they abhor. The first American revolution extended through seven long years, under constant defeat and privations, which our people can never know, and yet in the end the revolutionists were successful, because fighting on their own soil, and in defence of their own homes. The Confederates have never been defeated in any important battle on land. And now the tide of victory has been thrown back upon the invaders—Banks has been defeated—Shields has been whipped—Fremont thrashed—Jackson is marching victoriously towards Maryland, and the Young Napoleon, McClellan, advances backwards from Richmond under daily defeat and mortification—Halleck is swamp-bound, with a sick-list of 20,000. The invincible Beauregard is where he should be, and will soon be heard from.

I refer you to the New York papers for forms of the odious oaths to be forced on the citizens of New Orleans, and leave you to comment upon the attempt to perjure a whole community, and make spics of all foreigners temporarily in the city.

I enclose you a slip from the Leirio de la Manica, of the 4th inst., on the commerce of New Orleans; translate and publish it.

H.

PARIS, July 30, 1862.

The war with Mexico continues to be the topic of great concern and interest. Two fights have taken place between General Lorencez's command and the Mexican army, in which the last were worsted. On June 12, Zaragoza sent a flag of truce to the French commander, urging him to capitulate, "as the best means of getting out of his difficult situation," which was briefly declined, of course. On the next day, it was reported that the Mexicans were marching against Ingenio, a small town three miles from Orizaba. Captain Detrie having been detached with his company (of the 99th of the Line) to oppose them, arrived on the spot at midnight, and hearing that the enemy was encamped a few hundred yards from the town, he attacked at once. They fought until daylight, by which time the Mexicans retired, leaving in the hands of Detrie's men four field-guns and an important amount of stores. The loss on the French side was twenty-three men hors de combat—one man out of four, (Captain Detrie was among the wounded); whilst the enemy had 120 killed, and 135 wounded. Rather warm affair that, considering the small party engaged, on one side at least. On the day following, General Zaragoza came in person to the attack on Ingenio, with 5000 men—but the French had been reinforced to the number of 600, and after a combat which lasted from 3 till 10 o'clock A.M., the Mexicans were compelled to retire, leaving a large number of their dead and wounded on the field.

General Forey and Vice-Admiral Jurien de La Graviere have sailed, under pressing orders of the Secretaries of War and of the Navy. The reason assigned for adding iron-plated ships to the Mexican squadron is, that the Mexicans might have bought one or more "Monitors" the Government at Washington, and our whole fleet from would have been in great danger, without some fighting crafts of the same sort to meet the monsters.

But I have, from reliable authority, another and a different account of the Emperor's object in sending such a large naval force across the Atlantic. That a number of troops should be ordered there, more proportionate to the difficulties which have to be encountered in Mexico than the small force [defending there at present the honour of the Tricolor, has nothing in it to excite comment; but what is the reason for sending six first-class men-of-war, two, and probably three, iron-plated frigates, with the accompanying reglementary number of smaller ships and iron-plated gunboats? Now, it is stated that such a fleet, useless against Mexico, since that country has no navy, is destined to meet the emergencies which may arise elsewhere, and that it may have important work to perform on the American coast.

Some of your readers may have left unnoticed the following, from the able and well-informed Paris correspondent of the Times, writing from here last Sunday:—

I have reason to believe that the American question once more occupies the most serious attention of the Emperor, and that within the last few days it has been before the Council of Ministers. It is again here thoroughly examined and discussed in all its bearings, the fearful carnage, the more fearful from its being without any object—the utter hopelessness of seeing the Union restored—the animosity on both sides acquiring more intensity after defeat or after victory, and the consequence of this unnatural conflict on those who have, with perhaps exaggerated scrupulousness, held aloof from the belligerents. All these considerations have, I repeat, forcibly pressed themselves on the Emperor's mind, and I should not be surprised if they were now laid before the English Government in a still more pressing manner, with a view to a speedy termination. Indeed, that solution, as far as it depends on the recognition of the Southern Confederacy by the European Powers, must be speedy to be effective. The elections to Congress begin, I believe, in August, and will be over in November. If France and England do nothing in the meantime, the same men who sit in the American Legislature will, in all probability, be returned, and the same terrorism be maintained; whereas, if France and England take before then some steps towards recognition, the case might be different. The Government of Washington, with the public opinion of Europe manifesting itself against the continuance of a bloody and a useless struggle, might yield, if not with a good grace, at least without loss of self-respect. If nothing be done people must resign themselves to the spectacle of a tremendous war for an indefinite time, and with the certainty of utter ruin to both parties—not to speak of the consequences to those who have had no hand or part in it. I do not pretend to say whether the present movement will be followed by any immediate effect; whether France will take the lead, with the expectation that England cannot do otherwise than follow; or whether both will act at the same time. I only know that France is convinced that the present moment is most opportune for united action.

The hatred between both parties is becoming more and more intense; and the determination of the South to carry on the war to the last more fierce than ever. The terrors inspired by General Butler do not prevent this hatred from manifesting itself even in New Orleans. In that defenceless city there now remains hardly any but women, children, or aged men. The very children seem to defy and provoke the wrath of the Governor and his troops. Boys of ten or twelve go out into the streets, and with the most irritating epithets invite the Yankee soldiers and officers to come and be measured for their coffins, as Yellow Jack (the yellow fever) is waiting for them; and young girls, finding that the pestilence was too slow in coming, spoke of going somewhere to catch the infection, and returning in order to spread it among the detested invaders.

I am not sure that President Lincoln himself, and some of those of whom he takes counsel, would learn with displeasure that a gentle pressure was likely to be exercised on them; for whatever be the language they held, they are aware of the hopelessness of continuing the struggle.

The above corresponds exactly with my own information, and is so well written that I could not resist giving it to you in full. Peace is signed between France and the Emperor Tu-Duc, on advantageous terms for this country. We have a detailed and touching account of the funeral of Admiral Protet, borne to his place of eternal repose by his companions in arms, both French and English. Indeed, all the European representatives in China, Russian and others, united in the honours rendered to the brave sailor's remains. The Servian question is a knotty one, and the "Conferences" at Constantinople will be followed by the public with earnest attention. Garibaldi has succeeded in obliging the French and Italian Governments to keep a serious watch on the result of the speeches "de cet enfant terrible." A new paper is going to be started in Paris (which is an event here), under the title of La France. It will receive communications from M. de La Guéronnière, which must attract great interest, both as regards the interior and exterior political questions. A Baron Brenier, le Comte de Clary, Mr. Debellyme, are among the "Comité de Surveillance." The printing-press of the Moniteur is now put in motion by an engine of the "Lencoir" system—having for its principle the dilatation of air by the power of electricity. I believe that you have one of Lencoir's apparatus at the London Exhibition. It is considered by competent men as a motive-power of considerable value.

THE DEBATE ON THE WAR IN AMERICA.

MR. LINDSAY'S MOTION.

According to our promise last week, we give below for the use of our readers in the South, a full report of the debate on Mr. Lindsay's motion. The correctness of this report we can ensure, as we have been favoured with revises of their speeches by nearly all the honourable gentlemen who participated in the debate:—

The order of the day for going into Committee of Supply having been read,

Mr. LINDSAY rose, pursuant to notice, and said he wished to call the attention of the House to a matter of great importance—the unhappy war which now raged in the United States. In doing so he felt assured that an expression of opinion on the part of the House on the subject would have an effect contrary to that which some of his hon. friends near him seemed to apprehend. He might add that, in the course of the observations which he was about to make, he would not say one word with reference to the sinking of the stone fleet at Charleston, or the proclamations which had been recently issued by the Federal Generals; but would, on the contrary, confine himself as strictly as possible to the terms of the motion which he had placed on the paper. He begged leave to move, “That, in the opinion of this House, the States which have seceded from the Union of the Republic of the United States have so long maintained themselves under a separate and established Government, and have given such proof of their determination and ability to support their independence, that the propriety of offering mediation with the view of terminating hostilities between the contending parties is worthy of the serious and immediate attention of her Majesty's Government.” He meant to leave out the latter part of the resolution of which he had even notice; but he trusted the other portion of it would receive the sanction of the House. He thought the Confederate States had shown their determination and ability to support their independence. There could be no difference of opinion on that point; but there might be a difference of opinion as to the propriety of our mediation. He would first address himself to the origin of the fearful war now raging on the other side of the Atlantic; he would then touch on the causes of that war; he would then refer to its effects; next, he would show that, as he conceived, the end of that war must be separation; and, lastly, he would endeavour to show how humanity and our own interests demanded that a stop should be put to that war. The hon. gentleman then alluded to the compact formed between the different independent States of the Union for their mutual convenience, the area covered by their territory, and the aggregate population. The trade of the country in 1860 amounted to $350,000,000. Many people were under the impression that disunion was the impulse of the moment. It was not so. It had been working for more than a quarter of a century. The Southern States were dissatisfied with the Union, and had been protesting against the oppressive taxation of the North. On the 20th of December South Carolina gave notice that she desired to withdraw from the compact. He did not argue the question whether South Carolina, or any minority of the States, had a right to withdraw from the compact made for the convenience of all the States; but he could find no clause in the Constitution of the United States which prevented any State from withdrawing when she felt herself aggrieved, and certainly none which vested in the President of the Federal Government a power to coerce those States that did secede. The resolution of South Carolina was formed by the unanimous vote of the Legislature met specially to consider whether it was for the interest of that State to remain in the compact. It was resolved to be for their interest that they should remain by it no longer, and three of their most distinguished citizens were appointed to wait on President Buchanan and his Government, and represent their grievances, state the reasons why they could no longer remain in the Union, and arrange, if possible, the terms of separation. These gentlemen were not received by the Federal President. They drew up a memorial representing their case in respectful but determined language, and sent it to the then Secretary of State: but it was returned to them unanswered. They reported, as the only course left to them, that the Government of Washington was unwilling even to hear their grievances. South Carolina, still anxious to preserve peace, and above all to avoid bloodshed, in the following February sent the Attorney-General to the Government at Washington. He met similar success—he was not received, his letter was returned. Other States seeing how the Federal Government were resolved to treat the representations and complaints of South Carolina, resolved to follow the example of that State and withdraw from the Union. The States of Mississippi, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Texas withdrew, and in March 1861, met in Convention, formed a provisional Government to last one year, and elected Mr. Davis to be President. These seven Confederate States, anxious to avoid a rupture, and above all to avoid bloodshed, deputed three of their citizens to proceed to Washington and represent their grievances to the Government, arrange terms, and settle all questions of disagreement upon principles of right, equity, and good faith. The Commissioners arrived immediately after President Lincoln had been inducted into office, and on March 12, they officially communicated their object to Mr. Seward. No reply was received till the 8th of the following month, when they received a peremptory refusal. President Davis on April 29 sent a message to the Confederate Congress giving a history of that mission, and all the incidents connected with it, which has been recently republished in England. Every hon. member who read that statement must arrive at the conclusion to which he had come, that these three Commissioners were shamefully treated. The message of President Davis clearly showed that at the earnest request of Mr. Seward, and with the view of promoting the peaceful settlement of all difficulties, the Commissioners were induced to forbear pressing for an early answer to their communication. Secondly, it was stated that during the interview the Commissioners were assured that Fort Sumter, commanding the entrance to the port of Charleston, would be evacuated; that no measure which could prejudice the Confederate States was contemplated; that a demand for an immediate answer would be productive of evil; and, lastly, that while these promises were given in the most solemn manner by Mr. Secretary Seward, the Government of the United States was secretly preparing a great naval and military expedition, which had for its object the reinforcement of Fort Sumter, and which actually sailed while the Commissioners were kept at Washington waiting for a peaceful settlement. The knowledge of that expedition reached the Confederate States only two or three days before its actual arrival off Charleston. Then the people of that place rose to a man, and it was not surprising. They saw their appeals for justice, their remonstrances against oppressive taxation, that, in fact, the prayer of 5,500,000 persons—for that was the population of the seven States which had then withdrawn—were to be answered only by the cannon's month. The people of Charleston were then obliged in self-defence to lay hold of Fort Sumter. Soon after that, President Lincoln issued his first proclamation for 75,000 men to subdue what he termed the rebellion of the South. Then it was that North Carolina, Arkansas, Tennessee, Missouri, Kentucky, and Virginia followed the example of the seven first seceding States in rapid succession. As to the causes of the civil war, the suppression of slavery had very little to do with it. If it had, possibly the people of the North would have received more sympathy from the people of this country. During the last Presidential election, the word slavery was used as a mere political cry for party purposes. In his inaugural address, President Lincoln declared:—“I have no intention to interfere, directly or indirectly, in the question of slavery where it exists. I do not think I have the right to do so legally, and I am by no means inclined to do it.” Such was the policy of Mr. Lincoln and the majority of his Cabinet, and they had acted upon it. When General Fremont proclaimed the freedom of the slaves in Missouri, he was immediately recalled from his command. When General Hunter took a similar course in the districts under his control, his conduct was at once disavowed by the Government at Washington. Again, when Mr. Cameron, as Secretary at War, in his report to the President, stated that one object of the war was the suppression of slavery in the South, Mr. Lincoln ordered that clause to be struck out, and the report appeared without it. The Government of Washington would not even admit that the suppression of slavery in the South was one of the objects of this unfortunate war. The opinion of the New York Herald might not be worthy of great consideration, but the proprietor of that journal printed it to sell, and must therefore write so as to suit the taste of his readers. When he was himself at New York, some fifteen months ago, the average circulation of that newspaper was about 120,000 daily. Reviewing very recently the sermons preached on the day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer observed in the Northern States, the New York Herald said that negro slavery was part of the Constitution, and the attempt to abolish it by the Congress or the Executive would be a violation of the Federal compact, and would, moreover, be an imputation on the character of Washington and the other founders of the Republic, who agreed by a solemn league and covenant that the rights of the Southern slaveholders should be guaranteed for ever. The writer disowned entirely that slavery had anything to do with this war, and combated the argument that slavery was a sin. In the North there was not, perhaps, one person out of ten who desired to see it abolished. They should view this question not merely as benevolent, but as practical men. The slaves in the South represented a property estimated at £500,000,000 sterling, and where was the compensation money to come from if they were to be emancipated all at once? Each of the thirty-four States sent two members to the Senate, the smallest State sending two as well as the largest. On the other hand, the number of members returned from each State to the Lower House was entirely regulated by population. The ratio of population had been changed. In 1790, shortly after the Constitution was framed, there was one representative to every 33,000 persons; while in 1850 there was one to every 33,420. For many years past the tide of emigration had set to the Northern and Western States. Thus, in consequence of numbers being the measure of representation in the Lower House, year by year the wealth, the intelligence, and the commerce of the Southern States had been slowly losing their influence in that assembly. The people of the South thus felt that they were saddled with taxation, in the levying of which practically they had no voice. The interests of the North and of the South were diametrically opposite. The South was purely an agricultural country, and its interest was perfect free trade. The supposed interests of the North were in the direction of protection. As the population of the North increased those States began to obtain an ascendancy in Congress, and then for the first time, in 1824, a protective tariff was introduced. In 1828 that tariff was rendered more stringent. As far back as 1833 South Carolina protested against the tariff, and gave notice of her intention to withdraw from the Union. She was induced to remain upon a promise that the tariff should be relaxed; but that promise was not kept, and in 1846 it was made still heavier. In addition to that the Morrill tariff had since increased the duties upon imports to an enormous extent. The exports from the United States, in 1860, amounted to $350,000,000, of which no less than $250,000,000 represented the produce of the South. If it were true that exports must be paid for by imports, the South must either directly or indirectly be bearing an undue proportion of the taxation levied by the Federal Government. But the people of the South also complained that the increasing taxation was not levied for the purposes laid down in the constitution, but for the purpose of encouraging the ironmasters of Pennsylvania and the manufacturers of New England. The evil consequence of that taxation was felt by them in two ways, because, while they were called upon to bear an undue proportion of taxation, they were also obliged to pay an increased price for articles which they required from the North and which they could obtain cheaper and better from Europe. The real causes of the present disruption were taxation without representation, and taxation levied not for the purposes of all the States, but for the benefit of particular States. A very large proportion of the cotton grown in the Southern States found its way to this country, and the stoppage of the supply had created intense suffering here. By the last accounts it appeared that the poor-rate at Preston was 18s. in the pound. At Blackburn there were about 15,000 persons receiving relief, at Preston close upon 12,000 and about 17,000 claimants upon the Relief Fund. The English people were patient and bore their trials quietly, but their patience and endurance must not be tried too far. (Hear, hear.) He believed that the distress was greater than appeared from the accounts in the newspapers; but the people knew what was the cause of their sufferings; they believed that the fighting in America could only result in the permanent separation of the North and South, and they looked to that House to express an opinion and to try whether by mediation or some representation to the contending Powers they might not be induced to reflect, if not upon the injury they were doing to themselves, at least upon the serious injury they were inflicting upon the people of this country. What was to be the end of the war? No one could seriously believe that the South would ever be brought back into the Union. In March last the Confederate Congress solemnly declared the unalterable determination of the people of the Confederate States to suffer all the calamities of a protracted war, but under no circumstances would they again enter into union with those who had invaded their soil and butchered their people. Even if the North could overcome the armies of the South there would be an amount of passive resistance, such as was the case in New Orleans, which it would be impossible to overcome. Such was the unanimous feeling throughout the Confederate States. It was said at one time, “Only let the Union flag be hoisted in any part of the South, and you will see the people rally round it.” But the Union flag had been hoisted at New Orleans and at Beaufort, where an attempt was made to open up a trade, and the people would have nothing to do with it. (Hear, hear.) Re-union was hopeless; and if we had arrived at that conclusion, then it behoved England, in concert, he hoped, with the great Powers of Europe, to offer mediation. He held but one opinion as to this war from the beginning, in proof of which he would read a letter which he wrote when the war broke out, and which had been extensively circulated in the Northern States. The hon. gentleman then read the letter, and proceeded thus:—Independent of his wish to see an end put to the war and the distress in this country brought to a close, he desired to see the South separated from the North in the interest of this country. They all knew that the South would enter into free trade relations with us, and, politically, we had been put to constant trouble, and subjected to constant threats from the United States. (Hear.) Was it really the case that the offer of mediation would be scouted by the North? Men of position, property, and intelligence dared not express an opinion there, because mob law reigned supreme. In proof of how earnestly the mediation of England was desired by the better class of American citizens, he would read part of a letter which he had received from New York only to-day, and which was dated July 4. The writer said:—“Will England hesitate any longer to offer mediation? Why, if she had in the first month of the war forcibly interfered, no greater ill-feeling could have been shown towards her, than has been shown under her magnanimous forbearance. Nor need a war be feared if you recognize the South. . . . Gold is at 10 per cent. premium, silver disappearing, ‘ship plasters,’ or tradersmen's debt tickets, becoming a currency, millions of irredeemable paper constantly issuing by Government, and millions more to come if war continues. . . . What is all this against the stupendous power of England? No, indeed, there can be no war short of England declaring it. . . . Is she afraid for her Northern supplies of bread stuffs? Let her consider that her demand for them is the lifeblood of our agricultural States. They must sell to her. The probable loss of her custom alone would secure her from any danger on our part. We await her action in sad dismay.” (Hear, hear.) Such were the sentiments of the people, and he believed the Government of Washington, seeing the hopeless fix they had got into, would be glad to have some excuse for discontinuing the war. He had received another letter from Brunswick, in the State of Maine, dated also the 4th of this month, in which the writer, a man of strong Union feeling, said he saw now the war was hopeless, and he trusted the Powers of Europe would offer mediation. (Hear, hear.) That gentleman wrote to him not knowing that he had any intention of bringing the subject before the House. Would foreign Powers go with us in this matter? He thought there could be no doubt of it. The Emperor of the French, whose people were suffering from the stoppage of their cotton supplies, was known to be favourable. All that he asked was that the Government, in concert with foreign Powers, should offer mediation. The South, he believed, would be willing to accept it—of course, on the basis of separation; and even the North, he thought, would not be unwilling. Seeing how our own people were suffering from this fratricidal war, he trusted that Her Majesty's Government, either alone or in concert with other great Powers, would use their best efforts to put an end to the terrible struggle which was now raging in America. (Hear, hear.) It appeared strange and unaccountable that Her Majesty's Government had taken no steps in that direction. It was clear that the South could not be conquered, and it was still more clear that it could never be brought back again into the Union. He therefore submitted that the time had arrived when the Southern States ought to be received into the family of nations, and he begged to move “That, in the opinion of this House, the States which have seceded from the Union of the Republic of the United States have so long maintained themselves under a separate and established Government, and have given such proof of their determination and ability to support their independence, that the propriety of offering mediation, with the view of terminating hostilities between the contending parties, is worthy of the serious and immediate attention of Government.” (Hear, hear.)

Mr. TAYLOR said he was not permitted by the rules of the House to move another amendment upon the question that the Speaker leave the chair, but he hoped the House would allow him to give the reasons why, in his opinion, the amendment of the hon. gentleman should be negatived. The amendment had been before the House for some time, and there seemed some probability that the Session would close without its being formally moved. And now that it had been moved he ventured to say that it was not at an auspicious moment. (Cheers.) There was a saying, not very reverential, that Providence fought on the side of the strongest battalions, and 20,000,000 of the North were not likely to be put down by 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 of the South, encumbered by 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 slaves. (Hear, hear.) They had recently been discussing economical doctrines, and the hon. member for Sunderland was one of their staunch supporters. But if the hon. member had voted for every vote for army, navy, and fortifications for Spithead, Portsmouth, and Plymouth, and then, like Oliver Twist, had asked for more, he would have done a far more economical thing than ventilating the subject which he had brought before the House to-night. (Hear.) He regretted that the hon. gentleman had not accepted the advice to withdraw a motion which was without any possible advantage, and without any possible object except adding to the irritation and bitterness felt with regard to our position upon this question. The hon. gentleman said that, from reading the papers, he was inclined to think those feelings could not be worse. But he differed from him; and although he admitted that exaggerated and mistaken opinions prevailed in the North, there was a great deal of ground for their bitterness and irritation. (Loud and repeated cries of “No.”) America had a right to expect that, with our anti-slavery opinions, we should have looked with calmer eyes upon the struggle between the North and South. A certain portion and a not unimportant portion, of the English press had done anything but fairly with the Northern States. No sooner had the South proclaimed secession than these papers denounced the North for entering into war. (Loud cheers.) All the indignation and hostility with regard to America when the Government at Washington was influenced by Southern counsels were transferred to the Northern Government, when the Southern power no longer predominated. He hardly knew whether upon the merits or demerits of the Northern Government this portion of the press was the most bitter. The censure was diverse and inconsistent. First, it was said to be ridiculous for a republic to attempt to go to war, and that it could not have that individuality of power necessary to enable it to strike a blow with effect; but when the Northern States showed that they would put down faction, and even give up individual liberty and the liberty of the press (hear), they were called tyrannical and dictatorial. One day they were told that they could not carry on the war because they could not raise the money, and the next they were told they were extravagant and thriftless in their expenditure. (Hear, hear.) They were denounced because they did not pass tax bills to raise revenue, and when the tax bills were passed and the tariff increased, they were blamed for their bad policy. (Hear, hear.) They were denounced as hypocritical for professing to fight for the slaves, and yet, as soon as they had shown distinctly the direction of their wishes, by prohibiting slavery in the central State of Columbia, they were told that they were not dealing justly with the State rights of the South. The amendment they were now discussing had been once or twice changed, and each time it was more diluted than before; and no doubt the hon. gentleman meant, by mediation, recognition of the South (hear, hear), and intervention in the North. ("No! no!") Intervention was only a longer word for war. Never was so tremendous an issue so easily, so lightly, and with so slight a recognition of its importance, raised, as had been this issue by the hon. member. (Hear.) War without bloodshed and suffering was impossible; but why must we run into it? Did experience teach us no lessons? There was the war with Russia, and who would say that game was worth its cost? (Hear, hear.) There was the intervention in Mexico, the only good step in which was when we stepped out of it. (Hear, hear.) There was immediate danger of war with China, yet all these wars would be petty and insignificant if compared with a war between us and the United States of America. (Hear, hear.) No war in the century would be a parallel for such a terrible conflict. It would be a fratricidal war, almost as truly as that which was being fought between the South and North—a war which would strike terror into all the friends of progress and liberty, and be rejoiced at by all who were their foes. (Cheers.) At the beginning of the last century there was an intervention in the interest of order. It would be like it, only it would be in the interest of rebellion. It was said, then, that they were to surround the scorpion of revolution with a circle of fire, that it might sting itself to death. The metaphor was bad. It was like battering down a volcano, which burst forth with more resistless power, and overran the greater part of Europe. We were compelled to fight almost for existence. It saddled us with the interest of hundreds of millions of debt, and it left a legacy of antagonism and hatred which seventy years had not been sufficient to expiate. (Hear, hear.) He denied that the working-classes of this country entertained the opinions which the hon. gentleman imputed to them. At a meeting at Blackburn a resolution in the opposite sense was carried by the working men almost unanimously. (Hear, hear.) He thought the attitude of the working classes in Lancashire one of the finest character ever exhibited in the history of this country. (Hear.) Suffering from something beyond their own action and control, and seeing their little savings gradually decreasing, with no hope for the future except that which was created by the confidence that their countrymen would accept between them and want, they still declined to stand interference in the American quarrel. It was a magnificent spectacle of patience and intelligence, when these people were seen ready to bear their sufferings, because they felt, even if a supply of cotton should be the result of intervention, that that intervention would involve a sin and produce a stain on the anti-slavery flag of England. (Cries of "No.") There might occasionally be advantages in intervention, when, for instance, by some unfortunate misunderstanding, two nations had got into a quarrel. Then there might occur an opportunity for some judicious friend from without to put a constraint and force on them to compel them to do that which was for their own good. But the present strife in America was no such unexpected event, and it was one of the greatest reflections on all who had a deep interest in cotton—both on the men of Manchester and on the Government—that knowing that for such an essential article the English manufacturers were dependent on only one country, and that a country where slave labour prevailed, they did not long before take steps to enlarge the area of supply. For the present conflict in America the South had been preparing for many years past, and the thinkers of the North had been expecting it. This was no casual strife. It was the Nemesis of that system of slavery which condemned to chattelism 4,000,000 of human beings, and which, taken in connection with the civilization prevailing beyond its pale, might be described as the wickedest and most infernal system the world had ever seen. (Hear, hear.) This war might have occurred later, or it might have come on ten years sooner, but it was in itself inevitable. The history of the United States for many years past had exhibited one long attempt to postpone and put off this inevitable struggle. It was said that the Northern Americans cared nothing about slavery, and that the present war did not originate out of any feeling on that subject. That was true (hear), but the issue depending on it was not the less slavery or no slavery. (Hear, hear.) The whole legislation of the United States for many years past showed attempts to postpone this strife by concessions. At first the freedom of the citizens of the North was degraded by giving to the Southern States their three-fifth black vote, and at last was passed that most infamous measure—the Fugitive Slave Bill. Let not Englishmen suppose that that was only a small sacrifice for the Northerners to make; let them only think what the citizens of the Old Bay State must feel when they saw its boundaries invaded by hellhounds from the South. There was a point, however, beyond which the Northerners would not go in the way of concession. They would not allow the action of slavery to be extended over all the States of America and into the new territories. The South demanded this, and the answer was the election of old Abraham Lincoln, rugged, simple, and indomitable, whose name would live after that of many a smooth and polished statesman was forgotten. That was the answer of the North, and the sword was drawn. Under these circumstances, he thought that intervention would be simply useless. If, by their own power, or by assistance from this country, the Southerners should be made independent, there would then be merely an armed truce, and each side would wait for a favourable moment for renewing the war. The question was one in which this country had no right to interfere, and it appeared to be an inconsistency that a nation, which had spent millions to emancipate her own slaves, should be discussing in Parliament whether an endeavour should not be made to establish the independence of a set of States based solely on the principles of human servitude. Mr. J. S. Mill had said,—"After our people by their cold disapprobation, and our press by its invective, had combined with their own difficulties to damp the spirit of the Free States, and drive them to submit and make peace, we should have to fight the Slave States ourselves at far greater disadvantages, when we should no longer have the wearied and exhausted North for an ally. The time might come when the barbarous and barbarizing Power, which we by our moral support had helped into existence, would require a general crusade of civilized Europe, to extinguish the mischief which it had allowed, and we had aided, to rise up in the midst of our civilization." In conclusion, he expressed a hope that the motion of the hon. member for Sunderland, which, if successful, would do no credit to England, and could not but be considered an insult by America, would be met by an indignant and almost unanimous rejection. (Hear.)

LORD A. VANE TEMPEST thought that the tone taken by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down was hardly justified by the speech of the hon. member for Sunderland. (Hear, hear.) He should not have ventured to put a motion on the paper himself had he not believed that the motions of which notice had been given by the hon. members for Sunderland and Clitheroe had been withdrawn, and that the House was about to separate without expressing an opinion on this momentous subject, which was the chief subject of conversation in every circle out of doors, from the highest to the lowest. It was not for the dignity of the House, whose highest boast was to be the reflex of public opinion, that it should remain silent as to the course which the Government ought to take. Out of doors the question was discussed with varying sympathies for one side or the other, but there was almost an unanimous agreement that the time had come when this awful struggle, if possible, should be put an end to. The hon. member for Leicester had attempted to represent this question as one of continued slavery or abolition. He claimed to have as deep a feeling against slavery as the hon. member, but it was his firm conviction that the course advocated by the hon. member for Sunderland would go farther towards the abolition of slavery than any other measure. (Hear, hear.) In his speech at Manchester, the Chancellor of the Exchequer truly stated that the Northern Government had offered to the Southern Confederation every possible security which they could ask—they offered the Fugitive Slave Law and every other concession which could be required; but the Southern Government returned for their answer, "If you sent us a blank piece of paper and told us to fill it up with our own conditions, we would decline to go back into your Union." The meeting, too, which had recently taken place at New York, ought to teach the hon. member a lesson. It was attended by the leaders of the great Democratic party, who were carrying on the war, and without whom it could not be carried on, and one of the resolutions they passed was, that the two great causes militating against the Union were Secession and Abolitionism. The party pledged itself equally against secession and abolition. He could hardly have thought that any hon. member would have thrown such a colouring over the question as that which had been given to it by the hon. member for Leicester; but, unless it was stripped of all that prejudice which was created by representing the cause of the North as the cause of the negro, it was impossible to discuss the question with any advantage. (Hear, hear.) He was firmly convinced that the maintenance of the Union would go further to perpetuate slavery than anything else. The establishment of a Southern Confederacy would, to a certainty, be followed by an amelioration of the condition of the slave, and, eventually, by a general manumission. It was the efforts of the small Abolition party in the North, whose advocate the hon. member was on this occasion, which had delayed those ameliorations. (Hear, hear.) The cause of the negro would be more advanced by the success of the South than by any other event. The question now before the House might be divided into two parts—whether interference should take place; and if so, what that interference should be. He might be inclined to agree in the views expressed in the amendment of the hon. member for Bradford in favour of the continuance of non-intervention, if it were not for our peculiar position towards America. We were not in the position of being totally indifferent in the matter—we had a locus standi in the shape of 5,000,000 of people. (Hear, hear.) He concurred fully in all that had been said of the magnificent courage which had been displayed by our distressed population. (Hear, hear.) Thousands and thousands had been thrown out of employment, and their little hordes, the fruits of their hard labour and economy, were dribbling fast away day by day; but would they continue to bear their privations with the same firmness—nay, more, ought the House to entail them upon them if they could possibly be avoided? (Hear.) This was a question of principle as well as of interest, and he would ask did not this country inherit responsibility as well as greatness? Had we not a duty to perform to Europe, and ought we not to come forward and state what our views were on this subject, even if we went no further? Two or three weeks ago he read in the New York journals that there would have been reason for our interference some time ago. We might have urged that it was necessary in the interests of our own population, but now no such interference would be justifiable, because the Federal Government had all the cotton ports in their possession. This was not true, for Savannah, Mobile, and Charleston still resisted the Federal arms; but even if the North held the cotton ports, our interference ought to be grounded, not upon cotton, but upon conscience and Christianity. Two reasons might be urged against our interference—one being the chance that the North would be successful, and the other the necessity of maintaining friendly relations with the North. But what were the chances that the North would restore the Union? Could any one doubt that the restoration of the Union was an utter fallacy? (Hear, hear.) Look at the position of affairs. For sixteen months the South had successfully kept at bay the North, though the latter were backed by all the resources of Europe. The Southern capital was intact, and he had received a letter partially corroborating the news announced to-night, and stating that the Northern troops had been worsted near Richmond, and were retreating. It had been proved that the Federal forces, when they were once taken from the seaboard and from the support of their gunboats in the river, could make no way at all. (Hear, hear.) The war surprised the South without a navy or an army. Theirs was an agricultural population; they had no manufactures of their own, and they had had to improvise everything. Yet now, after an interval of sixteen months, they gallantly held their own. The fact was that you could not beat such a people—for this reason, that they were fighting for freedom. It was the old tale—

"For Freedom's battle, once begun, Bequeathed from bleeding sire to son,
Though baffled oft, is ever won."

But, allowing that the South was overcome, how were the North to hold it when, by the confession of one of their own statesmen, it would take 200,000 men to hold Kentucky and it now took 70,000 to hold Maryland? (Hear, hear.) Was it wished to realize the success of the Tyrant of Old—

"To make a solitude and call it peace!"

and by a war of extermination—for success could be attained by no other result—to hold the Southern States? Why were we to exercise this unnatural magnanimity in keeping the lists open for a contest in which all our sympathies should be with the South? (Hear, hear.) If this were the case of a king trying to subdue his rebellious subjects, how the hon. member for Bradford and his party would exclaim! "The freedom of the people is at stake," they would say. Well, but he had this pull over the hon. member. When a sovereign had subdued his rebellious subjects, he resumed the government as before. But how could the Federalists henceforth govern the South? Not upon the principle which they professed—the will of the people. (Hear, hear.) Twenty millions of people were trying to impose their rule upon 8,000,000, who, whether rightly or wrongly, detested it, and they were trying to do this by means of an army of which three-fifths were mercenaries. (Hear, hear.) There was another point noticed in the newspapers, and corroborated by his private letters. Were we to hold aloof while the Northern Government enlisted 40,000 blacks in order to assist in imposing their rule upon 8,000,000 whites? (Hear, hear.) As to the chances of our remaining upon friendly terms with the Northern Government, they were very slight. On almost every occasion that Government had opposed, thwarted, and insulted us. (Hear, hear.) Instances of this abundance. Upon no occasion had they shown the slightest consideration towards us, and it was truly remarked by a writer upon this point that the course taken by the American Government during the war with Russia was dictated not by sympathy with Russia, but by hatred of England. (Hear, hear.) What could be done in the face of the extreme wilfulness and hostility of this very wayward child? All our forbearance had not produced on her part an atom of good-will or one bit of respect. When the noble lord at the head of the Government declared that General Butler's proclamation was an infamous one—an opinion which would be endorsed by every member in that House—the American newspapers said that the Mississippi was not the Thames, that New Orleans was not London, and that when they got the opportunity they would whip the old country until she knew how to behave herself. (Laughter.) We might well laugh at all this, but what were the practical proofs given of the hostility of the North towards us? Why, the prohibitive tariff lately adopted. In several towns in the Northern States placards were posted outside the shops setting forth that no English goods were sold there; and was that, he would ask, a country in favour of which any extraordinary sympathy ought to be shown by the English people? On the other hand, the inhabitants of the Southern States were by interest and necessity freetraders, who, if they were let alone, would be glad to exchange for our manufactured goods their raw material. He had been asked by a member of the Confederate Government, "How is it that you in England do not assist us? We are not a manufacturing people, and never mean to be a shipholding nation. We should therefore look to England to be our workshop and our corner." Contrast this policy with that of the Northern Government. He would, however, discard the notion of self-interest from the consideration of the question as sordid, and would ask whether it required any great stretch of imagination on the part of the hon. member for Bradford and those who supported his views in reference to the struggle going on in America to realize the feelings of those men in the South who saw their friends and relatives hung, or run the risk of being so, because they happened not to show respect to a flag which they abhorred, and the women around them outraged because they did not treat with what was deemed the requisite civility a soldiery they detested. (Hear.) The cause of the South, he might add, was that of 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 of people struggling manfully for their independence, and maintaining bravely their position for a period of sixteen months. Was it surprising that under those circumstances they should think they had a claim to the sympathy and good offices of the nations of Europe? (Hear, hear.) Why not, he would ask, adopt in their case the principle on which we had hitherto so constantly acted—that of acknowledging Governments de facto, and not interfering with the will of a people, as was done in the case of the Provisional Government in Greece, in the case of Belgium and Italy? The principle was one, he might further say, which was not new to America herself, for in 1848 Mr. Buchanan, in writing to the American envoy in Paris, stated that, "in its acknowledgment of foreign nations, the Government of the United States has, from its origin, always recognized de facto Governments, and the right of all nations to create or reform their political institutions according to their own will and pleasure." (Hear.) "It is sufficient for us to know," he added, "that a Government exists capable of maintaining itself; then our recognition immediately follows." (Hear, hear.) That was the enunciation of a policy which he thought might justify our recognition of the Southern States. (Hear, hear.) Now, he held in his hand a letter in which the writer said, "If you wish to pay off all your small debts to the North let them alone, and, like the two Kilkenny cats, they will do the work for themselves." He would not detain the House by reading the rest of the letter. He must, however, observe, before he sat down, with respect to the question of mediation, that he did not think pur et simple mediation would be found to be worth much unless it was to be followed in the event of rejection by ulterior measures; while, with reference to the recognition of the Southern States, which might be regarded as an act of civility on the part of one country towards another, he did not think that it ought of necessity to be regarded as a casus belli by the North. It might, on the other hand, possibly entail on us complications which, on account of a merely complimentary proceeding, it might not be worth while to encounter. The question still remained what course we ought to take. The time was, he thought, arrived when this country ought, either by itself or in conjunction with the other Powers of Europe, to interfere with the view of putting a stop in some way to a most deplorable struggle. There were many in the North who, he had no doubt, would welcome such interference, properly conducted. The time had come when a resolution should be adopted by that House pledging itself to assist Her Majesty, either alone or in conjunction with other European Powers, in endeavouring to put a stop to the frightful and purposeless war in America. Such a policy, if carried out with honesty, firmly, and with singleness of purpose, might obtain a benediction from above, and we might hope for it that blessing promised to the peacemakers upon earth. (Hear, hear.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said the noble lord had asked him a variety of questions as to what the Northern Government would, could, might, or should do in certain contingencies. He begged to assure the noble lord and the House that he did not stand there as the advocate or mouthpiece of the Northern Government. He looked at the question purely from an English point of view. No man more deeply deplored than himself the evils caused by the war, both here and in America, and no prepossession in favour of either party would prevent him from supporting any feasible mode of putting an end to them. He believed, however, that the motion of the hon.

Continued on page 219.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JULY 31, 1862.

A Word with our Readers.

WITH this number THE INDEX commences the second quarter of its youthful career. Thanks to the leniency with which an indulgent public has judged of its numerous shortcomings, and the earnest and cordial support which has rallied around it, THE INDEX—three months ago considered a rash experiment—has become an established member of the London Press. In almost every part of the civilized world, wherever the struggling nation across the Atlantic has friends, THE INDEX has found readers; and it is for the purpose of expressing our grateful sense of the many obligations under which we have been thus laid, as well as to tender an apology which we feel due, that we now transgress journalistic etiquette so far as to speak of ourselves.

The past three months form the most important period of the second American War of Independence—the period from the fall of New Orleans to the full comprehension in Europe of the extent of General McClellan's disasters before Richmond—a period beginning with the greatest reverse sustained by the Confederate arms, and ending with the greatest triumph they have yet achieved. During a period so crowded with great events and so pregnant with great results, our duty, as the index of Southern views, Southern hopes, and Southern policy, was plainly marked out. We could turn neither to the right nor to the left, however tempting might be the side-paths along our way, and we must of needs be what can justly be charged upon us as our greatest fault—a paper of one idea. The claims of the Confederate States, amid evil as amid good fortune, to recognition as a member of the family of nations, the effect of such a recognition upon the progress and the duration of the war—this was the twofold theme upon which our eye must be unswervingly fixed, upon which our efforts undivided must be expended, and to which, had we had twice our space at command, we should have felt bound to devote it all. Whatever had no direct bearing upon this all-absorbing theme had to be rejected from our columns; and until this object is attained, the same course will in a great measure continue, not a matter of choice, but rather of necessity.

With the recognition of the Confederate States, and the lasting peace which we honestly believe to be the speedy and certain consequence of that recognition, a new and broader field of usefulness will open to us. We shall then address, besides our own public in Europe, a much larger Transatlantic audience, and an audience composed of those classes upon whom devolves the duty of shaping the peaceful destinies of the Southern people as a nation. As we have endeavoured, and shall continue to endeavour, to be the faithful index of Southern views and opinions to Europe, so we shall endeavour to be the truthful index to the South of European opinions and views. It will then become not only a pleasure but a duty to adorn and enrich our columns with the flowers and fruits of the ever-blossoming, ever-ripening intellectual activity of the Old World. The task of making Europe known to the South is not so urgent nor so difficult as that of making the South known to Europe; but it nevertheless affords scope for much painstaking and well-bestowed labour, and is worthy of an honest effort. The mutual interests of Great Britain and of the South extend to almost every subject of national policy in peace and in war. Indeed, from our point of view, we find it impossible to discover a single subject on which the interest of one nation, if rightly understood, clashes, or can ever clash, with that of the other. It cannot, therefore, be difficult to combine, as we have heretofore done, Southern with English pens in the exposition of the interests of both. But in whatever emergency the future brings forth, THE INDEX will never be found hostile or untrue to the country on whose soil it is established, and whose nationality it is proud to claim.

The Position of the Belligerents.

THE seven days' fight occupies a foremost place in the list of the world's great battles, on account of the numbers engaged, the tremendous slaughter, the complete defeat of the Northern army, and the quantity of artillery and stores captured; but it is yet more memorable with respect to its results. General McClellan's discomfiture has caused the withdrawal of General Burnside's forces from North Carolina, and General Hunter's forces from Georgia; so that the costly Federal operations on the Atlantic seaboard are fruitless, by reason of the Confederate triumph in Virginia. With a single blow, the South has shattered the main army of the North, and loosed the hold of the invader upon other States. To comprehend the completeness of the collapse consequent upon the "strategic movement" of the Northern commander, we must consider the present Federal situation in Virginia. Although other States have been abandoned to reinforce him, General McClellan can do nothing but prepare for defence against another attack. He reports that the Confederates are falling back, yet he does not advance. With the enemy in his front and rear, he is literally besieged. His panting army is being decimated with sickness. He asks for more men, but the Government cannot comply with his urgent demands. The people in the North have no disposition, even if they had the means, to replace the immense army, 220,000 strong, equipped and furnished in the most efficient manner, which he boastfully led forth from Washington, and which, under his command, and by means of his strategy, is demoralized and prostrated, and by defeat, death, sickness, and other casualties reduced to 70,000 men. Nor are the Federal prospects in the rest of Virginia any brighter. As yet General Pope has done nothing but compose an infamously mendacious proclamation about the doings of the army in the West. The reported re-appearance of General "Stonewall" Jackson, in the Shenandoah Valley, and his probable advance on Harper's Ferry, may be true, or else originate in the fear of the panic-stricken and bewildered Federals; but the removal of stores from Winchester, and the proposal to abandon that place, manifest the conscious weakness of the invaders in that quarter of the State in which, to maintain a footing, the North is using its utmost energy and resources. Such is the aspect in the East; let us glance at the situation in the West.

The uprising in Kentucky is co-extensive with the State. At the commencement of the war the North admitted that an army of 100,000 men was necessary to preserve Kentucky to the Union; but after such evidence of the resolution of the Kentuckians to throw off the Federal yoke, even that force would be altogether inadequate to subjugate this highly-important and powerful State. The demonstrations may be fairly considered as the accomplishment of the secession of Kentucky, and its virtual adhesion to the Confederacy, to which it is naturally linked by geographical position and interest. The Confederate plan in Kentucky has been well devised and carefully matured, as well as vigorously executed. The Confederates are in considerable force in the neighbourhood of Frankfort, the State capital, and threaten an attack on Lexington; but the most important operations are on the banks of the Ohio. Henderson has been captured, and preparations were being made for attacking Louisville and Covington. These three places are distant from each other, but they have this connection, that they are the termini of the railroads that, via Kentucky, connect Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, with Nashville, in Tennessee. Cynthiana, which the Confederates have captured, is on the railroad between Covington and Lexington. The strategic importance of these movements is that the army under General Halleck is by them cut off from its main communication with the North. And not only from Kentucky, but in every direction, the Southern forces are closing in upon Halleck. The Confederates have just shown their power in Missouri, by the capture of two towns; and General Curtis has been driven out of Arkansas. Thus General Halleck is surrounded by the enemy, and he is pressed on every side. Nashville, a city noted for its loyalty to the Confederacy, is anticipating immediate deliverance from the Federal yoke. General Beanregard is reported at the head of 60,000 men, and there are "mysterious Confederate movements" about Corinth. General Halleck got into Tennessee by the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers, but at this season the waters have too far subsided to withdraw his army by the same route. Completely surrounded, his position must be untenable, and the only retreat he has is to fall back on the banks of the Mississippi, and seek the protection of the gunboats.

The capture of Baton Rouge is fully confirmed. Vicksburg still holds out, and a Confederate ram has, according to Northern accounts, inflicted considerable damage on the attacking fleet, and anchored under the Vicksburg batteries. We may be sure that "considerable damage" means, at least, a Federal reverse. Mobile, that was to have been taken two months ago, is no longer the object of attack. New Orleans, captured, by the way, on account of an unusual rise of the waters, which swept away the Confederate obstructions and filled the rifle pits, is, though under the despotic rule of the infamous Butler, still defiantly opposed to the invader. According to the Northern programme, by the 4th of this present July, Secession was to have been so far crushed out, that it was only to have maintained itself in isolated positions; whereas, this arrogant expectation has been singularly disappointed, and the Northern invasion has been so far crushed, that it only maintains itself in isolated positions.

The capture of Newburg, in Indiana—a place opposite to Henderson, in Kentucky—shows that the North is as vulnerable to the Confederates as the South is to the Federals. For a year and a half the Confederates have acted strictly on the defensive, but it seems that the time has now arrived when they are about to manifest their power by making inroads on Northern territory. Probably, after capturing Newburg the Confederates recrossed the Ohio, but the enterprise is a practical endorsement of the warning contained in the address of President Davis to the army, that if the Federals persisted in their unrighteous invasion the South would make reprisals. Having regard to this, the Governor of Ohio has called out the militia to defend the State against anticipated attacks. The necessity of the States looking to their individual protection will present another obstacle to recruiting the Federal army. Excepting the fanatical partisans of the North no one ever believed in the possibility of the North subjugating the South; but the most sanguine friend of the Confederate States must be surprised, as well as gratified, at the little result achieved by the Federals, despite their enormous levies, and their unprecedented lavish expenditure. And if the United States could effect so little with its resources unimpaired, what are its prospects of conquest, when in a moment of great emergency even heavy bounties cannot induce its citizens to enter the army, and when it is in the throes of a financial crisis, portending not only national bankruptcy, but the permanent commercial and industrial exhaustion of the country?

The Decisive Moment.

ALTHOUGH the news from America still breathes slaughter, desolation, and the continued growth of bitter enmity—although we hear of unrelenting determination to persevere in the deadly struggle—there is a very general impression that the termination of the war is not far distant. Europe has such a deep and absorbing interest in the cessation of hostilities that, to some extent, the wish is father to the thought; for no one can survey the state of affairs carefully and dispassionately without arriving at the conclusion that there is no prospect of the advent of peace unless the European Powers take action. We know that the North is financially exhausted and ruined; but, ere this, nations suffering from a financial collapse have been able to carry on long and costly wars. The Northern people show an indisposition to recruit the army, but conscripts may replace volunteers. True, to all reasonable men, the hopelessness of the contest is manifest, but, unhappily, the voice of reason is drowned in the din of war. We grant that for the North to continue the war is sheer madness, for a few more campaigns such as the past would add to the ruin of trade and industry that national prostration and exhaustion from which it takes generations to recover. But, on the other hand, we must remember that, though the prolongation of the warfare is evidently fraught with such incalculable disasters, yet peace will not trammel up the consequences of the past, or afford an immediate relief from national insolvency and from the anarchy engendered by the substitution of military despotism for constitutional government. Still, we firmly believe that just now the people of the North are inclined to sheathe the sword; whilst we are not less convinced that this pacific disposition will not long prevail, and that it cannot lead to the devoutly-desired consummation unless the great Powers of Europe seize the favourable moment for making such a demonstration as may give encouragement and consistency to peaceful counsels. And such a demonstration would not only be politic and humane, but is a solemn and bounden duty.

Suppose this war, through the non-interference of Europe, goes on for two or more years, we submit the people of the North will be justified in reproaching us for our apathy, and for the violation of a duty imposed upon us by humanity, civilization, and Christianity, as well as by international custom, that is, the lex non scripta of nations. Why are we to expect the people of the United States to humble themselves unnecessarily, and in a manner and degree unprecedented? Let us recall the position of belligerents, or rather, regard it in its Northern aspect. We must forget the legal and constitutional justification of Secession. In word and deed the United States has declared the Confederate States to be an insurgent and rebellious Power, and that Secession is but another name for revolution. Whenever peace is made, the North will have to concede what it has been pleased to call its right. Now, how can we ask or expect such a concession to be voluntarily made? Why should we expect the United States to be the first to acknowledge the independence of, as they designate them, their revolted provinces? Did Europe refuse to recognize the Kingdom of Italy, because such recognition was withheld by Austria and the Papal Government? Was Great Britain the first to recognize the independence of her revolted colonies? Was not the independence of Belgium acknowledged by all Europe before it was admitted by Holland? Was not Spain the last to recognize the independence of the Netherlands? We need not multiply instances, but we may remark that history does not record a case of the independence of a new nation being first recognized by the nation from which it had first separated or revolted. We have heard much about giving the United States the opportunity of saying that the disruption of the Union was accomplished by foreign intervention. But we cannot understand the objection to giving the North a fair excuse for an inevitable act that, at best, cannot fail to wound the national pride. Why should the United States despair of the restoration of the Union so long as foreign Powers, by refusing to recognize the Confederate States, declare that they do not think the task is hopeless. The recognition of the South by Europe must precede its recognition by the North, and unless Europe acts at once the war will probably be continued for at least two years, except the South is conquered, or the North displays more wisdom than has ever been evinced by other nations.

The people of the United States will within the next few months be called upon to decide for peace or war. The present Congress expires on March 3, 1863, and the whole of the House of Representatives and one-third of the Senate will have to be chosen, but the complexion of the new Congress will be determined before the new year. During the present fall the constituencies will, through the ballot-box, prescribe the official conduct of their representatives in Congress. From August till the end of the year there are state elections in nearly every State of the Federal Union, and the State Legislatures will have to elect one-third of the Upper House of the next Congress. Nine Governors of States will have to be chosen this year, including the Governors of New York, New Jersey, and Vermont; and the election of state officers is always an expression of public opinion, and exercises an indirect, yet powerful influence over the government of the country; but the state elections from August to the end of the present year will decide the policy of the United States' Congress for two years. If the House of Representatives and the re-elected or new members of the Senate are chosen to carry out a war policy the war will be continued; or if a Congress is chosen pledged to a pacific policy peace will ensue. Under such circumstances, there can be no doubt that the decisive moment for recognition, or for an unmistakable intimation, has arrived. If Europe does not now manifest a determination to acknowledge Southern independence, we cannot hope that the next Congress will be pacifically inclined, since its character depends upon the opinions of the electors, and, as we have shown, and we think conclusively, the people of the United States cannot and will not be the first to recognize the independence of the Confederacy.

The great Powers of Europe are, of course, bound to consider, as far as possible, the ultra-sensitiveness of the people of the North, and therefore the utmost diplomatic skill ought to be used to prevent offence. A most respectful representation might be made to the Washington Government as to the reasons that make recognition a duty, and the subsequent or accompanying offer of mediation an act of courtesy as well as humanity; whilst, simultaneously, it might be privately but definitively stated that the rejection of good offices would not postpone recognition. There might be a great show of indignation, but we believe that the North would be secretly and heartily glad, in its present mood, of such a fair chance of being morally forced to abandon a futile and disastrous war. At all events, even if it caused a momentary irritation between the United States and England and France, it would prevent the next Congress being pledged to the continuance of the war at all hazards. The people of the North would perceive the impossibility of conquering the South, when that impossibility had been endorsed by the recognition of Europe, and their representatives would be instructed not to persevere in a hopeless and ruinous enterprise.

Financial Prospects.

THE present very low rates for money gives rise to the question, how long will they continue at a minimum point? The accepted reason for such small interest is the general contraction of trade caused by the temporary dethronement of the leading article of commerce—American cotton. With a restoration of peace in America, there must necessarily be an advance in the discount market, as the mercantile affairs of the world would then assume their usual magnitude.

All past experience teaches that when a new trade is opened to the enterprise of the business community, money becomes scarce in consequence of the additional quantity of bills created to carry on the fresh transactions. Will not this be so when the ports of the Confederate States shall be rid of the blockading squadron? Should hostilities cease in America the Southerners will require, between this and next June, at least $100,000,000 worth of European manufactures, notwithstanding the habits of economy acquired by them during a struggle of eighteen months in defence of their firesides; a large portion of this amount will consist of the cargoes of sailing vessels, and hence it will be a long while before the value of the same can be returned to this side of the Atlantic. While these shipments are bound to the westward, a stream of Southern products will be started to the eastward; and as all raw materials are sold for cash, British sovereigns will find their way to the Confederate States to pay for the purchases. At a fair valuation, and after making every allowance for the destruction of the crops, the South will have to spare within the period named, about $350,000,000 worth of produce; the balance of trade the first year will, therefore, be very much in her favour, and must tell greatly upon Lombard Street. Of course, such a state of affairs will induce extensive enterprises to be inaugurated in the Confederacy, and the specie will in time flow back to the financial centres, after having been subjected to double freights, double insurances, and loss of interest, to say nothing of the temporary panic that may arise during the period of transition. In the history of commerce there is no parallel case to this, and probably, by a little financial skill, some arrangement may be effected by which the disorder can be avoided.

The legislation of the Southern States dictates "free trade" with all the world except the Northern States, and their commerce must therefore be Transatlantic, and not inland. Indeed, the North is so short of goods, that they have none to spare. A field for mercantile energy presents itself now, in comparison with which the trade of California and Australia sinks into insignificance. The return of peace in America will give the manufacturers of Europe 12,000,000 customers, and at the same time supply the wants of Christendom with two years' products. It is idle, however, to suppose that prices for Southern staples can be very low for some months; they will come forward but gradually; for the first time since the origin of the American cotton trade the demand for manufactured goods will be ahead of the supply of the raw material, and until 2,000,000 of bales shall have reached Liverpool, normal prices cannot rule. It must be borne in mind that it takes sixty days for a bale of cotton to be landed at Liverpool, and reshipped in the manufactured state.

It has been said that the soil of England is money, and her crop interest; she is, then, a heavy loser by the low rates of discount, which are correctly attributed to the blockade of the Southern ports of America. The usual annual importations of cotton into this country are 80 per cent. of American, and 20 per cent. of other sorts; the exportation being principally of Surats, leaves 85 per cent. to be used in manufactures; and it is a fact that while the goods shipped to India are mostly made from the Southern staple, a large portion of the exports to America—hosiery—consists of Eastern cotton; a double trade is thereby created. There is no article of commerce that passes through so many hands as cotton; from the time a bale is opened, until it reaches the papermaker and then the printer, the first fabric made from it, having been long deserted by the wearer, the profits of labour, of merchandizing, interest, commission, insurance, freight, and other items, are estimated at five or six times the original value. England has, therefore, lost, directly and indirectly, by the troubles in America over £100,000,000 sterling; this stupendous amount is not yet felt, but will be soon seen in the balance sheets of her people.

While on the subject of monetary affairs between Europe and the Confederate States, we desire to make a few suggestions in reference to the mode of calculating exchange, and in this connection we introduce a proposition in regard to coinage which we hope will receive the consideration of the Confederate Government. The people of the South, unlike their late allies of the North, having always been students of political economy, it is reasonable to suppose that when the fortunes of war permit them to open a direct trade with Europe, they will be ready to adopt measures that will simplify the financial and commercial arrangements between the two continents. The false manner in which exchange on London has been computed in the United States has given rise to the belief in the minds of the masses of the North that the balance of trade was ever against America, when the truth is that the quotations for sterling have been as frequently below 9 per cent.—the actual par—as above that premium. Why not, then, make the par of exchange four dollars, eighty-four cents, and forty-four mills to the pound, instead of the old colonial, but now fictitious, valuation of four dollars, forty-four cents, and forty-four mills? For many years the real value of the sovereign in America was four dollars and eighty cents; but in 1834, when the politicians debased the standard for gold, in order, as they thought, “to keep it from leaving the country,” that coin became worth the amount first stated. Prior to the establishment of the United States’ mint, there was great irregularity in the description of money in America; most of the transactions were conducted in pounds, shillings, and pence, the value of which varied in the different States; thus, “Pennsylvanian currency” meant one thing, and “New Jersey currency” meant another. Finally, the Spanish silver dollar was adopted, there being very little gold in circulation, and upon it the decimal system was introduced and carried out with the higher coins. The “eagle” was made equivalent to ten dollars; the “half-eagle,” five dollars, etc., etc. The Confederate Government having ignored the “Stars and Stripes,” will no doubt do likewise with the “eagle.” Assuming that their principal coin will be called a “sun”—an appropriate title for the money of their country—they might make it of the same value as the British sovereign; their “half-suns” equal to half-sovereigns; their dollar worth four shillings; their half-dollar, two shillings; their quarter-dollar, one shilling. These slight changes from the Federal coinage could be very readily made by the Confederate States, now that their foreign commerce is, in a great measure, interrupted, and their inland trade very much paralyzed. In fact, the people of the South have very few unclosed transactions; but for all contracts existing, until the new currency would be brought fairly into action, the debtor could pay the creditor 3 per cent. in addition, viz., instead of a five-dollar United States’ half-eagle, a Confederate “sun,” with 3 per cent. thereon. Should this improvement be adopted, the Northern Government might make the same change, and thus the currency of the three great Anglo-Saxon nations would be similar, and the continual loss by recoinage, as well as the “shaves,” that have to be submitted to by emigrants and other passengers, in getting their money changed, would be avoided. It is simply a relic of barbarism for each country to have a different standard for the precious metals and different kinds of coins; in this age of internationality there should be some uniform system.

This matter of coinage is more important than it would seem at first glance; it is the basis of valuation, and prices of all the commodities of the world are known by it. Why not make the ways of commerce as smooth as possible? A little engineering now will accomplish much; let us cut away the old hills of trade, and fill up the valleys, so that business can be conducted on an easy level.

THE “CORNHILL MAGAZINE” AND THE CRUISE OF THE SUMTER.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—I have noticed in the Cornhill Magazine for July an article professing to narrate with great minuteness the incidents of the cruise of the Sumter, from the journal of one of her officers; and, for the credit of the officers of that vessel, I desire to intrude on your valuable space so far as to state the real facts of the case. While the shipping-office was open at New Orleans for the enlistment of the crew of the Sumter, a pale, cadaverous-looking individual presented himself for enrolment in the service; he rejoiced in the historical appellation of Francis Drake, and if there is really anything in a name we may suppose that he was desirous of emulating the fame of the great navigator.

On testing his capacities it was soon found that he had not as yet seen blue water; he was, therefore, rated as a landsman—a personage of no very great importance or responsibility on board a man-of-war. His literary propensities were manifested by a ludicrous article in the New Orleans journals, professing to give the entire details concerning the Sumter; and for this variation from the ordinary routine of a landsman’s duties, he was put in double irons and severely punished. From this short sketch of Francis Drake you can form some idea of the reliance to be placed on his statements of the condition of the Sumter, and of the plans of those in command of her, as narrated in the Cornhill Magazine.

Very respectfully,

AN OFFICER OF THE SUMTER.

London, July 28, 1862.

The Cruise of the Sumter.

FROM NOTES TAKEN ON BOARD BY ONE OF HER OFFICERS.

CAPTURE OF THE VIGILANT AND THE EBAN DODGE.

On the morning of December 3 we made a large sail a little on the starboard bow, which seemed to be nearing us rapidly; her sharp bows, black hull, and double topsail yards, made her present a most suspicious appearance in our eyes, and caused our hopes to run high in expectation of a capture; nor were we disappointed; on getting abeam of the stranger we could distinctly see the gay Yankee’ buunting floating at his gaff end; to send the first gun’s crew to quarters, cast loose, and send an eight-inch shell across his bows, with an order to heave-to, was but the work of a moment, and a boat was lowered to board the prize. The Sumter had been disguised, so as to present the appearance of the most innocent-looking French barque imaginable, her huge smoke-stack, which was down on deck, was carefully covered with stunsails, and other gear, and the Yankee must have thought it a “tartation” heavy deck load for such a little ship. This smoke-stack was certainly a curiosity, and deserves a description; being about seven feet too long for the Sumter, its girth was enormous, and would have been thought large for a line-of-battle ship. I have seen this smoke-stack when it was on deck, at the distance of four miles, and it loomed up looking actually larger than the saucy little craft to whom it belonged. We were occupied some time in beating up to the prize, and by this time the boat had reached her also. She proved to be the ship Vigilant (Minot master), from New York to the Island of Sombrero, in ballast. Captain Minot seemed to have something on his mind, which troubled him exceedingly, and appeared very much disconcerted. On examining the papers a little note was found, purporting that the good ship Vigilant was prepared for any privateer or pirate, and that Captain Minot would give a good account of any one which he might meet; the reason for this bombastic species of proclamation being a beautiful nine-pounder rifled gun in the aforesaid ship, which piece of ordnance Captain Minot had hoped to conceal. We immediately transferred it, together with its supply of ammunition, to the fore-castle of the Sumter, where it was to do duty in future as our bow-chaser.

The papers were teeming with accounts of the capture of Beaufort, South Carolina, and the splendid deeds of the Wabash and Minnesota on that occasion. We also gleaned some interesting pieces of information concerning the whereabouts of our pursuers from the New York Herald, that journal generally giving their time of starting, cruising ground, and other little items very useful to us.

We were some two hours in removing the crew and their effects to our ship, preparatory to setting the Vigilant on fire, and then the torch was applied to the doomed vessel. She burnt very rapidly, one mast after the other going by the board,—mizzen, main, and fore in rotation, until nothing remained but the bare hull drifting away to leeward, a lurid mass of flame; while the dense columns of smoke must have been plainly visible to an enemy’s cruiser had he been within a radius of thirty miles.

The crew of the Vigilant were negroes; and, like all Southerners, we proceeded immediately to give them plenty to eat—and plenty of work, so as to keep them out of mischief. They seemed to prefer this state of things to being subjected to the restrictions which are necessarily imposed on prisoners, and went to work right willingly.

Hitherto the cruising ground of the Sumter had been confined to the sunny seas of the Tropics, where light clothing was all that was necessary, but now we were admonished by many signs, that we were entering the region of cold and storms, where every preparation was needed to keep out the one and to defy the other. On Thursday, the 5th inst., the barometer fell rapidly, while the dull, leaden appearance of the heavens told of some sudden change soon to occur, and presently it burst upon us in the shape of a heavy gale from the northward, barely giving us time to put the ship under close reefed topsails and storm trysails; we soon had a very heavy sea running which caused not a few of the novices to pay tribute to Old Neptune, notwithstanding the fact of their having crossed the line some time before.

This weather continued, with some slight variations, until the morning of the 8th, when it moderated, though still misty with a very heavy sea. At about nine a.m., a vessel under close-reefed topsails was discovered immediately ahead and close aboard of us. She had what is, in nautical parlance, termed the clean run of a man-of-war, while her quarter boats, and the fact of her being under such short sail, made us suspect that we had run afoul of a Yankee fighting ship; fires were started, the ship cleared for action, and when abeam of the stranger we were ready for him. A shot from one of the bow guns whizzed a few yards ahead of her flying jib-boom, and the vessel hove to, with the United States’ colours flying at her peak. The knowing ones on board now saw, from the various peculiarities in her rigging that our prize was a whaler, and when the boarding-officer returned she was found to be the bark Eban Dodge (Gideon C. Hoxey master), of and from New Bedford, bound on a whaling cruise around “the Horn.” The Eban Dodge was fitted out for a three years voyage, and possessed a good stock of warm clothing, which was particularly acceptable to us; indeed, as far as creature comforts went, we considered her the most valuable prize we had yet taken. The crew of this vessel consisted of some forty-three men and boys; and I do not think that such a heterogeneous assemblage was ever congregated together in so small a space before; every nation had its representatives; the Esquimaux, the South American Indian, and the Guinea negro, were all personated by members of this extraordinary company; and, although water was their element, they seemed, from all appearances, to have long since eschewed any personal contact with the fluid. The sea was so rough that we were forced to leave a great many heavy articles, and content ourselves with those of less bulk; we were, however, fortunate enough to secure two of her beautiful boats, which were afterwards of great service in boarding ships. This transfer of property being effected, we fired the Eban Dodge, and the Sumter sailed away. In conversing some time afterwards with one of the officers of the whaler, I was informed that it was customary to ship such outcasts for a crew when the ship first set out, on account of the lowliness of the advance, and, when the cruise was nearly completed, another habit was to send them ashore at some of the islands for recreation, while the ship sailed away without waiting their return, being provided with an entirely new crew of natives; thus happily ridding the officers and owners from any troublesome shareholders in the proceedings of the cruise. I went in my way silent and wondering upon receiving this information, though I was forced to consider it a decidedly Yankee method of repudiation.

MR. LINDSAY'S MOTION.

Continued from page 215.

member for Sunderland, so far from staying the war, would rather aggravate and prolog it, and possibly, drag us into it; and he earnestly trusted that we would persevere in the principle and policy of entire non-intervention. (Hear, hear.) The motion had undergone many alterations. First, it simply implied recognition of the Confederate States as an independent nation; then it implied both recognition and mediation, if not something stronger than mediation; then recognition was dropped out, and Her Majesty was requested to adopt measures, in conjunction with other European Powers, to put an end to the civil war in America. It was to the motion in that shape that he had ventured to put an amendment on the paper. It was evident there had been a conflict of opinion in the hon. gentleman's own mind, whether he should go for a friendly mediation, or mediation accompanied with a threat; but let not the hon. gentleman transfer that doubt, which existed in his own mind, to the House, so that America and their own constituents should not know what was really meant. What did they mean? Was it friendly mediation or forcible intervention? If the object was friendly mediation, in the present relations with America, the less that was publicly said about it the better. He differed from his hon. friend as to the causes of the war, but there could be no doubt as to the object in continuing it. The men of the South were fighting in order to make themselves an independent nation, and in order to destroy the Union. The Federals were fighting in order to prevent their becoming an independent nation, and in order to maintain the Union. How was it possible to end the war short of the utter defeat of either party? either that the men of the South should on some conditions return to the Union, or that the men of the North should on certain terms allow them to leave it? If any Government would go between these two powerful and furious foes—both confident in the right of their cause, both sanguine of success, neither prepared to submit to dictation—one thing must be avoided—to express any opinion on the object in dispute. But the hon. member for Sunderland had, in bringing forward this subject, expressed an opinion in favour of the South, and accompanied it with a threat to the North, which had been reiterated boldly enough by those who supported him. Yet the hon. gentleman expected the North to listen to this friendly mediation. They were going the very worst way to work in order to effect their object. Notwithstanding his wish for peace, the hon. member for Sunderland does not think our mediation would be less likely to be successful if accompanied by a threat. Was that likely to put an end to the war? Were we in the position of the Federals—take the case of the war in India—if an offer of mediation had been made, accompanied by a threat—if France had stood forward and said, this contest can end only in separation—should we not have considered it an insult, and, instead of bringing us to peace, would it not much more likely have tended to aggravate the war? If we wanted this war to be prosecuted by the men of the North with greater fury, we could not go to work more ingeniously to attain our end. Again, if any disturbance arose in Ireland, if a contest were going on there, and if another Power stepped in, saying to us, "Let Irishmen alone, and let them govern themselves," should we be prepared to submit to dictation in such a matter? It might be said this was a war so suicidal, so foolish, so wicked, that we must simply consider how to put a stop to it. Now this was not the opinion of the vast majority of the 20,000,000 of the North, and it would not be our opinion if we were in the same position. The courage and endurance of the South were beyond all praise, and commanded our sympathy; but why did they evince these qualities? Because they regarded the Northern army as foreign invaders. But let us threaten the North with foreign interference, and we shall work them up to the same pitch of fury as the South. On the other hand, if we left them alone it was possible the Federalists might themselves find out that they had undertaken a task too hard for them. (Hear, hear.) President Lincoln had called for 300,000 more troops. He could not help thinking there was a little more difficulty in getting these 300,000 than there was before. (Hear, hear.) The sick and wounded men going home were not good recruiting sergeants; but if we wished to find President Lincoln his 300,000 men we had only to send out by next mail the statement that England, in concert with other Powers, threatened interference if she did not put a stop to the war. (Hear, hear.) Some went still further and were ready to assume the character of peacemakers, as defined by the noble lord at the end of his speech—rather a curious interpretation of the language of Scripture,—"Blessed are the peacemakers"—who do not stand aloof from the contest. There might be those who would say, "Better a war with America than a continuance of the present state of things." Now, surely, if we had no casus belli against America, where would be the justification of our going to war with her? Were we to go to war with any country because we happened to be in disaster on account of what was occurring in that country? Not only would such a war be wicked and unjust, but foolish to the greatest possible degree. It was said that our population was starving, and he believed that the cotton famine at this moment was likely to get worse. But we could keep the working population of Lancashire in luxury for less than the price it would cost us to interfere as the noble lord opposite suggested. We had a cotton famine now, but if we did that we should stand in danger of a corn famine. Even if we were to enter into such a war, and to break all the rules of international law, on the ground of mere interest, because we could not get a certain commodity, then we ought to take our material interest in all its bearings, and see whether we should not lose more than we should gain by it. He believed that, considered in a merely selfish and economical point of view, such a war would be the worse alternative. This hon. friend, the member for Leicester, had referred to the case of the French Revolution, and the intervention which then took place. Did they not all know that the horrors of that revolution were made more horrible still by that intervention, and the struggle rendered more bitter? Well, the same thing would happen if we ever interfered in America. This was not a common civil war—it partook more of a revolution than of a civil war; it was an entire change in the social system. The Southern States had been slaveholders, and the Northern States had connived at their being so. (Hear, hear.) But the American people now felt that they could not remain a great and powerful country, united before the world, because of slavery, and they said they would have an entire change in their social system. He believed it was now generally acknowledged that slavery was the real cause of this war. ("No, no," and "The tariff.") Why, Vice-President Stephens said that the South went to war to establish slavery as the corner stone of the new Republic. The tariff was not mentioned in the declaration of independence put forth by South Carolina; and it was scarcely alluded to in the contest for the Presidential election. He believed that slavery was the cause of the war, and that the war would cause the end of slavery. How it would do that he did not pretend to say, and he would make no prophecy as to whether it would result from the South becoming independent. But he said, "Let us, who are free from the responsibilities which are coming upon that unhappy country, in punishment for the crime of slavery, take care how we involve ourselves in any such responsibilities by an attempt at interference." There was a feeling in the North, with respect to the question of slavery, at which some persons shrank. The North was loth to add a servile war to the present civil war, and hence, in great measure, the inconsistency with which it was tainted. Let us not by our interference be instrumental in any way in helping to provoke a servile war. It was said that we should be sure of cotton, but in six months after we interfered the able-bodied negro slaves would probably be converted into Sepoys, acting with the army of the North instead of producing the raw material for our manufactures. Thanking her Majesty's Government for the policy of non-intervention which they had hitherto pursued in regard to this terrible war, he earnestly hoped they would continue to adhere steadfastly to that policy. This matter, he thought, might be safely left to their discretion. As to the present motion, altered though it had been, yet remembering both how it was worded, and the way in which it had been supported, he must give his vote decidedly against it. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. WHITESIDE.—Sir, I quite admit, with hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House, that this question is one of great delicacy and some difficulty; but it does not therefore follow that we should not venture to express an opinion upon it. (Hear, hear.) I do not believe that any popular assembly in the world could be more cautious, more abstinent, more prudent and circumspect than this House of Commons has been since this unhappy war began. (Hear, hear.) For a long period it has been felt by every hon. member that the introduction of the question would be unpalatable to the House; but when at length, under different circumstances, and after a great lapse of time, an independent member has introduced it, it would, I think, be very cowardly on our part not to express our feelings upon the true question before us, which, with all deference to the hon. gentleman who spoke last, I hold he has left untouched. (Hear, hear.) An hon. gentleman connected with the north of England has stated the degree of suffering which now presses upon our artisans there. That is only one part and one phase of the great question which now rises before us in such awful proportions. We are not so much concerned with the past as with the present and the future. The Government have given us their opinion on the subject of fortifications and on other subjects which may be of more or less importance. They have stated nothing on this great question, which is uppermost in the mind of every man in the kingdom. I think the hon. member who has introduced it deserves well of the country, for having offered Her Majesty's Ministers the opportunity of declaring what their opinions are on this momentous subject. There may be involved in it a question of principle and a question of high expediency; but both the principle and the expediency ultimately turn upon a question of fact. I maintain that this motion in a great degree turns upon a matter of fact, because we do not come here to discuss whether one form of Government is better than another, nor to criticize the Government of the United States. I remember that the sentiment of the Roman historian was applied to the Government of those States after they had seceded from the Government of England:—"Civitas, incredibile memoratu, est adepta libertate quantum brevi creverit." (Hear, hear.) I have no intention of speaking disrespectfully of that Government, nor of the Government established by the Southern States. I do not believe that the rules or principles of international law give us any authority to sit in judgment between the disputants. It is not for us to pronounce precisely how far either party was, in the first instance, right or wrong; although, indeed, if one were animated by an impertinent curiosity, he might be disposed to ask how it is that republicans refuse to allow republicans to form a republic. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) I cannot understand how the gentlemen who framed that famous Declaration of Independence, which proclaims that all men—at least all white men (a laugh)—are created free—that all men have a right to examine the principles of the Government under which they live—to alter, amend, change, or destroy it, according to their sovereign will and pleasure (cheers)—I say I think it would puzzle any person to give a reason why those who have acted upon such principles, and who have changed their own form of Government on the ground that it was not convenient to maintain it, should deny to others the exercise of the same privilege which they claimed for themselves. (Hear, hear.) If we were to follow the precedents commented upon by Mr. Justice Storey, we might construct good arguments to show that in the constitution of that country there is nothing to prevent one State seceding from the Government of another, if it thinks fit to do so. (Hear, hear.) But I admit that, in the practice of the United States, there is a considerable difference between seceding to the United States and seceding from the United States. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) I have always understood that the behaviour of Florida was exemplary in seceding from Spain; that her conduct in seceding to the United States was better still (laughter); that the conduct of Texas in seceding first to Mexico, and next from Mexico to the United States, was perfectly right; but when Texas now seceded from the United States, these champions of liberty start up and denounce in the strongest terms this daring attack upon the constitution of the United States. (Hear, hear.) I think some gentlemen have forgotten that the Americans have framed a clause in their new constitution which enables them to take under their particular wing any State—and even Canada has been hinted at—they would receive any State which might think fit to prefer to join their Government, and we betide the tyrannic Power of Europe that should dare to question that right of annexation. Upon principle, there is almost nothing to discuss. Nor do I think it surprising that there has been a secession in certain States of America. If you investigate the character of the populations of the North and South—if you look at the vastness of their territories, and consider the incompatibility of their tempers, habits, passions, and desires—it is surprising, not that there should be now a secession, but that it has not happened long ago. (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution ascribed the secession to several possible causes. One was said to be slavery. The hon. gentleman who last spoke, and gave utterance to very credible sentiments, asserted that slavery was the cause of the secession; but I find that the most intelligent persons in New York, including governors, generals, and even the President himself, differ from him. (Hear, hear.) I have read a resolution passed at a meeting in New York the other day, in which nothing could be more precise or emphatic than their denunciations of those who said that slavery was a question between the North and South, and they went the length of asserting that such a statement could only be put forth by the enemies of the Republic. (Hear, hear.) Therefore, I can scarcely accept slavery as the cause of quarrel. Loss of power may have been an important element in the dispute, and the hon. gentleman stated correctly that as representation depends upon numbers, and when the great influx of population into the Northern States took place, the South saw that their power would be destroyed, and, accordingly, they came to the conclusion that they might as well fight for their existence now as at some future time. (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman also drew the attention of the House to the question of tariffs and free trade, and I must say I am startled to find free-traders in principle and theory so opposed to it in practice. (Hear, hear.) I have not heard the disciples of Adam Smith say one word against the tariff now imposed upon the manufacturers of England by the United States. (Hear, hear.) I agree that we have no right to go to war upon that ground, and no sensible man ever said so; but we have a right to observe that policy, to understand upon what principle the United States are acting, and to govern our conduct in accordance with our interests, as they govern their policy in accordance with their interests. This will appear a more critical question than the hon. gentleman who spoke last seems to think, for no one can deny that self-interest is a great moving-spring of human conduct. If the men of the South think that their interests are affected injuriously by the policy and taxation of the men of the North, it is not at all surprising that they should do what people in all ages have done under similar circumstances. Looking at the opposing interests of the North and the South, every one would have said at the beginning of this quarrel, if you are about to separate, separate quietly. The North may have a brilliant destiny before it—the South may, perhaps, become wise. But I can't believe that the evil of slavery—which the North never did abate when it had the power to do so (hear, hear)—that that is the cause of the quarrel. I have heard nothing to show that the slave population in the South have risen against their masters, nor does it appear that there is any alarm in the South of a rebellion of the slave population, such as we have been led to expect, and therefore we should be cautious in forming opinions upon a question upon which we have not the materials for a sound and safe judgment. But what, then, was the cause of quarrel? And here I think the hon. member who spoke last has left the question untouched. If the causes of quarrel be deep-rooted and fundamental, may I ask him to tell me when is the point of time when the South will be reconciled to the North, or the North to the South? If the quarrel be one of principle, as he has said, if one party abhors the other, if there be that hatred so intense and malignant that one party is prepared to perish rather than to live under the same Government with the other, will the hon. gentleman tell me when is the point of time that would be auspicious for us to intervene, not, as he said, mistaking the object of the motion, by war (hear, hear), but in the spirit of this resolution, which I understand to state two important matters of fact, and then to propose a policy arising out of those facts? If these facts do not exist there is no ground for the motion. These facts are that "the States which have seceded have so long maintained themselves under a separate and established Government, and have given such proof of their determination and ability to support their independence." These are the two facts from which the policy springs, "that the propriety of offering mediation with a view of terminating hostilities between the contending parties worthy of the serious attention of the Government." I understand those words to imply that mediation with a view to recognition is the policy that is put forward in that resolution (hear, hear)—a policy that can only be founded upon a belief in the facts that are stated in the resolution. But that is a different question from that which has been raised by the hon. gentlemen who have opposed the resolution. I will admit that no matter what the rights of the quarrel might be on the part of the South against the North, nor how plausible soever the reasons that may be assigned, there would be no ground for any State to offer any opinion or to acknowledge the existence of the seceding State, unless that seceding State has exhibited power, has been able de facto to establish a Government, and has exhibited the courage and ability requisite to maintain that Government. It, therefore, becomes a matter of fact whether the seceding States have established a Government, and have shown a power and determination to resist any force that can be brought against them, and, if so, whether there is any ground to believe that at any time that can be named the North will be able to subjugate the South. I understood the hon. member for Leicester to say that we ought to stand by until the North had overwhelmed the South. I do not know, from the news we hear, whether Washington will be taken by the men from Richmond, or Richmond be taken by the men from Washington, but I do know that at the end of sixteen months, Richmond being only 130 miles from Washington, that city had not yet been taken, and that no great success has been obtained by the North upon the field of battle, but where they have had the powerful aid of their gunboats. (Hear, hear.) There is also the extraordinary fact that the President of this all-powerful Republic demands a conscription of 300,000 men in aid of the half-million or more already in arms to crush these incorrigible and sturdy asserters of Republican freedom. Then we come to the facts of European history and international law, and from that I do not intend to shrink. If we had no grounds founded upon international law for expressing our feelings, for recommending mediation, and for going to the extent of recognizing the South, we have no case, and we must submit to the miseries inflicted upon our own people, and abstain from recognizing a Government de facto which has established itself in strength, power, arms, and valour. (Hear, hear.) Hon. gentlemen who have spoken against the motion appear to have given the strongest arguments against themselves. They say that this is a terrific conflict, hundreds of thousands of fresh combatants will appear, one party may destroy itself, it will not destroy its opponent; but I want to know whether, as Christian statesmen and senators, if we can prevent this waste of human life, this destruction of property, this interruption of trade, this disturbance of the peace of the world—ought we not to do it at the right time, before irremediable mischief has been done? What are our rights? We are told we have no right to interfere. What are our duties and responsibilities? Do you remember that you have recognized the South as a belligerent Power? (Hear, hear.) When the recognition was made by Earl Russell—and I do not censure him for it—I thought it remarkable and significant, because in the great contest between Spain and her revolted provinces in America, when Sir James Mackintosh and the Whig party pressed on Mr. Canning to recognize each particular province that had established de facto its independence, the fact was very strongly urged that he had admitted those provinces to be a belligerent Power. Mr. Canning was a very candid man, and the answer he gave to that argument was this,—"We allowed the colonists to assume an equal belligerent rank with the parent country. Thus we did pro tanto to raise them in the scale of nations." (Hear, hear.) Those gentlemen who have spoken against the resolution have held that recognition is inconsistent with neutrality. That I entirely deny. I say that recognition is compatible with neutrality; and no State has asserted that more constantly than have the United States of America. (Hear, hear.) I have a sincere respect for the United States of America. They have had able statesmen, great jurists, and enlightened lawyers. They have books written with a taste and elegance which some of our writers have failed to copy; but on this question they must reason with us. (Hear, hear.) In the consideration of such a question there is no use in appealing to prejudice or passion. We argue this question with America as we should with the proudest commonwealth in the world; but we must argue it on reason. (Hear, hear.) There is no use in their seeking to make a law for themselves. They must argue it in accordance with the laws which bind civilized nations. (Hear, hear.) How does it happen that recognition and neutrality are compatible? If we establish that proposition we shall have done a great deal to prove our case. (Hear, hear.) The motion is not a rash one—one for a wild interference which would lead to war. Now, when I speak of Sir James Mackintosh I do so with sincere respect and admiration. Great he was—greater as a professor of ethics, as a philosopher, as a professor of natural law, as it is called, than as a statesman. He is an authority on a question of this kind; and he had occasion to consider whether recognition, as he expounded it, led to war with the parent country in the case of a province which had revolted. It was said that in this sense recognition must always be a renunciation of authority. Certainly, when the United States committed, as I think, the great mistake of renouncing the good government of England, they obtained a recognition from England afterwards. But in the case now under consideration, we have nothing to renounce, and we are not going to confer any powers or advantages on any State. The recognition spoken of in this resolution is the mere acknowledgment of the existence de facto of a Government, and nothing more. Sir James Mackintosh, in spite of such a recognition, says:—"It implies no guarantee, no alliance, no aid, no approval of revolt, no intimation of opinion concerning the justice or injustice of the circumstances by which it has been accomplished." That is very strong. Sir James goes on to observe:—"The tacit recognition of a new State, not being a judgment for the new Government or against the old, is not a deviation from perfect neutrality, or a cause of just offence to the dispossessed ruler." I say, therefore, that the United States will have no cause to quarrel with you if you consider this is a proper time to recognize the existence of a de facto Government in the Southern States after the events which have taken place within the last twelve months. (Hear, hear.) Let us just turn to the history of Europe, and see whether hon. gentlemen can make good the proposition that because there is a war raging between two countries, a third State is not to recognize one of the belligerent Powers. We recognized the Netherlands many years before Spain and the Netherlands brought their hostilities to an end. Spain did not make that a cause of quarrel with this country. (Some expressions of dissent.) I do not think she did. Then, what do you say to the example you set in the case of Portugal? In 1640 the Portuguese rose against the tyranny of Spain, under which they had groaned sixty years. They seated the Duke of Braganza upon the throne, and in January, 1641, a Cortes ratified his title. England did not wait long. Within one year after the proclamation of the Duke of Braganza, a treaty was signed at Windsor between Charles I. and John IV. Charles was moved to conclude this treaty by his solicitude to preserve the tranquillity of his kingdom, and to secure the liberty of trade of his beloved subjects. The contest was carried on, the Spaniards obtained victories, and there is no trace of any complaint or remonstrance, or even murmur, against the early recognition by England, though it was not till twenty-six years afterwards that Spain herself acknowledged the independence of Portugal, and, what is remarkable, made that acknowledgment in a treaty concluded under the mediation of England. I dare say Charles II. was very well received while wandering over the continent of Europe when driven from this country, and I do not know that any complaint was made that the Protectorate had been acknowledged by other countries. How did you act in the case of Greece? (Hear, hear.) Did you not acknowledge the independence of Greece before the termination of its struggle with the Turks? Then what was your conduct with respect to Belgium? I do not think Holland had inflicted any very flagrant injury on Belgium. There was some incompatibility of temper, no doubt (a laugh), and the noble lord at the head of the Government signed a treaty with that Minister who was as politic as he was pious—Prince Talleyrand (a laugh)—which intimated to the King of Holland that if he did not quit Belgium as quickly as possible, with every respect for him, you would blow him up. (A laugh.) Within twelve months after the breaking out of hostilities you acknowledged the independence of Belgium; but it may, perhaps, be said that you did a very extraordinary thing, because the Hollanders were on the point of conquering when you signed the treaty. The noble lord did not hesitate in that case. He was not afraid. Holland was not as strong as the United States. You interfered, and independence was established in Belgium. In the case of Austria and the Italian duchies, there was an incompatibility of temper, perhaps, also (a laugh); but the people in the States from which dukes had to walk out were afflicted with no such grievous grinding as the Southerners assert was practised on them by the Northerners, yet you did not hesitate to acknowledge the de facto Government in Italy. However, those examples do not serve us as well as the case of Spanish America; and I refer to it because in that case those principles which were afterwards asserted by Mr. Canning—on the occasion when he said he called new worlds into existence to restore the balance of the old—were laid down by that able Minister, Lord Castlereagh, in his despatch to our Ambassador at the Congress of Verona. He said:—"The case of revolted colonies is different. It is evident from the course events have taken that their recognition as independent States has become merely a question of time; over by far the greater part of them Spain has lost all hold." Therefore, although war was still raging, as the revolted provinces had for a sufficient time shown their power to make and keep a Government, the duke was instructed that such Government—and the Government even of particular provinces—should be recognized. The conduct of Lord Castlereagh on another branch of this question proves how thoroughly he understood the doctrine of recognition—that is to say, acknowledgment as contra-distinct from active interference.

Against the strong opposition of the Whig party he brought forward his Enlistment Bill to prevent soldiers from being enlisted in this country, and sent out to assist in wresting from Spain those colonies whose happiness since has not, perhaps, been as great as Mr. Canning thought it would be. Lord Castlereagh held that he was not at liberty to allow armaments to sail from this country to take part in the contest, because we were at peace with Spain; but that, while abstaining from encouraging revolt, or doing anything to promote insurrection, we were at liberty, in full observance of a strict, impartial, and honorable neutrality, to acknowledge any Government de facto once established. Spain threatened to interdict our trade and to lay on prohibitory duties. What was his answer? "If you do we will recognize the whole of those provinces as Governments de facto. We cannot prevent you fulfilling your threat, but if you act in that manner we shall acknowledge the independence of those states the next morning." In the conference with Prince Polignac a State document was drawn up, in which he said:—"Completely convinced that the ancient system of the colonies cannot be restored, the British Government could not enter into any stipulations binding itself either to refuse or delay the recognition of independence. . . . The British Government had no desire to precipitate that recognition as long as any reasonable chance of accommodation between the mother country and the revolted provinces existed; but it could not wait indefinitely for that result"—this is the point which I consider specially applicable to the present case—"it could not consent to make its recognition of the new States dependent on that of Spain. (Hear, hear.) . . . Great Britain had no desire for any special advantages in the way of trade, but considered that the force of circumstances, and the irrepressible force of events, had already determined the freedom of these provinces. She had trade relations with the Colonies, and would continue to maintain them; that if attempts at laying on a positive interdiction were made, such attempts should be cut short by a speedy and unqualified recognition of the new States." What does he say in his despatch to the Minister of Spain? "In any further step to be taken by His Majesty towards the acknowledgment de facto Government, the decision must depend on various circumstances, and, among others, the reports the Government receive of the actual state of affairs in the several American provinces." And then he adds, "the recognition of the Government de facto cannot much longer be delayed." When that question came to be discussed, Lord Brougham explained what he understood to be the difference between recognition and acknowledgment, and his words I venture to submit to the House:—"There is unquestionably all the difference in the world between recognition by the mother country implying a renunciation of the claim of right and that bare acknowledgment for the interests and purposes of your own subjects, and for the convenience of your own foreign relations, which renounces no right and gives no aid, but which eventually secures the highest advantages. Viewing the subject in this light as an acknowledgment, and avoiding the word 'recognition,' about which some dispute may arise, it can be considered as no breach of neutrality towards the mother country and can by possibility involve us in no hostile discussion with any other Power." The short reply of Sir J. Mackintosh puts this point, as it affects the United States of America, in a manner which I defy any one to answer. He says:—"I wish to add one striking fact on the subject of recognition. The United States of America accompanied their acknowledgment with a declaration of their determination to adhere to neutrality in the contest between Spain and her colonies. A stronger instance cannot be adduced of the compatibility of recognition and neutrality." The Government of the United States preceded ours by nearly two years in the acknowledgment of those revolted provinces, and they would not allow anybody to criticise this transaction. They said the law of nations entitles us to decide what is best for our own interests. We believe that these provinces have sufficiently established their existence; and we will resent the interference of any other Power to assist Spain in recovering her provinces. Is that the country which is now to say to England "Beware how you offer an opinion!" (Hear, hear.) This may be a question of time, it may even be a question of geography; but, after all, it is a question of facts. And is it not a fact, that battles have been fought, and that no great victory over the South has been obtained? Does not every sane man believe it to be an impossibility for the South to be mastered and put down? (Cheers.) The United States have put on excessive duties with a facility which must be distasteful to the followers of Adam Smith; the principles of that great writer have been set aside by Republican Governments with a freedom surprising to the most old-fashioned Protectionists. (Laughter.) Why not apply to them the same argument which Castlereagh did in the case of Spain? The time for interference has certainly arrived. International law, feelings of humanity, the best and the kindest intentions towards Americans themselves, all induce us to come forward and propose mediation, having for its object to put an end to the war. Precedent is on our side; principle is in our favour; the maxims of international law are not defied, but respected; we do not provoke war with the United States when we say, in a spirit of strict and honourable impartiality, that the seceding States, having succeeded in establishing their independence, and in maintaining a Government, deserve to be recognized among civilized and independent States. (Cheers.)

Mr. GRACOV.—It is just four months from this date that a prophet rose up among us and proclaimed, "yet within ninety days and the civil war in America will be ended." And this prophet was a much less ambiguous and a much more outspoken prophet than his predecessors, whether sacred or profane, for not only did he give you the period within which the war was to end, but he actually described the basis of arrangement on which it was to be concluded, namely, the establishment of the independence of the Southern Republic. The prophet I allude to was the noble lord the Foreign Secretary; and the worst of prophecies by ministers is this, that men of business, being matter-of-fact persons, naturally conclude that these glimpses of futurity are derived from positive information, they trust to them, and they make their arrangements accordingly. And if I am correctly informed, there are not a few of them who have not bitterly regretted that the noble lord, the Foreign Secretary, did not follow a late strongly laid down injunction of the noble lord the Prime Minister, that for a statesman, if he must prophesy, the best thing is to prophesy after and not before. (Laughter.) Now, sir, I understand the cause of the noble lord's error. He was misled by a Northern gentleman who came here to set the mind of England right on American politics; this gentleman, though not actually a minister, still occupied a position as possessing the entire confidence of the Washington Cabinet. I make no secret of the name, it was Mr. Thurlow Weed, (hear, hear), a gentleman of great intelligence and, I believe, of moderation. I understand there is no denial that this gentleman went about and had interviews with the chief members of the Government, and the burden of his representations were, "Give us three months, let us do our best, and if at the end of three months we fail to recover the Seceders, then we have little more to say." The noble lord was, no doubt, struck by this appeal, and being quite acute enough to see that the Confederate States were determined at all sacrifice to achieve their independence, and remembering Lord Chatham's celebrated expression, "Conquer a free population of three millions of souls, the thing is impossible," he judged the thing impossible, and he has been right so far in his judgment. (Hear, hear.) But this had been the note of every Northerner since the commencement of this contest. Every one, without a solitary exception, last year, said, "Within twelve months, if we are only let alone, the war will be over. (Hear, hear.) We utterly abjure conquest, domination, subjugation; all that we wish to do is to enter the South, and liberate that hearty Union sentiment which we know to be there, but which is now repressed by a tyrannical and violent minority." (Hear, hear.) Let us hear Mr. Cassius Clay. (A laugh.) My hon. friend below me laughs, and I understand the reason why; but let me assure him that Mr. Cassius Clay is not one whit more ridiculous nor more ignorant of diplomatic usage than very many of those persons who have been sent over to represent the United States to the consternation of foreign countries. Witness the celebrated dinner at Paris of Northern representatives, and their speeches on that occasion. Mr. Cassius Clay, writing to the Times, May 17th, 1861, asks himself various questions, which he answers with great ease and satisfaction to himself; he begins thus:—"But can you conquer the South? Of course we can. We can blockade them by sea and invade them by land, and close up the rebellion in a single year, if let alone, for the population of the Slave States is divided, perhaps equally, for and against the Union, the loyal citizens being for the time overawed by the organized conspiracy of the traitors; while the North is united to a man." That point being so comfortably settled, he goes on to ask another question:—"But can you govern a subjugated people and reconstruct the Union? We do not propose to subjugate the revolted states. We propose simply to put down the rebel citizens. We go to the rescue of the loyal Unionists of all the States. We carry safety and peace and liberty to the Union-loving people of the South, who will of themselves, the tyranny being overthrown, send back their representatives to Congress, and thus the Union will be reconstructed without a change of a letter in the Constitution of the United States." (Laughter and cheers.) So much for Mr. Clay's views, in which he only asks for a year, and that not for conquest, but simply to elicit and set free the Union feeling compressed and fettered in the South. Mr. Bright, too, the great English advocate of the North, used precisely the same argument in his celebrated speech at Rochdale of December 6, 1861. Speaking of the Southern States, and of Alabama in particular, he says:—"There are great numbers of most reasonable, just, and thoughtful men in that State who entirely deplore the condition of things there existing. What would you do with all these States, and with what may be called the loyal population of these States? Would you allow them to be dragged into this insurrection, and into becoming parts of a new State to which they themselves are hostile?" (Hear, hear.) Now, I ask you, has not this platform sunk beneath the feet of the North and Northern advocates in England? This Union sentiment has been hunted for wherever a Federal force has penetrated. Last year, on the first invasion of the Confederate territory, when the Northerners occupied Cape Hatteras, they announced they had hit upon it, and great was the exultation of the New York papers, and it turned out that it was represented by some twenty or thirty persons—half fishermen, half smugglers—who were brought together and, under the influence of "cocktails" (laughter) passed certain Union resolutions. This has been the solitary and notable discovery of Union proclivities. Has General Halleck found it at Nashville, where he has so safely locked up the clergy in the penitentiary; or at Memphis? or has General Banks in Western Virginia? or General Wool at Norfolk? or has the rigour of General Butler, by treating ladies as prostitutes, called it from its lurking place in New Orleans? No! it is perfectly clear that the Southern Confederacy is of one mind and of one heart, determined, whatever be the cost, whatever be the ruin, to work out their freedom from subjection to a people for whom their hatred is intensified by their contempt; and the Northerners now know this, and the war is no longer a war for independence on the one side, and for empire on the other. It is a war for independence on the one side, and for vengeance on the other—the vengeance of "one who grapples with his enemy and strives to strangle him before he dies." The wreaking of this vengeance is the uppermost thought of ninety out of every hundred in the North, and in this blind desperation every other feeling has been swallowed up; national faith, national solvency, national decency, national humanity, and, I may with truth add, national Christianity. The press of the United States, without exception, applauds those acts which are more the mad ferocity of a savage than of a man who calls himself a Christian. What in Europe would be infamy, in America has been dignified into energy, patriotism, and glory. (Cheers.) Now I am not going to attack the United States for engaging in this war. If they conscientiously believed that there was a powerful Union party in each State, they may certainly plead with fairness that it would have been an act of pusillanimity to allow so great a fabric to be lightly levelled with the ground. But this I will say, that when I was in the Southern States, in all the Southern States, in 1860, the universal sentiment was for separation. Whether in the railway cars, or in the bar-room, whether in high society or low society, I am bound to say there was but one thought, one aspiration, and that was, separation sooner or later. I am bound also to say there was one notable exception, and that was Louisiana, where the interests of protected sugar rendered the general disposition favourable to Union. But after the North had discovered that even those considerations failed to influence Louisiana, and that Secession was as hot at New Orleans as at Charleston, it became a blind, wilful self-delusion on their part and a mockery of the intelligence of foreign nations, to pretend that the war was continued, not for purposes of empire, but to liberate a Union sentiment, which notoriously did not exist. Well, then, if this Union feeling be a mere delusion, proved and convicted to be so—if the power of conquest be a mere delusion, proved and convicted to be so at Corinth, at Fair Oaks, at Charleston, and at Richmond, by that inexorable logician General "Stonewall" Jackson—if the war is degenerating into unmitigated cruelty, and into the wreck and ruin of what should be two great flourishing and happy communities, it seems to me the time has come when the nations of Europe should take some decided course. I do not wish to go into a history of this great campaign, but I think it is clear that the conquest of the South is farther off than at this time last year, when the North had not put forth its strength. If this be so, the dictates of humanity alone ought to have some weight with us. We do not go to war, it is true, for an idea, nor liberate an oppressed country, like our friends the French, under the influence of a sentiment. Still, in spite of our somewhat unimaginative character, we have some feelings of this tendency; and though the Trepings have some good friends in this House, public opinion is rather in favour of their being suppressed, as enemies of the human race. We thought, too, some years ago, that the Greeks and Turks had cut each other's throats long enough, and we blew up the Turkish fleet under the influence of kindly feelings to both parties. (Laughter.) I feel so much for Chinamen, and Turks, and Greeks, we might have some commiseration for our own blood and kin on both sides of this conflict, devastating and slaughtering each other. But our humanity should come nearer home. We should remember what is impending over Lancashire—what woe, what woe, what humiliation—and that not caused by the decree of God, but by the perversity of man. I leave the statistics of the paperism that is, and that is to be, to my honourable friends the representatives of manufacturing England. But there is something to me even more harrowing than the physical privation that awaits the working classes of those districts. Judging of their character by their conduct, of the discipline of their minds by their noble patience and resignation, of their proud spirit of independence by their sacrifice of their all, are they condescended to ask relief, I dread, in their case, the humiliation of mind arising from the thought that they are supported from other sources than their own honest skill and industry, even as much as the stint, and the penury, and the squalid garb, and the cold and desolate hearth. The whole question of putting an end to this state of things depends on our obtaining cotton. We know we cannot get that supply in India. We do know we can get it from the Southern States of America. Now, in endeavouring to obtain it, are we likely to be driven into isolated action? Most assuredly not. France wants it as urgently as we do. Not that distress will be as extensive in France, but from the constitution of society in that country. In England the local rates provide for local destitution; in France the State is responsible, and the Emperor is the State. (Hear, hear.) He is held responsible, and in France that responsibility is a danger, and shakes thrones. (Hear, hear.) The French know, too, that if access to American cotton is cut off, it is to us they will have to come eventually on their bended knees for every pound of cotton they will require for their consumption, and markets once lost are not easily regained. (Hear, hear.) They know also, as we know, that by the new tariff the rulers of the United States have virtually proclaimed that the great American Continent is to be closed to the products of Europe. By the Morrill tariff they resolved on scourging us with whips; by the Stevens amended tariff they propose to scourge us with scorpions, to punish France and England for that want of sympathy which they have so long sought to evoke by menace and abuse. (Hear, hear.) Now, the French see, as clearly as ourselves, that this war is not only inflicting misery on all engaged in the manufacture of cotton, but that, if successful on the part of the North, it will shut out for ever 8,000,000 of customers ready and anxious to receive their silks and wools, and objects of luxury, and to give their raw products in exchange. They see, also, as we do, that if the South establishes its independence, these wretched tariffs will vanish from the North, for the smuggler will break down those barriers which United States' officials—I cannot call them statesmen—have erected to gratify the insatiable love of gain of the manufacturers of New England and Pennsylvania, or, what is even worse, the promptings of malice, as ignorant as it is impotent. (Cheers.) Now, I say, France has even a greater interest than we have in putting an end to this state of things. All Europe has an interest, and I consequently think the resolutions of the honourable member Mr. Lindsay, and my noble friend Lord Adolphus Vane, are rightly worded in calling on the Government to unite with the other European Powers in a joint and immediate course of action in this great emergency. Now I come to the question of recognition, and I shall show, very briefly, from all analogy, that we are justified in recognizing the Confederate States as a Sovereign Republic; that they have every element constituting a de facto Government, for into the de jure question I cannot now enter, namely, the doctrine of State rights—and that we have openly interfered in favour of other countries, asserting their independence, and that, too, in cases where the necessity did not come home to us with one-tenth the urgency as in the present instance. The only difference was this, that the United States are strong and aggressive, the other Governments with whom we interfered were weak and incapable of resistance. (Hear, hear.) First of all, take the case of Texas, for it is a strong instance of recognition. When Texas asserted her independence we were in amity with Mexico; but we did not hesitate to recognize the flag of the lone State. What was the then population of Texas? not more than 60,000. But, as Lord Palmerston said, in 1839, in reply to Mr. O'Connell, "The principles of the Government were to recognize every State that was de facto and permanently independent." So, considering this small State of 60,000 souls to be de facto and permanently independent, we followed the example of France, and recognized it. We did the same by the South American Spanish Republics. We hastened to be the first to do the same by the Kingdom of Italy; and here let me quote Lord Russell's famous despatches:—Nov. 15, 1859. Lord Russell to Earl Cowley. "1825, England acknowledged two or more South American Republics. 1827, the treaty between Great Britain, France, and Russia, which led to the independence of Greece. 1830, Belgium rose against Holland, and Great Britain was active, both in the Cabinet and on the sea, in concerting the measures which led to the establishment of the independence of Belgium. Thus, in five instances, the policy of Great Britain appears to have been influenced by a consistent principle. She uniformly withheld her consent to acts of intervention by force to alter the internal government of other nations, but she uniformly gave her countenance, and, if necessary, her aid, to consolidate the de facto Governments which arose in Europe or America." But, as to interference, what did we do in Greece? Why, disgusted with the long-protracted bloodshed, we blew up, as I said before, the Turkish fleet, and we made Greece a sovereign independent State, although, unquestionably, had the war continued, the power of Turkey and the Egyptian forces would have crushed the insurrection. But what did you do in the case of Belgium, to which my hon. friend (Mr. Whiteside) has just alluded? You recognized her independence, and you interfered to establish it. Although Belgium formed part of a State called into existence by the Congress of Vienna, and its integrity recognized by the Great Powers of Europe, yet you considered, owing to various reasons unnecessary here to allude to, that its separation from Holland was of vast importance. So you tore up the treaties of Vienna at the point of the sword; you assumed an attitude of hostility to your oldest friend and ally, Holland, and you encouraged the French to bombard the citadel of Antwerp. But the Dutch held Antwerp, and would have recovered Belgium in one campaign. Well, then, I say, what is the superior claim which the United States' Government has over Holland on your forbearance? (Hear, hear.) Is it on the ground of a superior state necessity, than that of saving the lives and independence of hundreds of thousands of the Queen's loyal and devoted subjects? (Hear, hear.) Is it on the ground that the United States has been a true and faithful ally to us, and that in the hour of need we should prove gratitude, and not avert our faces from them? (Hear, hear.) Witness the Russian war. Is it on the ground of innumerable kindly offices, interchange of friendship between two friendly kindred peoples? Witness the inroads of sympathizers in the Canadian rebellion (hear), the seizure of St. Juan, and the refusal to submit that question even to arbitration, on the part of Mr. Lincoln's Government. (Hear, hear.) Witness the outrages that are daily occurring to British ships in British waters, at the Bahamas, and an English port virtually blockaded; witness the seizure of British property at New Orleans, and the treatment of the British representative there. Is it on the ground of high and honourable dealing, even though it be not friendly? Witness the disgraceful fraud, perpetrated knowingly, justified and applauded, in the negotiations on the north-east frontier. Sir, we owe them nothing, save the strictest and sternest justice. (Hear, hear.) And I am perfectly entitled to ask—What is the meaning of all this terrible bother over our heads, which Mr. Seward has raised, in that dispatch in which he threatens the nations of Europe with I know not what, in case they venture even to hold communications with Confederate Commissioners. Let me show the House what has been the invariable practice of the United States—God forbid that we should frame our practice on American practice!—but I have a right to enter into these matters to show you that, though the doctrine allows to themselves every liberty of action, they make all this terrible hubbub if they even suspect that any other country is about to venture an inch on the same path. In March, 1848, Mr. Buchanan, then Minister for Foreign Affairs at Washington, lays down to Mr. Rush, then Minister at Paris, that it was his duty at once to recognize the French Republic, and adds that, "It is right that the Envoy of the United States should be always the first to recognize a new Government," and as a confirmation of this principle Mr. Buchanan exultingly adds, "So anxious are the United States to recognize de facto Governments, that the Pope, the Emperor Nicholas, and President Jackson, were the only authorities on earth who recognized Don Miguel." (Hear, hear.) But a still stronger case remains. The House may perhaps remember the quarrel between Austria and the United States in 1850. The cause of quarrel was this: under the Presidency of General Taylor, while Hungary was contending with Austria for its independence, even so early as June 1849, Mr. Clayton, Foreign Secretary at Washington, sent as an emissary to Hungary a gentleman, with the most ample instructions, in case the opportunity presented itself of recognizing what is now called the insurgent Government. (It is a curious coincidence that the same person then sent to Hungary to recognize its independence, was one of the representatives of the Southern States lately in this country, to claim their recognition—I mean Colonel Mann.—The instructions given to Colonel Mann were published subsequently at Washington, and offence was thereby given to the Austrian Minister, the Chevalier Hulsemann—a spirited war of words took place between him and Mr. Webster, the then Foreign Secretary, and it was on that occasion that Mr. Webster wrote his celebrated letter, throwing down the gage to the despotic Powers of Europe, enunciating the principles of the United States as regards the recognition of new States. He says, "It is not to be required of neutral Powers that they should await the recognition of the new Government by the parent State." The words "parent state" clearly recognize the right of secession, and he points out how, in the case of the Spanish South American Republics, Greece and Belgium, independent Governments were recognized by the leading countries of Europe, and by the United States, before they were acknowledged by the State from whom they had separated. Now let us come to the tests of what should entitle a country to recognition as a separate sovereign and independent State; that depends on its wealth, on its population, and on the spirit of that population to maintain its sovereignty and independence. On the latter point Generals McDowell and McClellan can give you better information than I can. (Laughter and cheers.) First of all, as to the population; there is an impression prevailing that the South is a retrograde, doomed, and dwindling population; but in the last ten years, according to the late census, the slave-owning States have increased from six and a half to eight and a half millions in free population. These figures show that as far as numbers go there is no retrogression, and that they are capable of maintaining themselves. Then as to territory, I will not weary you with statistics of square miles and acres, but it is enough to say that Texas alone contains territory sufficient to support a population engaged in agricultural pursuits of at least 20,000,000; that it is as large as France and the British Islands combined, that it has trebled its population within ten years, and from 1838 to 1860, it has increased from 60,000 to 600,000, and that not by any sudden influx of persons in search of minerals, as in the case of Australia and California, but by the regular course of emigration. (Hear, hear.) Take the increase of property as another test—let me give you the one case of Georgia; you will find that in 1860 the taxable property of that State had reached $670,000,000, or double what it was in 1850. Now let us see how the Southern States stand as regards their productive powers. According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, lately published—the Report, I mean, on Commerce and Navigation—the exports of domestic produce for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860, the year before the war, amounted to $373,000,000 in round numbers, of this $36,000,000 was in gold coin and bullion, which it is impossible to allocate between the two sections, and which, therefore, had better be deducted, leaving $317,000,000 to be accounted for; of this $198,000,000 was in exports from Southern ports, and $19,000,000 of Southern products, such as cotton, rice, tobacco, turpentine, pitch, &c., from Northern ports. We thus find, that of the whole $317,000,000, $217,000,000 of Southern produce, $100,000,000 of Northern. So much for the material condition of the South—and now as to their position as a Government? The words of President Jefferson Davis, in his inaugural speech, are the very notes of Southern policy:—"An agricultural people, whose chief interest is the export of a commodity, required in every manufacturing country, our true policy is peace, and the freest trade which our necessities will permit." And have they not amply fulfilled this pledge? They have thrown open the Mississippi to the commerce of the world; they have abolished all discriminating duties on foreign tonnage; they have sanctioned the lowest ad valorem tariff compatible with their necessities, and they have embodied in their Constitution a provision that duties are to be imposed for revenue, and not for protection. (Hear, hear.) Now, I have heard many persons abuse the Southerners for their destruction of cotton. You might as fairly abuse the Russians for the burning of Moscow. (Hear, hear.) They burn it not to prevent it from reaching us, but to prevent it from becoming a source of wealth and strength to their opponents; it is not to starve Manchester, but to starve Lowell and New England. Remember, the Northerners promised us a cotton port, and how have they kept their word? Why, by General Butler keeping watch and ward, and not allowing one bale of cotton to leave New Orleans unless it can give a certificate of loyal origin, and of belonging to loyal citizens, as he calls them. (Hear, hear.) Then, again, look with what wisdom the Confederates have effected change in the former Constitution of the United States. They have prolonged the Presidential power from four to six years, and having rendered the revolution that disturbs the United States to the very centre every four years to be of rarer occurrence, they have enacted that ministers are, for the future, to be members of the Legislature, to explain the intentions of the Government, and not leave them to be expounded and interpreted according to the views of each speaker; a memorable instance of which was the attempt of Senator Douglas to frame a policy out of Mr. Lincoln's words, which were directly contrary to Mr. Lincoln's intentions. They have done away also with that wretched custom of dismissing every office-holder after the change of a Presidential party, the most miserable and short-sighted expedient of party warfare ever resorted to, spreading corruption broadcast, and paralysing the public service; and, lastly, they have enacted the most stringent provisions against the slave trade, and grafted them on their Constitution; and all this has been done with a dignity worthy of the inauguration of what I trust will be a thriving, powerful, and peace-loving Republic, wherein Republicans will not have to blush for Republican institutions. (Hear, hear.) As I have alluded to the provisions made by the Confederate States on the subject of the slave trade, I must now detain the House for a few minutes on the subject of slavery and the slave trade, which are perpetually thrown in the teeth of the advocates of Southern independence, and very notably this evening by the hon. member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor), whose whole argument in favour of the North was based on the fact that the Southerners were slaveowners, and that the independence of the South carried with it the extension of slavery. I should be the last man to have so ardently taken up the cause of the South from the commencement of this struggle had the contest been for the extension of slavery and the revival of the slave trade. Now, as to the slave trade. It is represented by Northern advocates that one of the great objects of secession was the revival of this traffic. This I utterly deny. It is from Northern and not from Southern ports that proceed the real traffickers in the flesh and blood of their fellow-men. Lord Lyons writes that in 1860 eighty-four vessels were notoriously fitted out for this unholy traffic; of these eighty-four vessels almost every one belong to New York and ports in New England. When I was in Cuba in 1860 I was shown a list of the vessels that brought 30,000 of these wretched Africans to that island within the current year. The greater, by far the greatest, proportion of these vessels were American, and almost all the American vessels were from Northern ports. Of the ten vessels captured by the United States' squadron in 1859-60 fitted up for the slave trade, or with slaves on board, seven were from the port of New York alone. (Hear, hear.) No; the Southerners are not the culprits. It is in Yankee ships—floated by Yankee capital—commanded by Yankee skippers, sent forth on their odious errand by the connivance of bribed Yankee officials—that this work of iniquity is carried on. (Hear, hear.) It will be stopped now, I trust, effectually by the treaty between this country and the United States, and I rejoice that the rulers of the United States have adopted this honourable course, for which I give them the fullest credit. But does any one believe that without Secession we should have ever got the North to consent to such a treaty? (Hear.) I am quite aware that in the South, the subject of the revival of the slave trade has been canvassed. But its advocates are of two classes: first, the poorer class of whites, who think it right that the principles of political economy should be extended to the purchase of negroes, and that they should be permitted to purchase in the cheapest market; and secondly, by a few persons of extreme opinions in the South, who, irritated by the violent language of Northern abolitionists, have determined to go for whatever may be most galling to their opponents. Thus one extreme begets another extreme. The Government, however, in the South is not directed and swayed by this violent section, nor is it, as it would be in the North, in the hands of the populace. It is directed by the ablest, and the wisest, and the most respected men in the community, and among them the idea of the revival of the slave trade never enters their imagination. (Hear.) I can say, with truth, that when I was in the South the idea of the revival of the slave trade was perfectly scouted. To say nothing of the instincts of humanity, which I suppose the hon. member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor) will altogether deny to every Southerner, there were three reasons alleged why they objected altogether to this traffic:—1st. The immense diminution of profits that African immigration would cause—the negro now worth $1200 would fall to $300. 2ndly. The unwillingness on the part of all prudent and thinking men to increase the disproportion between the whites and the coloured race, for already in two States, South Carolina and Mississippi, the negro has obtained the superiority in number. 3rdly. That from the experience of the few cargoes that have been landed, the planter dreads the incoming of these turbulent barbarians among his slaves, they having turned out perfect pests in the plantations where they were introduced. (Hear, hear.) Then, again, let me remark, that Louisiana, no longer protected in her sugar, has to compete with the Cuban sugar grower, with cheap slave labour; so that, rely on it, knowing as they do that their best chance is the enhanced price of labour in Cuba, the Louisiana planter will be as strong an anti-slave-trade man as you will find in this city or on the platform of Exeter Hall. (Hear, hear.) But the best proof of the real honest intention of the South on this subject may be gathered from the articles of its Constitution. Let me read to you Article 9 of the Constitution:—"1. The importation of African negroes from any foreign country other than that the slave-owning States of the Confederate States is hereby forbidden, and Congress is required to pass such laws as shall effectually prevent the same. 2. Congress shall also have power to prohibit the introduction of slaves from any State not a member of the Confederation." This enactment was subsequently confirmed by all the States in the ratification of the Constitution. South Carolina, the State in which this subject has been most discussed, ratified the Constitution and condemned the slave-trade by a majority of 146 to 23. (Hear.) It is curious enough that precisely the same arguments were used by those who objected to the recognition of Texas, as by those who objected to the recognition of the Southern Republic. Mr. Hoy, in August, 1836, who had introduced the discussion on the recognition of Texas, grounded his objections to it on this very point. His words were:—"The war now carrying on in Texas was a war not for independence, not for liberty, but positively for slavery. If Texas were added to the American Union the basis of the connection would be to establish the slave-trade permanently in that State. The Texans were men of the lowest morality, and their interest was, as speculators, carrying on the slave-trade." The Texans hardly deserved these compliments, for it is asserted by them that not one cargo of negroes from Africa has been landed in Texas since a fixed Government took the place of the anarchy of Mexican rule. President Houston's first Message could not have been stronger had it been composed by Mr. Wilberforce himself; in it he speaks of the slave-trade as "that accursed traffic," and calls on England "to help him to put a stop to the importation of slaves from Cuba." (Hear.) And now with regard to the slavery question, I do not hesitate to say that, looking on all that is going on with the hope of gradual diminution and ultimate extinction of slavery, every Englishman ought to wish for the triumph of the Southern separation. I contend it is the only circumstance that can contract the area of slavery and prevent its extension, whereas the restoration of the Union would confirm, stabilize, and spread it. Supposing peace were now concluded on the basis of the independence of the South, it is probable that a portion of what is now slave territory would go with the North, but I do not pretend to form an opinion as to what would be that portion. This much, however, is clear, that there would be no fugitive slave law. The consequence would be, that a slave on the border, on considering himself aggrieved, could, with very little risk, make his escape. The result of this would be, that in the Border States slavery would be pushed back and free labour would take its place, and this process would go on until slavery became confined to that portion of the South where white labour would find the climate insupportable—and bear in mind that, with the establishment of a separate Republic, the South could have no jealousy of free labour—they will then gladly welcome every accession of wealth and industry. But do you, who hate slavery in your hearts really think that the reconstruction of the Union would favour your views? Why you must be mad to think so. (Hear, hear.) Why what would be the result of reconstruction? Why that every concession on the slavery question would be offered to the South if they would only come back again, and allow the North to dip as deep as before into the pockets of their dupes. (Hear, hear.) Why what can be more lamentable and more humiliating than the conduct of the North from the commencement of these troubles till now? They come whining to the South, with patriotism in their mouths, but with protection in their pockets (Cheers), and they proffer everything, only let them return and deal with them again. For this they offer to recognize slavery by name (hear, hear), they offer to get the States to do away with Personal Liberty Bills, (hear, hear), they offer to tear up and split into toothpicks the chief plank of the Chicago platform. (Hear, hear.) Now what said the men of the Chicago Convention? That under no circumstances would they ever allow slavery to be extended to their territories. Upon this there could be no surrender—other concessions they might grant; but this, in which humanity, conscience, and all the holiest considerations were indirectly involved, this they never could surrender, no never, never, never. And what have they offered? Why to cast all these considerations of conscience and humanity and duty to the four winds of heaven, to hand over all territories south of Mason and Dixie's line, (36°30') to slavery, if only the South will return and wear bad clothing, and use inferior iron, and pay the North some 9,000,000 sterling a year for the advantages of such a connection. (Cheers.) Is not this the case at this very moment? And let me recommend the seventh resolution of the great meeting held at the Cooper Institution, New York, on the 1st of July last, to the consideration of the hon. members for Leicester (Mr. Taylor) and Bradford (Mr. Forster).—"47. That this is a Government of white men, and was established exclusively for the white race; that the negro race is not entitled to and ought not to be admitted to political or social equality with the white race; but that it is our duty to treat them with kindness and consideration as an inferior and dependent race." (Hear, hear.) A New York pamphlet was put in my hand last year by a member of this House, supposed to carry with it very strong arguments to induce the South to return and nestle again in the warm Northern bosom—and this was one of the inducements. "Slavery, as protected by the Constitution of the United States, has more friends in the North than it has in all the world beside—friends who would march by thousands for its protection and defence as it exists under the Constitution." (Hear, hear.) But to leave anonymous writers for a minute, let us turn to authorities. In December, 1860, Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, used these words—"If I were an abolitionist, and wanted to accomplish the abolition of slavery in the Southern States, the first step I would take would be to break the bonds of this Union. I believe the continuance of slavery depends on the preservation of the Union and a compliance with all the guarantees of the Constitution." (Hear, hear.) The New York Tribune, the recognized organ of Northern Republicanism, the unflinching advocate hitherto of immediate abolition at all risks and hazards, pipes in quite an altered and lower key, "Be it the business of the people everywhere to forget the negro and remember only the country." (Hear, hear.) But what said, last year, the man who wanted to occupy the Presidential chair, bearing on his banner two words, since rendered famous, "irrepressible conflict?"—(hear, hear)—irrepressible conflict between slavery and freedom. I mean Mr. William Seward (hear); the same Mr. Seward who was lately making capital by offering to sacrifice everything to Secession except the Morrill tariff; and who proclaimed an irrepressible conflict with every one of his former convictions and expressions. (Hear.) This Mr. William Seward is the same person who only the autumn before last was stumping it throughout the North on the broadest anti-slavery principle, who at Detroit declared "that slavery was, and must be only temporary and local;" who, in European boudoirs and saloons, had been trying to play the part of Barak to the Deborah of Mrs. Beecher Stowe. (Laughter.) Prophecying woes and lamentations to the South, and singing songs of triumph on the approaching exodus of the African race from the land of Egypt, when his hands should have grasped the reins of State. Let us hear what a consistent man says of the present most influential Minister of the Washington Cabinet. The person I quote is Mr. Wendell Phillips, a man as honest as he is eloquent, fanatical, if you will, upon one subject, namely, that of slavery; a most insane fanatic, no doubt, in the eyes of New York, because he is one of the few who regards his conscience more than dollars, and who thinks—

"To live by law,
Acting the law we live by without fear;
And because right is right, to follow right
Were wisdom, in the scorn of consequence."

At a meeting in the Music Hall at Boston, on June 20, 1861, he made a speech and used these expressions with regard to his former ally, who now directs the policy of the United States:—"The Republicans, led by Seward, offer to surrender anything save the Union. Their gospel is the Constitution, and the slave clause is their Sermon on the Mount. They think that at the judgment-day the blacker the sins they have committed to save the Union, the clearer will be their title to heaven." (Hear, hear.) And again:—"We look in vain through Mr. Seward's speeches for one hint or suggestion of dealing with our terrible lust. Indeed, one of his errors of disunion is, that it will give room for a European—that is, an uncompromising hostility to slavery. Such an hostility, the irrepressible conflict between right and wrong, William Seward in 1861 pronounces 'fearful.'" Mr. Phillips adds:—"Before the Union existed, Washington and Jefferson uttered the boldest anti-slavery opinions, but their sentiments would have been mobbed this very day in every city of the North: and the proof of the soundness of these views was practically exemplified by the narrow escape of Mr. Phillips from an enraged mob, on his return from the Music Hall; so well had anti-slavery Boston given heed to the lessons of its political instructors, 'to forget everywhere the negro, and to remember only the dollars.'" (Cheers and laughter.) Nothing is so extraordinary as persons in this country persisting to look on the North as the friend of the negro. Why, it is perfectly notorious that these wretched people, when in the North are treated like vermin, and shunned like leprosy. (Hear, hear.) Look at the course pursued towards them by Northern legislation, and then believe if you can, in the regards of the North for the African. If you refer to the Legislatures of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, it will be seen that every sympathy seems to have been enlisted in favour of the negro while in bondage, every hand raised against him in the North when once enfranchised. In Indiana, 1831, 'Free Negroes' and Mulattoes' Act; none of these persons to be admitted unless some white person should enter into a bond of $500 for his good behaviour and power to maintain. Illinois, still more severe—1829—forbade any black to reside within the State without giving similar bond in $1000. In Oregon—admitted into the Union in 1859—the right of voting denied to negroes, Chinamen, mulattoes; and in a clause, carried by 8640 votes to 1081, free negroes are in future denied admittance to the State:—"No free negro, or mulatto, not residing in this State at the time of this Constitution shall come, reside, or be within this State, or hold any real estate, or make any contract, or maintain any suit; and the Legislative Assembly shall provide by penal laws for the removal by public officers of all such negroes and mulattoes, and for their effectual exclusion from this State, and for the punishment of persons who shall bring them into the State." In 1862 similar enactments have been passed in Illinois—the President's own State; and yet General Hunter offers to raise 40,000 negroes to fight for the Union against their masters, he knowing well that when the war is over not one of these people will be allowed to enter those States for whose love of empire they have shed their blood. (Hear, hear.) I have been obliged to enter at this great length on the slavery question; for, though it is now beginning to be well understood, at the commencement of this conflict the issue sought to be raised by the advocates of the North was, whether the country was prepared to advocate or to disapprove of the encroachments of slavery. This shallow device has become appreciated, and the result is the utter want of sympathy which the North experiences in Europe, and which it resents by menace and abuse. (Hear, hear.) Now, I contend, if you wish to put an end to this lamentable war, if you wish at once to avert that terrible calamity which is daily increasing in intensity throughout Lancashire, you will accept the resolution before you. It has been said, if the mediation of Europe be refused, what then? Why then the next step must be the immediate recognition by Europe of the Confederate States. But it has been asked during this debate, will recognition give you one bale of cotton, and will it not entail war? I answer, it will give cotton, and it will not entail war. For, mind, I do not advocate isolated action on the part of England, which would, I know, be useless, and only add to the irritation against us in the United States. But it is perfectly notorious that France has long been anxious to interpose, to do something even more than mediate, and that we have hitherto discountenanced this interposition, and our thanks have been that we have so acted from our usual perfidious motives, that the United States might be exhausted and ruined by the war, and not from any desire of impartiality. (Hear, hear.) Now, I say, we shall not have war; for though there is hardly a folly that has not been committed by the United States, yet it is not conceivable that, hard pushed as they are by the South, they should, in addition, bring on themselves the hostility of the most powerful European nations—and for what? Why, for doing that which every State has a perfect right to do according to all received international law, namely, to recognize any Government as independent, as was clearly shown by the right hon. and learned member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside). (Hear, hear.) But I go further, and I say that the day when the interposition of Europe is announced, the war bubble in America will burst. It will be a day long remembered in Wall-street and by the speculators of New York. It is these speculators, and contractors, and manufacturers, aided by a very small minority, who are thoroughly honest in the matter, namely the ardent abolitionists, who are urging on and influencing their countrymen in this war. (Hear.) Let but the great mass of the nation once see that Europe dispassionately believes the war to be hopeless, let them see that this mediation is offered without menace, but in a frank and friendly spirit, and I am confident that very soon it will be cordially grasped at. I look on the North hitherto as being in a state of hallucination, bewildered by the din of clamour, and boasting all around and everywhere. (Hear.) It seems to have been bitten by a tarantula, and drifted into a kind of monomania; that monomania is a craving that everything about it should be vast, vaster than anything elsewhere. (Hear, hear.) It seems to reconcile itself to every privation and sacrifice, so that all about it be on the most gigantic scale. It boasts that it has the largest army in the world; it cares nothing for the cost. (Hear, hear.) It consoles itself by the reflection that if plundered its speculators are robbers of the vastest proportions. (Hear, hear.) Even Bull Run is adored for as being the greatest defeat in the memory of most living men. (Hear, hear.) And it positively exults in the reflection that within two years it will have accumulated a public debt of as great an amount as it has taken the greatest countries of worn-out and effete old Europe, centuries to incur. (Laughter.) I will read to the House an extract, sent to me by I know not who, from the Dubuque Sun, a newspaper in the State of Iowa, and this is the way a national debt is treated in America:—"The man who owes nobody is a poor, miserable being; nobody manifests interest in his welfare—nobody cares a continental cent whether he lives or dies. He is lean, hungry, and generally as poor and wretched as the pin-feathers on Job's turkey. Look at our great men—they are all debtors—owe everybody; our men of science, our authors, our sensation ministers, all, the entire cohort of them, are deeper in debt than Pharaoh's army were in the Red Sea. Debt ennobles a man; gives a more expanded and liberal view of human nature; keeps him moving, especially if he never pays rent. Nothing will cure the consumption quicker than a strong course of debt, properly taken. To owe is human, to pay is divine. Therefore, till man becomes superhuman, he should not attempt to emulate divinity. The science of payment—the true modern science—is to get in debt to somebody else whom you owe. By this means, you avoid getting out of debt, and maintain a reputation of paying. The greatness of a nation increases with its national debt. Make a note of this at ninety days." (Shouts of laughter.) Surely no one can believe that this state of things can continue in a country of prudent, educated men; and every mail brings us intelligence that moderate counsels are beginning to make themselves heard. If the great Powers of Europe offer their mediation in respectful and friendly terms, it will arouse thousands who are desirous of peace, but who have hitherto been crushed and kept down by violence and the intoxication of success. (Hear, hear.) It will have this good effect, too—that it will permit the impulse for peace to arise among the Americans themselves. It can inflict no wound on their pride and spirit of independence. It asks them to do nothing more than what their wisest and best citizens have advocated in the days when the Union was yet unthreatened. I would that over every door-post in the United States were graven at this moment the eloquent words of Mr. J. Quincy Adams, once a President of the United States, who, at the New York Historical Society, at the jubilee of the Constitution, 1839, expressed himself in this noble language:—"But the indissoluble link of union between the people of the several States of this Confederate nation is, after all, not in the right, but in the heart. If the day should ever come (may Heaven avert it!) when the affections of the people of these States shall be alienated from each other; when the fraternal spirit shall give way to cold indifference, or collisions of interest shall fester into hatred, the bands of political association will not long hold together parties no longer attracted by the magnetism of conciliated interests and kindly sympathies; and far better will it be for the people of the disunited States to part in friendship from each other, than to be held together by constraint. Then will be the time for reverting to the precedent, which occurred at the formation and adoption of the Constitution, to form again a more perfect Union, by dissolving that which could no longer bind, and to leave the separated parts to be reunited, by the law of political gravitation, to the centre." (Cheers.) There will shortly be a lull of arms when the great heat prevents military operations; therefore I pray you to avail yourselves of this opportunity. Give us peace for a little, even though it be but an armistice, and all may yet be well. The hon. member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor) says peace can be but a hollow truce. That I utterly deny. (Hear.) Fierce and vindictive as may be now the passions of both combatants, yet time, the healer of all things, scars over the deepest wound. Give us peace, and I do not despair, even in this darkest hour, that though the United States of Washington be no more, yet that the traditions of Washington may prevail on both sides of the boundary, and a great future yet be in store for those two vast Republics. If monarchies can exist side by side of each other, without strife and variance, why may not Republics? Rivalries there may be, but rivalries in progress, and in the arts of peace. I contend, if you will only help, that there is still hope that less hot and more Christian counsels may prevail, and that these two Republics may take their onward course, diverging, but not hostile, independent, yet not forgetful of their common origin, bidding each other farewell, in the language of Abraham to Lot—"Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me; let there be no strife between me and thee, for we are brethren." (Loud cheers.)

Mr. FITZGERALD moved the adjournment of the debate. Lord PALMERSTON.—I should hope, after the length to which the debate has gone, that the House will be disposed to come to a division to-night (cheers) on the motion of the hon. member for Sunderland. The subject which we have been debating is one of the highest importance, and one also of the most delicate character (hear, hear), and I cannot think that the postponement of the conclusion of this debate till next week can be attended with any beneficial result, either one way or other. (Cheers.) I confess I regret very much that my hon. friend has thought it his duty to bring this subject under discussion in this House in the present state of things. (Cheers.) There can be but one wish on the part of every man in the country with respect to this war in America, and that is that it should end. (Hear.) I might doubt whether any end which can be satisfactory, or which could lead to an amicable settlement between the two parties, is likely to be accelerated by angry debates in this House. (Cheers.) We have had to-night the American war waged here, in words, by champions on both sides. It is quite true that many things have been said which must be gratifying to the feelings of both parties now fighting in America; but, on the other hand, things have been said in the warmth of debate which must tend to irritate and wound the feelings of both sides, and it is in human nature to think more of things that are offensive, than of things which are gratifying and friendly. I confess, therefore, that I regret that the debate has been brought on, and I should earnestly hope that the House would not agree to the motion of my hon. friend, but would leave it in the hands of the Government, to deal with the future, content as I believe the country is with the manner in which the past has been conducted by them. (Cheers.) I don't ask this upon the ground of confidence in the Government of the day, because I think that whatever party might have the rule in this country—whoever might sit on these benches—it would be wise and expedient in the House to leave a matter of such difficulty, of such delicacy, and of such immense importance in the hands of the responsible Government of the day (hear, hear), to deal with it according to the varying circumstances of the moment, and not by a resolution to dictate and point out a specific course, and to tie up their hands, thus taking upon the House of Commons the responsibility which ought properly to belong to the Government. (Cheers.) The motion of my hon. friend points to two courses—mediation and acknowledgment. We have heard a very learned and well-argued speech from the right hon. gentleman opposite on the question of acknowledgment. I am not going to dispute that if this country thought it right to take that course we should be perfectly justified in acknowledging the independence of the Southern States, provided only that that independence had been—in the words which he used—"firmly and permanently established." (Hear, hear.) Moreover, I quite concur with him that our acknowledgment of that independence, if we thought right to make it, would be no just cause of war, no just cause of offence on the part of the United States as against this country. But the cases which the right hon. gentleman cited—more especially the cases of the South American republics—were totally different from that which is now presented to our consideration. (Hear, hear.) The South American republics were not acknowledged till a great many years after they had practically achieved and obtained their independence. That was a war between them and Spain—separated by the wide Atlantic from her revolted subjects—and unable with any degree of power to re-establish her authority over them; and, I believe, it was nearly fifteen years—certainly a great many years—before their independence was acknowledged. But what was the state of affairs in this case until the uncertain rumours we have received this day? A fortnight ago it was doubtful whether the Confederates or the Federals would be in possession of Richmond. It was but a few days ago that we imagined that the whole course of the Mississippi was in the hands of the Federals—we knew that New Orleans, and possibly Charleston, were in their hands, and, I contend, that up to the present moment, whatever may be the opinion which anybody may entertain of the resolution of this great determined nation of the South to fight to the last for the maintenance of its independence, practically the contest has not yet assumed the character which would justify this country in assuming that that independence was permanently and fully established. (Cheers.) But, then, many people who talk of acknowledgment seem to imply that that acknowledgment, if made, would establish some different relations between this country and the Southern States. But that is not the case. Acknowledgment would not establish a nation unless it were followed by some direct active interference. (Hear, hear.) Neutrality, as was well observed by the right hon. gentleman opposite, is perfectly compatible with acknowledgment. You may be neutral in a war between two countries whose independence you never called in question. Two long-established countries go to war; you acknowledge the independence of both, but you are not on that account bound to take part in the contest. (Hear.) The right hon. gentleman argued that we had taken a step towards acknowledgment by admitting that the South had belligerent rights, but Vattel and all the best authorities on the law of nations hold that when a civil war breaks out in a country, and is firmly established there, other nations have a right to deal with those two parties as belligerents, without acknowledging the independence of the revolted portion of the country. (Hear, hear.) Admitting that the war has been established on such a footing that each party is entitled to be regarded by other countries as belligerents, the mere fact of our having acknowledged that those two parties are belligerents in the international sense of the word does not imply a step towards acknowledging one or other of them as an independent nation. Nobody can be insensible for a moment of the vast importance to this country of a speedy termination of that war. (Hear, hear.) We all know the privations and sufferings which a great portion of our population are enduring in consequence of that unfortunate war; but, on the other hand, it has been well put by an hon. gentleman who spoke in this debate that any attempt to put an end to it by active interference would only produce greater evils, greater sufferings, and greater privations to those who interfered. (Hear, hear.) There is no instance, I believe, in the history of the world, of a contest such as that which is now going on in America—a contest of such magnitude between two different sections of the same people. The Thirty Years' War in Germany was a joke to it in point of amount and magnitude. It was but the other day that I saw a map sent by the Quartermaster-General of the Federal forces, on which were marked out the positions of 720,000 Federal troops. We now hear that 300,000 more men are to be called into the field—making 1,000,000 of men on one side and probably there is something not much less on the other. Irritation and exasperation on both sides are admitted by all who have taken part in the debate, and it is that the moment when it can be thought that a successful offer of mediation could be made to the two parties? (Hear.) My hon. friend said "I don't care for that; we had better offer mediation and let it be refused, and, if that were followed by acknowledgment, that acknowledgment would ultimately lead to a satisfactory settlement between the two parties." I wish to guard myself against anything in regard to the future. The events of this war have been so contrary to all anticipations, from time to time, that he would be a bold man indeed who should attempt to prophesy from month to month what character the war would assume. (Hear.) I believe the country and this House are of opinion that the Government has up to the present time pursued a wise and prudent course. (Cheers.) We should be too happy if any opportunity should present itself which would afford us a fair and reasonable prospect that any effort on our part might be conducive to establish peace between these two parties who are carrying on a desolating and afflicting contest, but I think that the House had better leave it to the discretion of the Government to judge of the occasions which may arise, and of the opportunities which may present themselves. (Hear, hear.) It is upon that ground that, without going into any investigation of the rights on either side as to which may be right and which wrong, without expressing any judgment—because I think it is the duty of the Government of this country to abstain from expressing any judgment upon the two parties—I ask the House not to sanction this resolution. If at any time we should be able by friendly offices to contribute to the establishment of peace, it can be only by presenting ourselves in the shape of impartial persons not tied by opinions either one way or the other, anxious only to promote that settlement between the two which may be consistent with the feelings and interests of both. It is only in that way that we can render any service, and, in order to remain in that position, to enjoy that character, it is necessary that we should avoid pronouncing any judgment or opinion. I therefore do not follow the example of those who have expressed opinions upon the merits of the two parties. I only entered the House not to adopt the resolution of my hon. friend (hear, hear), but to leave to the responsible Government the task of judging what can be done, when it can be done, and how it can be done. (Cheers.)

Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD confessed that he never rose to address the House with a greater sense of responsibility than that with which he was then impressed—not because he presumed to suppose that any opinion of his was of greater weight than that of other members, but because the words of every gentleman who took part in this debate would be severely scanned in a community where the minds and judgments of men had been distorted and disturbed, and their passions roused by a contest which it would be difficult to parallel in the annals of the world. (Hear, hear.) His hon. friend (Mr. Lindsay) had been found fault with for bringing forward a motion which, it was said, was likely to produce great exasperation in America. Now, it appeared to him that fault was found with the motion, not for what it was, but for what it was not. True, its wording had been altered, but that was a proof that his hon. friend desired to meet the objections which might be supposed to attach to it in its original shape; and it would be difficult to point out any particular in which the motion better deserved commendation than from the extreme caution and moderation which now characterized it. (Hear.) His hon. friend proposed that Her Majesty's Government should attempt mediation, upon the ground that the Confederate States had long preserved a separate Government, and shown a determination to maintain their independence; and he must say that until he heard the speech of the noble lord, he should have thought it difficult for any one to disagree with the terms of the resolution. The Confederate States had maintained not only a separate Government, but an established Government, with a recognized Constitution, a President, a Senate, and House of Representatives duly elected, constituencies who exercised an independent choice, and elections freely conducted. They had not only a large army in the field, but for upwards of a year had maintained and paid a body of troops numbering not less than 300,000. (Hear, hear.) When, therefore, the hon. member (Mr. Forster) advanced a policy of strict non-interference, he would ask what circumstance could possibly justify interference if these did not—not a forcible or coercive interference, but a friendly mediation, tendered in the most respectful and friendly tone? (Hear, hear.) Could anything more shocking be pointed out in history than the cruel warfare now being waged in America? (Hear, hear.) They heard of father being arrayed against son, and brother against brother; but this was not all. The contest was a sanguinary one, which it was impossible to parallel in modern times. It was said that the two armies had lately fought for seven consecutive days, and that in the last three days the killed, wounded, and missing amounted to upwards of 40,000. Numbers like these appeared almost incredible, yet there was reason to suppose that the accounts were not overcharged; and one statement in a Southern newspaper was that a Southern division, which on the fourth day went into action 14,000 strong, could next morning only muster 6000. Surely a friendly ally ought, at the earliest possible moment, to interpose, and by mediation try to stop so dreadful a contest. (Hear.) But it was not only on account of the state of things in America that we were called upon to interfere. He was struck with astonishment by what seemed the utter inability of the noble lord and other gentlemen to realize the magnitude of the disaster which was impending over us. (Hear.) That there should be a want of employment in the cotton districts for a certain time was not all. A cotton famine was not like a corn famine. When the potatoe crop failed one year in Ireland or the wheat crop in England, there was always the prospect and the hope that in the year following the kindly fruits of the earth would be enjoyed in due season. But the cotton crop required large capital combined with skill and industry. In the cotton producing States of America capital was destroyed the system of servitude was disturbed, and even if peace were brought about to-morrow it would be impossible to obtain that steady and ample supply of cotton which we had been in the habit of receiving. (Hear.) Then, again, although the patience and self-reliance of the population in the North were worthy of all praise, and though he believed that this self-respect and regard for order on the part of the bulk of the population would continue, was it quite certain that agitators might not find opportunities of spreading discontent, and that next winter might not be marked by as much social disorder as this was, unhappily, sure to be marked by social misery? (Hear, hear.) He thought, then, that we should be wanting in our duty to our own population, as well as to humanity in general, if we did not step forward and, by peaceful mediation, try to put an end to this odious contest. (Hear, hear.) He was told that this course would have no effect unless it were followed up by forcible intervention; but he did not believe that this was a fair estimate of the effect of mediation. His hon. friend proposed, not that this country should alone offer its mediation, or that we should recognize the South and afterwards call on the Federal Government to accept our good offices, but that, in concert with our allies, we should express our conviction, as the result of careful observation of all that has been passing during the last eighteen months, that it was impossible that there should be any other issue to this war than a separation between North and South. Coupled with this there would be an attempt to enforce our conviction, not by arms, but by the whole weight of our moral influence and authority. He believed that if we were to tender to the people of the United States our good offices to promote some terms of arrangement, it would have the best effect, because it would give to the sensible and moderate portion of the American people an opportunity of expressing opinions which were now overborne amid the din of war. (Hear.) A proof of this was afforded by what happened after the Trent affair, when, the first excitement having passed away, every moderate paper admitted that the North must be wrong, and must have exceeded their rights, since all the Powers of Europe declared this was so, combining for the purpose from no motives of self-interest, but merely in defence of the law of nations. Perhaps at first the North might be irritated by an offer of mediation, but he believed that they would ultimately listen with respect and deference to the collected opinion of Europe, and we should then enjoy the proud satisfaction of having contributed as far as we could to the attainment of so satisfactory an end. (Hear.) He did not know whether his hon. friend intended to take the responsibility of proceeding to a division, or the almost equal responsibility of withdrawing the motion; but in his heart of hearts he so entirely agreed with it that if his hon. friend pressed the motion he should certainly support it by his vote. (Hear.) However this might be, he was sure that in the line now taken by the Government a more weighty and serious responsibility was incurred by them than had almost ever been incurred by any other Government in modern times. (Hear.) A policy of non-interference might be the part of prudence and of wisdom. It might arise from indecision or from timid and divided councils. (Hear, hear.) He did not know what course the Government might hereafter take, but he felt assured that if they were only prepared to accept the responsibility of being the first to initiate in Europe the policy of inviting—in conjunction with the Powers of the Continent—the contending States of America to come to a settlement of their differences, they would have the satisfaction of knowing that they had taken a step which might have the effect of restoring peace to one hemisphere, and contentment and prosperity to the suffering people of another. (Hear, hear.) Thus, without the expense of a single shilling, or the loss of a single human life, might they confer a great blessing on those who were our kindred; but whether they took that course or not the hon. member for Sunderland would have the gratification resulting from the fact that he had done his best by proposing the resolution which he had submitted to the House to bring about so desirable an object, while those who sat on the Opposition benches would have the satisfaction of knowing that they supported the resolution. (Hear.)

The motion for the adjournment of the debate was then withdrawn.

Mr. HORWOOD, in whose name a notice stood on the paper to the effect that it was his intention to move "that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to use every means consistent with the maintenance of peace, either in concert with the Great Powers of Europe or otherwise, as they may think it expedient, to endeavour to terminate the civil war now raging in America," said he did not feel disposed to take the course suggested for the adoption of the hon. member for Sunderland, and withdraw his motion. Very little had been said in the course of the discussion with respect to the distressed operatives of Lancashire and Cheshire, of whom 197,000 were working short time, while 58,990 were altogether without employment. (Cries of "Divide! divide!" from the benches below the gangway on the Ministerial side.) He was sorry to perceive the spirit in which those hon. members who professed to be the friends of the operatives seemed inclined to deal with their case (hear, hear); but he should implore the Government, in the name of justice and charity, as well as in the interests of humanity, to take some steps to put an end to the misery which the unhappy struggle in America was creating, not only in that country, but our own.

Mr. LYNOSAY then asked the permission of the House to withdraw his motion, observing that he would rest satisfied with the statement of the noble lord at the head of the Government, and the hope which it held out that he would take the earliest opportunity to bring about the termination of the war.

The motion was then withdrawn.

THE AMENITIES OF THE UNITED STATES' CONGRESS.

The following scene in the House of Representatives is suggestive, and, therefore, despite its coarseness, we reproduce it:—

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the private calendar.

Mr. ALLEN, of Ohio, obtained the floor, and in the course of his remarks he referred to a statement made some time ago by Mr. RICHARDSON, of Illinois, relative to the cost of supporting and maintaining the negroes in the city of Washington. He was interrupted by

Mr. BLAKE, of Ohio, who said that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. Richardson), was not sustained by any authentic information, and so far indeed from that statement being true, it was very wide of the truth. I do not mean to say that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. Richardson) meant to represent any body, but there are no facts in any such statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Illinois, (pulling up his sleeves and attitudinizing) asked menacingly, "do I understand that gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Blake) to deny that the Government was paying $200 per day for the employment and support of the negroes?"

Mr. BLAKE—I deny that that statement in your speech is true, to the effect that there were two thousand rations per day issued to contrabands, equal to four hundred dollars per day, in this district alone, in violation of law.

Mr. RICHARDSON—That speech was made on the 19th of May, and no member in this House has dared to arise in his place and deny a single statement in it until now.

Mr. BLAKE—Because no man could get the floor for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON (excitedly)—Ah! sir, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Blake), states a falsehood, when he states no gentleman could get the floor. No gentleman has risen in his place and denied the statement, when there was time to raise an investigating committee to examine into it, and I charge the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Blake), and every other gentleman who denies it, with stating a falsehood.

Mr. BLAKE—And I charge the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. Richardson), with uttering what is utterly untrue and unfounded, and I am ready to back that up.

Mr. RICHARDSON (advancing menacingly)—Are you? We will see.

Mr. BLAKE—I am not to be intimidated by your threats, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON (with another pull at his coat sleeve) advanced a few steps towards Mr. Blake, but was stopped by the Sergeant-at-arms, who kept him at bay, while he scowled at Mr. Blake, who cried out from his stand-point, "Let him come on."

Mr. RICHARDSON (at the top of his voice)—The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Blake) is a God d—n liar.

[There were not more than two dozen members in the Hall at the time, and those at once began to concentrate at hearing these words.]

Mr. BLAKE walked over towards Mr. Richardson's seat, and stooped towards him with the evident intention of explaining away the misunderstanding that had followed from the remarks, but instantly—

Mr. RICHARDSON cried out at the top of his voice, "God d—n you, get out of this—clear out!"

Finally order was restored, and Mr. ALLEN concluded his remarks.

Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, whose writings are a text-book among Abolitionists, when Secretary of State under Mr. Monroe, in 1820, wrote a letter to Mr. Rush, then our minister at London, discussing the right of the British Government to emancipate American slaves captured during the war of 1812-14, in which he says:—"The principle is, that the emancipation of enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate war—as relates to the owners, it is a destruction of private property, nowhere warranted by the usages of war." Again, he says:—"In the statement of the British ground of argument upon the claim in the submission, they have broadly asserted the right of emancipating slaves—private property—as a legitimate right of war. This is utterly incomprehensible on the part of a nation whose subjects hold slaves by millions, and who, in this very treaty, recognizes them as private property. No such right is acknowledged as a law of war by writers who admit any limitation. The right of putting to death all prisoners of war in cold blood, and without special cause, might as well be represented to be a law of war, or the right to use poisoned weapons, or to assassinate." So even the Gazette's omnipotent "war power" confers no authority, according to Mr. Adams, to emancipate slaves.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE, Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants, GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN, Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN, Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDINE AND CO., Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA. Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rumford-place, Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO., Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS. Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool. Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER, Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.

Represented by
JOS. T. ROBINSON & CO.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO., South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO., Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE, GALLEGOS FLOUR MILLS. This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON, TREDEGAR IRON WORKS. Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines, all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c., RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO., General Commission Merchants, RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO., Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton, Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE, Commission Merchant, ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer, MANCHESTER. Three and Six Cord Spool Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE, Serpentine, &c.; F. RINALDO AND NEAVEY, New Orleans.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM, Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON, Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND. American Drills of all kinds, Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO., Commission Merchants, MOBILE and NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A. Represented by R. G. BEELEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY, Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN, Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms. 102, Fleet-street, London.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDERICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published the following Catalogues of their Stock:—

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books.—Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature, History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature, History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP-CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages, History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History, Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London, and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organized, classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING. Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organized in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interests that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies. Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganized trade. The object of this Agency is threefold:—

- 1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.
- 2nd. To advertise Southern business, property, &c., in European journals.
- 3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee a return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier, 17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

GENTLEMEN requiring an excellent Tailor are recommended to the establishments of A. M. GAUTIER, 229, Regent-street, London (above Verrey's Restaurant), and 20, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris.

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC. On Wednesday, the 30th, will be published, in 1 vol. 8vo.

THOMAS JEFFERSON: an Historical View of Democracy in America. By CORNELIUS DE WITT. Translated, with the Author's sanction, by R. S. H. CHURCH. London: LONGMAN, GREEN, AND CO., 14, Ludgate-hill.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company. The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after the second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
D. Jamison.
J. R. Miltenberger.
J. R. Miltenberger.
J. A. Bohn.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE:..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending 31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st December, 1861..... 262,008 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent. interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem the Scrip of 1857.

Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on and after 10th February next.

Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable on and after 1st January, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.

JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.

New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE: Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 25th February, 1861..... 609,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending 25th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending 25th February, 1861..... 866,420 98

The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent. interest on outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem the Scrip of 1859.

Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable on and after the second Monday of May next.

Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BIGGS, President.

H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.

New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent. interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Poutz.
C. Honold.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
R. F. Voelker.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE: Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,959 59

The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent. of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861;
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on and after the 12th day of August next.

THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERICAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.
These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent. prime.

PATENT PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up into Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, or for the purpose of evading the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 329th section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship, or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry, or to permit to be carried, in any ship, or any other goods which in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of consigning or sending the same to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum Stamped. Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XIV. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political, social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent, commercial, however remote, however small the class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thought, that even now—when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This co-operation has been most generously accorded us. There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no outlet through the muzzled press of those States. Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible misapprehension—that it is not the sole object. Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance. "THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers, and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, Fleet-street, London E.C. July 31, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I—No. 15.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 7, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	225
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	226
Manchester Letter	226
THE TOBACCO MARKET	226
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
List of Killed and Wounded	226
PRIVATE LETTERS	229
DEBATE ON LORD CAMPELL'S MOTION	230
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	230
Paris	230
LEADERS—
The Extension of the War	232
The American Question in the House of Lords..	232
The Last Card of the North	233
British Protection	234
Editorial	234
THE CRUISE OF THE SUMTER—
A Cruise in the Western Ocean	235
At Cadiz	235
Burning of the Neapolitan	235
REVIEWS—
Southern Statistics—
Crime and Pauperism	236
Short Notices	236
THE HUNT OF THE NASHVILLE	237
PROCLAMATION OF THE GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA ..	237
Do. do. LOUISIANA	238
LETTER TO THE EDITOR	237
ADVERTISEMENTS	240

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN is no longer the great man of the age. The public confidence is shaken in his generalship. His most sanguine friends admit he is not a man of action, and his strategy is not of a character to compensate for other shortcomings. We are no longer treated to any of the Young Napoleon's promising despatches, and for the time he is not the observed of all observers. But if the last reports are true, and the Confederates under General Jackson are concentrating their lines on the James River, we may shortly hear of some further strategic movements of General M'Clellan. It seems that Generals Halleck and M'Clellan have had a consultation at Fort Monroe, and, assuredly, "the wise man from the West" can tell the commander of the army of the Potomac how to capture any number of prisoners without leaving his entrenchments.

General "Stonewall" Jackson is asserted to be at four places at the same time. He is at Gordonsville; he is marching on Harper's Ferry; he is pursuing General Pope; and he is at the James River. It is amusing, as well as surprising, that the Federals are so completely in the dark as to the Confederate movements. General Beauregard, who was last week asserted to be at Chattanooga, is now said to be in command of 30,000 men on the James River, between City Point and Richmond. It is rumoured that General M'Clellan's army is very sickly, and that the reinforcements coming in are not sufficient to replace the numbers daily incapacitated for service by sickness. Another significant feature is the announcement, generally credited in Washington, that the resignations of Federal officers are numerous and increasing.

General Pope has issued orders to the military to seize all horses, mules, and stores in their vicinity not absolutely needed by the inhabitants of the surrounding country. All the inhabitants must take the oath of allegiance, or be sent North. The inhabitants who break the oath will be shot. It is much easier to tyrannize over inhabitants of the country than to combat the armies; so General Pope has chosen the easier, if not the better, part.

The news from Kentucky is rather meagre. It is rumoured by the North that General Morgan has retired into Tennessee through Cumberland Gap. This is a proof that the reported occupation of Cumberland Gap by the Federals is false. If General Morgan has gone into Tennessee, it is not impossible that the movement is strategic, and that the object is to co-operate against Halleck. The rumours in respect to Nashville are contradictory. In one case we are informed that "the Confederates are reported to have retired from before Nashville, and the fears of an attack upon that city have subsided;" and in another telegram, that "great excitement prevails at Nashville. The Federal pickets have been driven in, and the Confederates are reported to be within five miles of that city." It is also reported that the Confederates have crossed the Tennessee River in force, under three generals; and altogether, we think it not improbable that we may shortly hear of some important movements in Tennessee. If any reliance can be placed in Northern news, the Confederates are in great force in that State; and at this distance from the scene of action, to close in upon the Federal position seems a natural and politic movement. No one can glance at a map of the Southern States without perceiving the critical position occupied by the Federal troops in Tennessee.

The Governor of Ohio finds it so difficult to raise troops, that he threatens a conscription unless the quota is forthcoming in forty days. In consequence of the Confederate capture of Greenville, the Governor of Missouri has ordered the organization of the entire militia of that State. In Kansas General Lane has been authorized to raise troops without regard to colour.

Vicksburg is not captured, and is no longer attacked. The Federal fleet has been repulsed in an attempt to destroy the Confederate ram Arkansas, and the waters of the Mississippi fell so low that the Federal flotilla could not act. Commander Porter is at Washington, "and his mortar fleet supposed to be in Hampton Roads;" and Commodore Farragut has left Vicksburg, with his fleet, and gone to New Orleans.

The following is the Confederate official report of the engagement between the ram Arkansas and the Federal fleet:—

Vicksburg, July 15.

We engaged to-day from six to eight a.m. with the enemy's fleet above Vicksburg, consisting of four or more iron-clad vessels and two heavy sloops of war, and four gunboats and seven or eight rams. We drove an iron-clad ashore with colours down and disabled, blew up a ram, burned one vessel, and damaged several others. Our smoke-stack was so shot to pieces that we lost steam, and could not use our vessel as a ram. We were otherwise cut up, as we engaged at close quarters. Loss—10 killed and 15 wounded, others with slight wounds.

ISAAC N. BROWN, Lieutenant Commanding.

The Federals have a wholesome dread of these rams. The New York World says there is no doubt that the Confederates have constructed a formidable iron ram at Richmond, and urges the Federal Government "to be on its guard against an attack in the James River similar to the raid of the Merrimac in Hampton Roads."

There has been a riot at St. Louis. The telegraph summary says:—

Considerable excitement has prevailed in the British Consul's office at St. Louis, through a number of persons claiming the protection of the British flag to exempt them from military enrolment. Many persons who were attempting to get protection papers were severely handled by the mob. A detachment of the provost guard was ordered out, who, by timely exertion suppressed the outbreak.

Either an attempt has been made to enlist British subjects, or the military service is so distasteful that the people resort to any extremity to avoid enlistment. Still more important is the intelligence that a plot has been discovered, in which some of the principal inhabitants of St. Louis are implicated, to seize the city on behalf of the Confederates. This, together with the intimation that "the number of guerilla bands increases in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri," shows how universal is the uprising.

General Butler has recognized Mr. Coppell, the acting British Consul at New Orleans. He did this on the request of Commander Harrell, of the British sloop Rinaldo, who acted upon Lord Lyons' instructions. Mr. Kennedy Johnson, engaged in investigating the case of the seizure of the money deposited at the Dutch Consulate, has found it necessary to suggest several modifications of General Butler's policy.

A riot has been caused in the streets of New Orleans by the arrest of a lady for wearing a secession badge. The determined loyalty and boldness of the people of New Orleans must be galling to General Butler, or, as he would express it, "more than flesh and blood can bear."

The report that the Confederates demanded the surrender of General Butler for the murder of Mr. Mumford, and that if refused they would hang General M'Call, has arisen from an article in the Augusta Constitutionalist, which says "that the Confederate Government has now in its hands several hundred Federal officers of high military and social rank, and thinks that the present is the moment to demand atonement for General Butler's atrocities at New Orleans. The Constitutionalist thinks that retribution should be demanded for the blood of the man who was hung at New Orleans for hauling down the Federal flag, and urges "that thirty Federal officers be closely imprisoned until General Butler is delivered up, or until he falls into the hands of the Confederates by the chances of war." We may observe that it is not certain that Mr. Mumford did haul down the flag, though, of course, that act, at the time of its alleged occurrence, would not justify his execution.

The appointment of General Halleck to the command of all the land forces of the United States has not given rise to much comment. His former career is not calculated to impress confidence; but then, his administration cannot be worse than that of Mr. Lincoln and his War Secretary, Mr. Stanton.

The enlistments continue very inactive, and further inducements are offered from day to day yet labour is so scarce, that a railroad company in New York lately advertised for fifty labourers, and did not receive any applications. The Philadelphia Municipality has apportioned $500,000 for volunteer bounty. If Mr. Lincoln raises the 300,000 men he demands, it will be by far the most costly army in the world.

By two specific and formal acts the United States Government has recognized the Confederate States as a belligerent and foreign Power. The first is a proclamation issued by Mr. Lincoln, authorizing the military commanders to seize and use for the Federal army all property, real and personal, in the Confederate States which may be necessary for military purposes. "Property may be destroyed for military purposes, but not otherwise. The military and naval commanders shall employ as many negroes for labourers as can be advantageously used for military or naval purposes, and pay them wages." If Secession had still been treated as rebellion, the authorization would have been limited to the property of rebels.

The second act of recognition is an arrangement for the exchange of prisoners, entered into between General Dix, on the part of the Federal Government, and General Lee, on the part of the Confederate Government, upon the basis of a similar arrangement between England and the United States in 1812.

In the midst of their gloomy despair, the people of New York are clamouring for an Emancipation Act. According to the telegram—

Several Committees, composed of the Mayor and all the leading men of wealth and influence in the commercial and legal community of New York, have passed numerous strong resolutions declaring the present time to be the crisis of the rebellion—that no qualified Unionism should longer be permitted, and that it is far better that every rebel should perish than that one more loyal man should die. The Committees, therefore, earnestly call upon President Lincoln immediately to issue an Emancipation proclamation. "This," they say, "will diminish the rebel army by calling many rebel officers and men to the defence of their homes. The Free States and the whole civilized world will applaud the Emancipation proclamation."

We should be disgusted with the cold-blooded and sanguinary atrocity of the calculation of stirring up a servile war and destroying millions of our race, but the project is so futile that we can afford to laugh at it. The negroes have manifested their faithful affection for their masters, and if they take any part in the contest, would rather act against the North, that hates them so bitterly, than against those who feed, clothe, and care for them. It is not impossible that these Committees may be the tools of others, and that the object of their proceedings may be to get up a riot, and justify the placing of New York under the care of a Vigilance Committee. It is hardly credible that sane men occupying respectable positions would lend themselves to such schemes, except for some ulterior purpose.

The Secession members of the Baltimore Municipality have twice rejected a resolution for making an appropriation for volunteers; and being subjected to the threatenings of the mob, have resigned. The New York Press is certainly justified in calling Baltimore "a hot bed of Secession."

It is now officially reported that the Federal loss in the recent battles before Richmond was 16,000 men. From this official estimate we may conceive how tremendous must have been the actual loss.

Generals Halleck, Burnside, and Pope are at Washington, attending a War Council with the Federal Cabinet.

We are not surprised to hear that "much public despondency exists, and the people appear inclined to take more gloomy views of the position of affairs than at any time since the commencement of the struggle;" and further, that "for the last three days a general feeling of uneasiness has prevailed in all circles." It is impossible to imagine a more dispiriting crisis, whether we look to the military or the financial position. Coin, as a circulating medium, has almost entirely disappeared, and a total paralyzation of trade—even retail trade—is imminent.

Three British steamers have been captured. The Tubal Cain, off Charleston; the Adela, east of Abaco; and the Star of the East, by the custom-house officers at New York. The last-named vessel took out a clearance for Long Cay, in the Bahamas, and it was asserted her cargo consisted of goods well adapted to the use of the Confederates; hence her seizure. Now, we should like to know what goods are not adapted to the use of the Confederates? Upon this pretence, a vessel laden with pins and needles, boots and shoes, ladies' dresses, or any other article of merchandize, might be seized. The Federal Government has thought proper to blockade the Bahamas; but even though, as in the case of Nassau, we are, according to Earl Russell, bound to submit to the blockade of a British port, the blockade ought to be announced and gazetted.

President Lincoln has issued an order forbidding military commanders from exacting the oath of allegiance from foreigners. In all cases where an alien is deprived of his liberty a full account of the circumstances must be sent to the War Department, for the consideration of the State Department. The marvel is, that military commanders should have been so ignorant or so lawless as to exact an oath of allegiance from foreigners.

It is rumoured that General Fremont is to have a command in Texas.

Mr. Lincoln has made a strong appeal to the Border States' members in favour of an Emancipation policy, and he has received an unfavourable reply.

It is currently reported that the demand of the Governors of States for 300,000 men was fabricated in Washington after the defeat of McClellan, and that the signatures of the Governors were solicited after the publication of the document purporting to have been already signed by them.

Ex-President Buren died on July 24, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

In another page will be found a report of the debate in the House of Lords, on Monday night, upon Lord Campbell's motion for the production of papers.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 6, 1862.

Our last report left the market very strong on the basis of 18½d. for middling Orleans, and 13½d. to 13¾d. for fair Dhollerah. On Thursday the buoyancy of the previous few days continued, the sales reached 10,000 bales, and prices of American and long-stapled cotton were rather dearer. On Friday the business again reached 10,000, and in the afternoon, on receipt of a good report from Manchester, rather higher prices were paid. The returns for the week show that the trade took 16,000 and exporters 14,000 bales; of these amounts 7000 were American, leaving the stock in port only 36,000 bales—at this rate of outgoing our little remnant of stock would be totally exhausted in five weeks!

On Saturday the sales were again 10,000 bales at ½d. to ¾d. advance, with a very strong feeling in the market.

On Monday the Europa's news came to hand, with dates from New York to 24th ult. These were miscellaneous in their nature, and contained few items of importance. Gold had receded to 17 per cent. premium, and exchange was quoted lower. Our market opened well, and the sales reached 10,000 bales at firm prices. Yesterday the Norwegian's news, by telegraph, to 28th ult., were received in the forenoon; cotton had declined 4 cents in New York, and exchange was again rather lower. The Times published a letter from its New York correspondent, in which he referred, in very strong language, to the gloomy feeling that pervaded the Northern people and the impossibility of obtaining the levies required, without resorting to conscription. This had a slightly damping effect on our market, and the sales only reached 5000 bales at previous prices. In Manchester the market ruled extremely firm at a further advance. The good India accounts, together with the reduced production that has now come into play, served to give confidence to holders. The City of New York, with two days' later, via Cape Race, was telegraphed this afternoon. Exchange had declined to 127, and cotton, after considerable fluctuations in price, closed at 46 cents for Middling Uplands. The market opened well this morning, but as the day advanced the demand fell off, and the sales only reached 5000 bales at slightly easier prices for Smuts, but very full rates for American, leaving our quotations respectively 18½d., 18¾d., and 19d. for middling Bowed, Mobiles, and Orleans; 13½d. to 13¾d. for Fair Dhollerah and Omrawatta, and 14½d. for Fair Brough.

The speculative feeling for the moment seems to have calmed down, and there is evidently a desire on the part of operators to wait for a further development of the policy which the North intends to pursue. But it is evident that our small stock of American must attract much greater attention from speculators than has yet taken place, and prices must be pushed up till the demand from the trade and exporters is reduced to one-half, or even one-third, of its present small proportions.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, Aug. 5, 1862.

From Tuesday to Friday our market was considerably better, both for yarns and goods, especially in those kinds suitable for shipment.

In yarns the German buyers have been doing business freely; and where they could meet with the following numbers spun from American cotton entirely, an advance of 1d. per lb. was paid—viz., for 4s. to 40s. male; 30s. water; 40s. to 60s. double, and 30s. pin-cops. Low numbers in warps have also partaken of the advance.

Notwithstanding this advance having been obtained for the above counts, Nos. 20s. to 24s. water, 16s. to 26s. pin-cops, although spun from American cotton, could not be got rid of by sellers at any advance upon last week's rates, as there are many second-hand lots of these qualities, in the hands of speculators, to compete with.

There being very little water-twist spun at present, especially from American cotton, this class of yarn must rise very rapidly in price, as the continental merchants are very bare of stock, having at this season of the year in ordinary times a four to five months' stock beforehand, whilst at present they have no more than a month's stock to work upon.

The later telegrams from Bombay up to the 12th, and Calcutta the 11th July, received here on Thursday, have imparted a better feeling to our cloth market in general. Some little business was done in India shirtings on Friday, at an advance of 1½d. to 3d. per piece. Jaconets were firm, at last week's quotations. Printers were more in demand; and as stocks of these goods are lighter, an advance of 3d. per piece was obtained. Long cloths, Madapolams, T-cloths, and Domestic were rather higher than on Tuesday.

Yarn agents, who supply manufacturers with material, are receiving instructions every day from their different clients to resell for them stated quantities of yarn, as they intend to close their works.

To-day our market has been very irregular in price for yarns, and the total amount of business has been small. 20s. water has advanced ¾d. per lb., 24s. 1d. per lb., and for 30s. ditto, spun from American cotton, as much as 3d. per lb. advance has been obtained. Nos. 40s. to 60s. double are 1½d. per lb., and yarns for the home trade are from ½d. to ¾d. per lb. higher than last Tuesday.

India shirtings are at about Friday's quotations. Printers are about 3d. per piece higher than on Friday, especially in 9-8, 16 by 16, and 17 by 17. 20 yards Jaconets may be quoted 1½d. per piece higher, whilst Long Cloths, Madapolams, T-cloths, and Domestic remain firm, at Friday's quotations.

TOBACCO.

LONDON, Aug. 6, 1862.

The sales last month were 3110 hogsheads in London and 1817 hogsheads in Liverpool. There was also a considerable business in manufactured tobacco, and good lots of Cavendish realized as much as 18d. and 19d. per lb.

The stock of strips in importers' hands is now very small, and the few transactions of the past week are owing rather to the indifference of bidders, and the advanced rates asked, than to any disinclination of buyers, even at some advance in price. The trade are naturally anxious in the prospect of continuance of the war; and the success of the Confederates in the Border and tobacco growing States seems to threaten still greater disturbance of agricultural interests, and diversion of labour and attention from the plantations to the war, which may again be carried on more fiercely in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri. Should these States be lost to the Federals, as seems probable, Western tobacco will be as effectually blockaded in the interior as the Virginia crops of 1861, and part of 1860 have been since the spring of last year. The latest accounts from the West state the probable quantity of strips, both old remaining in the country and this year's preparation, at not exceeding 6500 hogsheads. An average crop seems to have been planted, and may perhaps be secured, but in Virginia we must calculate on a small preparation, a small crop, and probably some considerable damage, if not actual destruction of a large proportion of the old stock remaining in Richmond and the interior of the State when the blockade prevented all further export from this quarter.

These considerations have imparted strength to the market, and we quote prices for most descriptions from ¾d. to 1d. above the current rates of last month.

Stocks, July 31	Virg. Leaf.	Virg. Std.	Wstrn. Leaf.	Wstrn. Std.	Mary-land.	Manu-factured
In London.....	590	589	7831	5429	6004	2464
In Liverpool..	350	750	3889	5367	4283	1266

QUOTATIONS:—

Virginia Leaf	6d. to 13½d.
Ditto, Stemmed	15d. to 18d.
Western Leaf	6d. to 12d.
Ditto, Stemmed	12d. to 14½d.
Marylands	5½d. to 10d.
Negrohead and Cavendish	7½d. to 36d.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

THE BATTLES OF THE 27th AND 28th OF JUNE.

KILLED AND WOUNDED.

The following Lists are taken from the Richmond Dispatch:—

List of Casualties in the 9th Alabama Regiment, Major J. H. J. Williams, commanding, in the engagement on Friday, June 27th, 1862:—

Company A.—Lieut. A. H. Hays, commanding. Killed: Colour Sergeant J. Donnelly, Corporal D. Mitchell, and Private D. Thomas. Mortally Wounded: Privates Wm. McGilvery, M. Winters, and B. McTurnau. Slightly Wounded: Lieut. A. H. Hays, Privates J. Lynch, W. Brown, A. J. Lefevre, and J. Morrissey. Missing: Private F. Kent.

Company B.—Capt. E. B. Moore commanding.—Killed: Sergeant Larkin; Privates James Gerrin, Mike Percell, Chas. Riley, H. Hulsey, Miles Cowan, and Bryan Smith. Wounded: Corporal J. Quinn; Privates F. Connell, E. Potec, P. Dromey, P. Bodkin, J. Coswell, B. Green, John Green, John Jacobs, Thomas Ready, Thomas McDonald. Missing: Private W. Hogan.

Company C.—Killed: Privates J. A. J. Sloan, Wm. Montgomery, N. C. Graham, M. M. Rodgers. Wounded: Sergeant H. V. Whitehead, Privates Jas. Brunan, G. R. Bailey, Colour

Corporal R. H. Coleman; Privates C. F. Davis, N. M. Garnett, B. C. Harrison, J. B. Windham, A. J. Watkins. Missing: Privates T. J. Riddle, M. D. Allen, T. H. Hawkins.

Company D.—Killed: Corporal E. J. Pool; Privates A. C. Thrasher, M. Perkins, D. H. Jones. Wounded: Capt. James M. Crow, slight; Lieut. James W. Wilson, slight; Colour Corporal J. E. Beauchamp; Privates D. C. Hendrix, J. Marcella, P. M. Young.

Company E.—Killed: Corporal Graves, Privates Russell, Martin, Carter. Wounded severely: Lieut. John Hart; Corporal Cooper; Privates Rothall, White, Carroll, Gassanay, Tuckett, Barnett, House, Weatherby, Booker, Thomas, McKinney.

Company F.—Killed: Private Cruse. Wounded: Privates Bracken, Bragford, Fielding, Greeson, Gilbert, Hambleton, Hagner, McDonald, Sloan, Smith, Crouch; Capt. T. H. Hobbs, severely; Lieut. W. L. Wayland. Missing: Privates Johnson, Venable.

Company G.—Killed: Capt. E. Y. Hill; Corporal H. W. Whitaker, Private J. L. Lide. Wounded: Privates A. J. Milie, mortally; J. S. Knox, do.; J. M. Morgan, severely; B. Bullock, do.; J. Watson, do.; H. L. Solomon, slight; L. S. Renfro, do.; Sergeant Files, do.

Company H.—Killed: Private S. Crabb. Wounded: Privates M. Hill, mortally; H. Watkins, J. Cline, G. Dean, G. Grisham, G. T. Graham, C. P. Lovell, L. R. Bates, J. L. Black, J. K. Patterson, W. M. Roberts, P. Henderson; Sergeants J. Hardy, in leg; W. T. Hobbs, in knee.

Company I.—Killed: Privates P. F. Marbut, W. J. Barnett. Wounded: 2nd Lieut. A. C. Chisholm, F. M. Gresham; Privates M. Richardson, N. H. Rice, S. W. Kidgeway, F. M. Wilson. Missing: Private P. S. Whitehead.

Company K.—Killed: 1st Sergeant J. C. Miller, Sergeant E. V. Robbins; Privates E. B. Offelt, Wm. Larne, A. B. Buchanan, J. S. Lawler. Wounded: Sergeant J. M. Hackney; Corporal James Burk; Privates J. P. Critchen, J. M. Critchen, Pat Hughes, M. McClendon, J. May, B. Dailey; Doctor J. Fennell.

Lieut. M. C. May, Adjutant 9th Alabama Regiment.

A List of the Killed and Wounded of the 8th Regiment Virginia Volunteers, in the engagement of June 27, 1862:—

Company A; Capt. Wm. R. Bissell.—Killed: Privates Wm. F. Janney and Robt. S. Young. Wounded: Lieut. Edward C. Gibson, severely; Corporal Albert Heaton, badly; Private Volney P. Hill, badly.

Company B; Capt. H. C. Bonic.—Wounded: Lieut. Geo. T. Allen, mortally; Sergeant Hubert Moss, slightly; Privates Geo. W. Newlon, Bushrod Carter, and Zachariah Royston, badly.

Company C; Capt. Robt. H. Taylor.—Wounded: Orderly Marcus B. Conrad, severely; Sergeant A. H. Compton; Corporal Chas. Kerus, slightly; Privates Warner Allison, slightly; Evans O. Lunford, badly; Fitzgerald Thornton, badly; Robt. Lynn, slightly; Wm. O. Haggerty, slightly; Suowden B. Martin, do.

Company D; Capt. Wm. N. Berkeley.—Wounded: Sergeant Geo. W. Moran, very seriously; Albert Morris, slightly; Corporal French Gulick, slightly; Privates Leven Luckett, very badly; David Gulick, badly; L. F. Hutchison, slightly; Francis Chicer, slightly.

Company E; Capt. John R. Carter.—Wounded: Corporal J. A. Taverner, badly; Sergeant Wm. Moon, slightly; Corporal Richd. Marshall, badly; Privates Joseph Steele, very badly; Wm. Huns, slightly.

Company F; Capt. Alexander Grayson.—Killed: Lieut. R. O. Grayson; Private Wm. T. Dickey. Wounded: Lieut. H. W. Chamblin, badly.

Company G; Capt. J. O. Berry.—Killed: Private Asa Peck. Wounded: Privates Geo. L. Williams, slightly; Armistead Thompson, slightly; Thos. Holden, badly; J. W. Butler, badly; Geo. Ghee, badly; J. W. Kidwell, badly; Robt. Wells, badly.

Company H; Capt. Fustus Griffith.—Wounded: Corporal Chas. A. Cox, badly; Private John Manett, slightly.

Company I; Captain Wm. E. Garrett.—Killed: Orderly Jas. A. Garrett, Sergeant B. W. Shillman. Wounded: Private Samuel Cole, badly.

Company K; Capt. J. J. Smith.—Killed: Lieut. E. I. Fant. Wounded: Sergeants E. M. Herrington, slightly; John N. Garrison, badly; Corporal L. M. Lawrence, slightly; Privates C. W. Farr, badly; Wm. Legg, badly.

Rev. Geo. W. Harris, volunteer Chaplain to the regiment, was badly wounded in the side while bearing off a wounded soldier.

This regiment went into action with 185 muskets, and was gallantly led by its brave Colonel, Eppa Hunton, who had just returned the day before the engagement from a severe spell of sickness, and though very weak and emaciated, never faltered in the discharge of his duty. Major Edmund Berkeley did much to inspire the men with courage.

T. B. HUTCHISON, Adjutant.

List of Killed and Wounded in the 34th North Carolina Regiment:—

Wounded: Colonel R. H. Riddick, Lieut.-Colonel C. J. Hammarskeld, and Adjutant J. W. Riddick.

Company A.—Killed: Private Green Andrews.

Company B.—Killed: Drury Haall. Wounded: Privates Wm. Wright, Adolphus Withro, William Brooks, F. M. Green, A. H. Davis, Amos Hamrick.

Company C.—Killed: Privates A. G. Wallace, G. R. Keeter, B. O. Tanner, W. H. Miller. Wounded: L. N. McBryer, L. A. Daves, H. Lumber, W. G. Conner, C. M. Crow, R. M. Harrell, A. O. Lyuch, J. W. Wilson.

Company D.—Killed: Private J. R. McNeely. Wounded: Capt. W. L. Lawrence, Sergeant T. J. Atkinson, Privates Wm. Harvell, E. Freene, F. M. Miller, R. A. Overcash, Joel Corriher, S. A. Martin, B. M. Atwell, Wilson Overcash, David Pickler, J. B. Parker, J. T. Winford, J. K. McNeely.

Company E.—Killed: Lieut. David Rhodes; Privates J. H. Hill, Dan. Wise, Dan. Perkins, Joab Moore, Cephas Hartzoge, Wounded: M. L. Heaver, Joshua, Queen, Pink Edmond, Charles Shull, Geo. Hedgpell, David Reid, Alex. Helms, Thos. Abernethy, Daniel Gilbert, Perry Carpenter, John H. Baker.

Company F.—Killed: Capt. A. G. Waters; Privates, Wm. Clay, A. G. Elam, R. H. Shields, W. L. Harden, B. K. Harden, J. A. Bryant, Samuel Akin, John White, D. A. Wilson, Solomon Carpenter, J. E. Beam. Wounded: Lieut. D. R. Hoyle; Privates Syrus Sparrow, A. H. Gault, B. M. Hoyle, Solomon Newton, Newton Wright, A. C. Irvin, Jas. Blanton, D. M. Stroup, Henry Hoyle, Presley Norman, Jacob Earls, John Newton, O. W. Felnot, H. S. Moss, D. D. Price.

Company G.—Killed: Privates Charles Anderson, J. D. D.

Alexander, J. K. P. Means, J. A. Todd. Wounded: Lieut. G. M. Norment, Lieut. Robert D. Reid; Privates W. Clerx, A. J. Phillips, J. J. Bain, Scott Lawing.

Company H.—Killed: Privates Luther Roberts, Leroy Pullman, A. P. Gool, John Howell, William Brown, Martin Earls.

Company I.—Killed: S. Cargall, G. C. Kenaly. Wounded: J. Steadman, Wm. Martin, Phillip Suttle, Jack Robbins, Jobb Huntley, W. L. Jones, M. Kimble.

Company K.—Killed: O. L. Harlie, P. G. Green, H. C. Hamilton.

E. C. McLAUGHLIN.

List of Casualties of the 20th Virginia Regiment, commanded by Colonel R. C. Allen, in the battle of the 27th:—

Company A; Lieut. Fink, commanding, killed.—Wounded: Sergeant Joel H. Walker; Privates Philip F. Barger, J. G. Hayes, John W. Camper, B. O. Simmons, W. Ohendchain.

Company B; Lieut. Goode, commanding, slightly wounded in thigh.—Wounded: Privates W. H. Jones, Hugh M. Hill, John Abbott, J. J. Lakin.

Company C; Capt. Shepard, commanding, wounded in head.—Killed: Lieut. James H. Reynolds, Corporal George L. Kintzley—Privates John W. Givens and Philip J. Williams. Wounded: 1st Sergeant William E. Reynolds; Privates B. M. Kerr, John T. Dervin, James R. McPherson, and George L. Reynolds.

Company D; Lieut. Stewart commanding.—Killed: Corporals A. Overstreet and John W. Beard. Wounded: 1st Sergeant John P. Walrond, Privates A. L. Blankinship, Harry Barton, Thomas D. Carrol, Joel M. Franklin, Josiah Dooley, John S. L. Settle, Fielding Luck, and John T. Payne.

Company E; Lieut. Miner, commanding.—Wounded: Sergeants Kelley and James J. Ester; Corporal Patterson; Privates Alexander Farris, James G. Richardson, and William J. Simpson. Missing: E. W. Martin.

Company F; Capt. Hugh Nelson commanding.—Wounded: 1st Sergeant M. M. Lowry, Sergeant J. H. Ellis, John C. Rucker, Corporal M. V. Shelton; Privates Thomas Puckett, Thomas Monroe, J. B. Tanner, John R. Wilsoo, L. B. Wright, A. P. Wright, W. H. Mitchell, Charles Padgett, M. B. Claytor, W. E. Wright, John R. Ellis.

Company G; Lieut. Holland, commanding, severely wounded in each thigh.—Wounded: Stephen Chaffin, O. V. E. Dearing, R. A. Foster, R. M. Johnson, R. Mitchell, J. D. Williams, W. A. Walker. Missing: W. C. Creary.

Company I; Lieut. A. H. Hoge, commanding, severely wounded in the shoulder.—Killed: Privates Ro. S. Phillips, and James Murry. Wounded: Sergeant A. Lewis, in hand and arm; Corporals A. Ramsay, arm broken, W. L. Williamson, arm and leg broken; P. W. Loyd, slightly in side; Privates Samuel M. Brown, slightly in hand; David Collier, in body; Jno. W. Hix, slightly in shoulder; Jos. P. Lemon, in hand; O. J. Moseley, slightly in thigh; W. W. Meador, severely in foot; Jno. H. Persinger, severely in leg; Chas. H. Settle, severely in hand; Wm. Schoonover, slightly in hand; J. B. Thompson, severely in thigh; H. S. Trout, slightly in knee; J. W. Whitesul, in thigh; Jno. W. Carroll, in leg; Jno. R. Hardy, thigh.

Company K; Captain Robertson, commanding, severely wounded.—Killed: Corporal W. A. Peters, and Private A. S. Richardson. Wounded: Sergeants G. W. Shaver, in arm; W. D. Woodson, severely in groin; Privates L. B. Candiff, slightly; B. Painter, do.; Wm. Slack, arm and head; Wm. H. Tyler, severely in face; Wm. H. Terms, slightly in arm.

Wm. C. LEFTWICH,

A. Adjutant 28th Reg. Va. Volunteers.

List of Killed and Wounded of the 2nd Florida Regiment, Brigadier-General R. A. Pryor's Brigade, in the battles of Thursday and Friday, 26th and 27th, in the neighbourhood of the Chickahominy River.

1st Company.—Wounded: Capt. and Assistant-Quartermaster E. M. L. Engle, Corporal George R. Brow, W. E. Livingston.

2nd Company; 1st Lieut. Tillinghast commanding.—Wounded: Corporal R. Cobb, L. S. Barnes, F. A. McNelly. 3rd Company; Captain A. Mosely.—Wounded: Sergeant D. L. Dunham, Corporal Jno. Grey, E. Hull, B. E. Brown, Thos. W. Hooper, J. J. Davis, E. Bensley.

4th Company; 2nd Lieut. P. Todd commanding.—Wounded: A. J. Hogan, M. J. Fogg, J. Slager, Jno. P. C. Massey.

5th Company; 2nd Lieut. A. W. Wright commanding.—Wounded: Sergeant J. C. Gibbs, Jas. Drummond, E. Taylor, Jno. Noland, Jos. Wilkerson.

6th Company; 2nd Lieut. Parker commanding.—Killed: J. G. Grey. Wounded: 1st Sergeant J. L. Dutton, D. Dortch, Jno. McCormack.

7th Company; 2nd Lieut. Jno. W. Hall commanding.—Killed: Thos. J. Watson. Wounded: Geo. Shiver, A. Woodce, Jno. Cheshire.

8th Company; 1st Lieut. Wm. H. H. Rogers commanding.—Killed: T. J. Wilder, G. Herndon. Wounded: J. T. C. Adams, Thos. Lewis, S. W. Parker.

9th Company; 1st Lieut. Sikes commanding.—Killed: Jas. Wilkie. Wounded: Thomas Mills, Jas. White, Wm. Strobie.

10th Company; 1st Lieut. Spiers commanding.—Killed: Thos. Miller. Wounded: 2nd Lieut. Pratt, Jacob Moore, M. Craine, ——— Wilkerson, J. C. Mole, W. B. Brewer, Jno. Bonnel.

11th Company; 1st Lieut. E. C. Humphreys commanding.—Killed: Corporal T. M. Ransom. Wounded: Jas. H. Knight, Jno. L. Penny, W. B. Sills, Sam. Clifford, A. Villar, D. C. Knowles, D. H. Doer.

12th Company; Captain W. Parkhill.—Killed: Captain W. Parkhill. Wounded: Corporal R. M. Horn, Corporal R. D. Sturgess, Wm. Clair, Jno. Dobson, Albert Paine, M. Dillan, Thos. M. PALMER, Surgeon 2nd Florida Vols.

MOORE HOSPITAL, JUNE 25 AND 29.

Wm. Brown, 1st N. C.; C. A. Gregory, 12th N. C.; J. Cave, 1st N. C.; A. T. Marsh, 22nd N. C.; W. B. Hollingsworth, Ro Shipm, Wm. T. Sutton, 38th N. C.; M. Gill, 1st N. C.; J. W. Porter, 38th Ga. (dead); A. S. Hair, 38th N. C. (dead); Chas. Marshmont, 44th N. C.; M. D. Pitts, 19th Ga. (dead); Tim Wheeler, 24th N. C.; G. Osborn, 26th N. C.; J. D. Taylor, 2nd Miss. Battalion; H. B. Thompson, 12th Miss.; T. L. Hatcher, 44th Ga.; B. F. Parker, 4th N. C.; D. R. Foster, 24th N. C.; J. H. Russell, 10th N. C.; J. O. C. Barlow, 26th N. C.; W. M. Carter, 38th N. C.; J. P. Bradshaw, 13th N. C.; M. Rash, 34th N. C.; Wm. Kennedy, Moodie's Louisiana Battery; Chas. Manz, 4th

Texas; R. L. Hunter, 19th Ga.; Ro Haines, 19th Ga.; A. W. Green, 12th N. C.; R. C. Montgomery, do.; Wm. B. Powell, do.; J. T. Rice, do.; N. C. Tunstall, do.; B. F. Carter, 29th N. C.; C. F. Kingsbury, 12th N. C.; J. E. Ducker, do.; J. D. Pain do.; Henry Pitts, 12th do.; B. C. Hamlett, do.; W. E. Werner, 4th S. C.; J. Watkins, 20th N. C.; G. F. Snier, 5th S. C.; Wm. Wilson, 4th Texas; Wm. H. Ricketts, 13th Va.; T. J. Brits, 14th S. C.; Jno Harrison, do.; J. N. Phipps, 12th N. C.; William S. Halladay, do.; A. Frayser, 2nd Miss.; Wm. Wilkins, 44th N. C.; Wilbur Willis, 22nd N. C.; Wm. H. Wriging, 34th do.; J. T. Seism, do.; Jno. E. Croom, 18th N. C.; Morris Grannon, 14th La.; Capt. J. P. Brooks, 20th N. C.; J. D. Shines, Ensign, 20th N. C.; J. J. Brandhurst, Sergeant-Major 20th N. C.; Jas P. More, ———.

LIGON HOSPITAL, JUNE 28.

W. T. Sills, 2nd Fla.; Lieut. W. K. Garnet (dead); Thomas Fauthray, 55th Va.; W. T. Rigby, 13th Ala.; Milton Dulin, 18th N. C.; B. F. Morris, 22nd Ga.; W. Treppell, 1st La.; T. U. Gildard, J. C. McPherson, A. B. Gardner, 12th Miss.; W. A. Caruthers, George Brideweiser, N. A. Clarke, 11th Miss.; A. B. Green, 12th Miss.; D. J. Harralson, W. P. Robertson, H. Braunan, Jas. McGordon, J. Q. English, J. H. Monager, Wm. Rouncevall, 2nd Miss.; F. Stringfellow, J. H. Dailey, Reuben Chason, Jno. Cenny, 8th Ala.; J. L. Files, Jas. Morrissey, W. D. Rothoff, 4th Ala.; F. C. Greggs, Thos. Sullivan, J. H. Langford, 9th Ala.; James W. Wright, Enoch Harris, J. T. Willoughby, A. J. Walker, B. Steadham, E. C. Walker, J. R. Murthous, 14th Ala.; Mike Winters, 9th Ala.; A. C. Cuningham, 10th Ala.; Thomas Matfield, F. Hetherington, T. S. McDonald, 5th S. C.; B. C. Johnson, 4th S. C.; G. C. Anshersy, R. A. Gordon, 1st S. C. Rifles; J. J. Ruff, 13th S. C.; J. P. Sprinkle, 28th N. C.; J. P. Browe, 6th S. C.; J. M. Dares, J. Massey, 4th N. C.; W. Dalton, C. D. Pollard, 8th Va.; B. H. Koehle, Johnson's Artillery; G. Slavers, (dead) J. J. Davis, E. Hull, Thomas Mills, 2nd Fla.; J. J. Adams, 6th Ga.; Gabriel, Jeckin's Regt.; S. Young, 4th Texas; J. T. Mader, J. T. Butler, 5th Texas; C. B. Fontaine, 2nd Ga.

SECOND GEORGIA HOSPITAL, JUNE 28.

H. P. Thomas, 45th Ga.; P. J. Caveu, 19th Ga.; N. Ratsford, 6th Ga.; Dr. F. A. Morgan, 19th Ga.; A. J. Wigley, 7th Ga.; Jno. Hies, 7th Ga.; G. P. Elliott, 19th Ga.; G. U. Hudson, 30th Ga.; Lt. Jno. Graul, 12th Ga.; D. Stroup, 18th Ga.; Jno. Williams, do.; J. M. Rice, do.; J. B. Fuller, 23rd Ga.; J. G. Bearding, 13th Ga.; J. H. Edwards, 44th Ga.; H. S. Gregory, 14th Ga.; W. R. Milwood, 2nd Ga.

THIRD GEORGIA HOSPITAL, JUNE 28.

Asa Newsome, 48th Ga.; Jas. Wright, 15th Ga.; J. M. Clary, 5th Ga.; Jno. Kennedy, 2nd Ga.; H. L. Smith, 9th Ga.; H. Oliver 2nd Ga.; O. H. Bentley, 22nd Ga.; W. W. Kendrick, 49th Ga.; J. A. Smith, 35th Ga.; T. W. G. Inglett, 28th Ga.; W. G. Gresham, 18th Ga.; ——— Dumphrees, do.; J. A. Dunn, 22nd Ga.; J. M. Fletcher, do.; T. J. Elliott, 19th Ga.; Wiley Parker, 14th Ga.; Curtis Butts, 19th Ga.; Jessie Knight, 35th Ga.; R. W. Knight, do.; M. N. Minor, do.; J. L. Brown, do.; B. M. Ferrell, do.; Thos. C. Owens, 2nd Ga.; E. Adams, 6th Ga.; G. N. Armchbacher, 2nd Ga.; W. Finker, 15th Ga.; Samuel Hill, 15th Ga.; E. C. Hays, 20th Ga.; John Craig, do.; J. A. Waych, do.; E. Johnston, do.; Nath. Brown, 15th Ga.

HOWARD'S HOSPITAL, JUNE 28 AND 29.

J. B. Merritt, 8th Va.; J. B. Martin, 10th Ala.; J. L. Hearn, 35th Ga.; Wm. Haggarty, 8th Va.; E. A. Lunsford, 8th Va.; R. S. Lynn, 8th Va.; A. Compton, 8th Va.; G. Oglesby, 15th Ga.; N. Royals, 20th N. C.; M. Royals, 20th N. C.; J. B. Pitman, 2nd Miss.; R. L. Turner, 2nd Miss.; A. J. Woodward, 12th Ala.; W. W. Graves, 12th Ala.; D. S. Settlement, 4th Ala.; J. M. Mauck, 10th Va.; J. T. Bowers, 10th Va.; H. B. Jones, 8th Ga.; M. Crane, 2nd Fla.; C. T. Gallagher, 7th Ga.; M. Fitzgerald, 14th La.; W. Calhoun, 45th Ga.; A. T. Brown, 4th Texas; J. S. Spidey, 4th Texas; S. G. Courtney, 4th Texas; J. Franklin, 4th Texas; W. E. Carroll, 4th Texas; W. G. Platt, 4th Texas; J. Morrison, 16th N. C.; F. M. McClendon, 10th Ala.; A. Bruce, 14th Ala.; A. J. Hogan, 2nd Fla.; M. Toole, 14th S. C.; J. W. Smith, 14th Ala.; M. E. Lewis, 1st S. C.; Wm. A. Copeman, 2nd Ga.; J. N. Mason, 29th Ga.; W. Mc Goner, 7th N. C.

FOURTH GEORGIA HOSPITAL, JUNE 28.

A. C. Osborn, 44th Ga.; C. A. Bell, 49th Ga.; J. R. Roby, 44th Ga.; Jno. Sloan, 44th Ga.; C. W. Chivers, 6th Ga.; J. R. Puckett, 19th Ga.; J. T. Smith, 48th Ga.; W. W. Fisher, 3rd Ga.; N. D. Nicholson, 23rd Ga.; J. T. Lane, 45th Ga.; W. Blackman, 45th Ga.; J. A. Gaines, 15th Ga.; Wm. Brown, 45th Ga.; J. H. Dickerson, 45th Ga.; C. H. Pierce, 2nd Ga.; G. W. Pierce, 2nd Ga.; A. H. Watson, 2nd Ga.; E. Pullen, 15th Ga.; E. W. Barker, 7th Ga.; E. W. Davis, 8th Ga.; G. W. Philpott, 7th Ga.; A. J. Sorter, 15th Ga.; ——— Douglass, 27th Ga.

SEABROOK'S HOSPITAL.

Corporal Jas. M. Tynes, 19th Miss.; Bugler Thos. H. Brown, 14th La.; Philip Dunnivant, 7th N. C.; W. R. Jester, 44th Ga.; Sergeant R. Irby, 17th Tenn.; Lieut. G. O. Crawford, 19th Ga.; Sergeant R. R. Revels, 34th N. C.; J. W. Shields, do.; J. H. Roberts, 12th Miss.; B. F. Hastings, 19th Miss.; Wm. Mulaskin, do.; G. N. Clark, do.; D. T. Wyatt, do.; W. T. Scott, do.; John Nutley, 5th Ala.; John Dance, do.; J. T. Lancaster, 12th Miss.; J. W. Smith, 20th Ga.; Henry Moss, 34th N. C.; Andrew Kane, 4th La.; Alphonso Enrique, 7th Tenn.; Lieut. Jas. E. Reese, 5th Ala.; Corporal Jos. H. Meeks, 44th Ga.; S. Nowels, do.; N. M. Shaw, do.; S. Bailey, do.; Lieut. S. H. Johnston, do.; John B. Raffenas, 2nd Miss.; Sergeant Wm. McField, do.; M. Harsham, St. Paul's bat.; J. P. Foreman, 40th Ga.; L. A. Ford, 23rd N. C.; John Mullen, 2nd Miss.; Sergeant R. W. Robins, 22nd N. C.; Hendley Duke, 12th N. C.; S. S. Davenport, 35th Ga.; Jno. R. Chessier, 2nd Fla.; C. W. Jordan, 45th Ga.; C. C. Davis, 12th Ala.; B. F. Hodges, do.; five unable to give their names; J. L. Tanner, 44th Ga.; D. Rawles, 2nd Miss. bat.; Jos. J. Carner, 4th Va.; ——— Hollaus, 14th Ga.; W. Alders, 19th Ga.; Chas. H. Macey, 19th Miss.; Jno. Soule, 1st S. C.; F. Smith, 2nd Miss. bat.; B. A. Hill, 15th Ala.; W. H. Moore, 16th N. C.; Sergeant Jas. A. Thompson, 7th Tenn.; Geo. Torrence, 37th N. C.; David Ray, 38th N. C.; Calvin Pierce, 37th N. C.; Stephen Lullian, 38th N. C.; K. M. Covington, do.; Wm. Meyers, 44th Ga.; Abner Reeves, do.; Wm. M. Elder, do.; Geo. Nolan, do.; Jas. C. Surickland, do.; Jno. C. Rogers, do.; Joseph Grant, do.; Ensign T. J. Denso, 1st Tenn.; L. E. Taylor, 44th Ga.; Daniel Braton, 1st S. C.; M. F. Seabrough, 1st N. C.; G. P. Bryans, 44th Ga.; S. S. Lindford, 1st N. C.; James Heard, do.; Corporal H. J. Williams, do.; W. A. Newby, 38th N. C.; D. T. Yates, 12th Miss.; Sergeant T. L. Russell, 34th N. C.; H. N. Tomlinson, do.; Jesse Grant, do.; John Brown, 1st N. C.; Albert Shaw, do.; T. S. Speed, Marshall's bat.; C. H. Arnold, 19th

Miss; F. Draper, 12th Miss; Philip T. Bishop, 44th Ga.; F. M. Lipsy, 19th Miss; Wm. Henry, do.; Sam Kendrick, 44th Ga.; Geo. R. Oilor, 60th Va.; J. A. Crouch, 35th Ga.; Ellis Hutchin, 38th N. C.; H. H. McCoskill, 38th N. C.; Corporal Jno. D. Shaw, 1st N. C.; Jno. Jenkins 1st N. C.; H. G. Wiggins, 38th N. C.; Sergeant E. J. Garrison, 3rd N. C.; Corporal Jno. H. Brandy, 1st N. C.; W. W. T. Beasley, 44th Ga.; J. C. Lackey, 38th N. C.; A. Harney, 16th N. C.; Henry Evans, do.; John Flen, 2nd N. C.; Adjutant J. S. R. Miller, 1st N. C.; Capt. R. W. Rivers, do.; R. Farris, 1st Tenn.; S. M. Elliott, 19th Ga.; S. O. Reid, 11th S. C.; Wm. A. West, 12th Miss; E. Corner, 28th Ga.; Sergeant F. G. Roberts, 1st Tenn.; J. R. Eogland, 23rd Ga.; J. H. Hamley, 13th Ala.; Sergeant E. W. Smith, 19th Miss.; J. P. Wagner, 14th La.; Dan. S. Andrews, 2nd N. C.; John M. Peasley, 44th Ga.; Corporal Michael Keating, 14th La.; Andrew Lasting, 1st N. C.; Jas. T. Baggatt, do.; E. D. Johnston, do.; S. R. Woods, 12th Miss.; E. E. Woods, do.; Thos. O'Brien, Purcell Battery; Corporal Michael Egan, Johnson's Battery; Gustave Letellier, St. Paul's Battalion; John Canzary, 7th Tenn.; Corporal J. P. Bosham, 7th Tenn.; H. A. Holland, 19th Ga.; Jno. J. Turner, 44th Ga.; E. S. Gray, 45th Ga.; James H. Jackson, 22nd N. C.; Lieut. T. C. Hendrick, 44th Ga.; M. Chappell, 38th N. C.; C. Crouch, 38th N. C.; John Burnell, 2nd Fla.; Corporal E. W. Saunders, 34th N. C.; Sergeant R. F. Newmad, 1st Tenn.; J. H. Goode, 55th Va.; H. T. Bowbo, 2nd Miss. Battalion; M. F. Ross, 45th Ga.; Corporal John Brown, C. L. Mathune, T. J. Gordon, 3rd La. Battalion; William Bell, 24th Va.; H. A. Mullens, 19th Miss.; M. B. Herch, 3rd La. Battalion; Sergeant G. N. Edmondson, 55th Va.; John Means, 3rd N. C.; J. W. Blake, 2nd Va. Battalion; Sergeant W. H. Dikes, 44th Ga.; W. Taffar, 22nd N. C.; Jesse Scarlet, 38th N. C.; Wm. P. Lewis, H. H. Whaley, 44th Ga.; W. R. Oldridge, James Mills, W. Bolen, John Jones, J. M. Alderred, G. P. Able, R. Jamison, Corporal R. James, G. B. Swanger, J. A. Blair, J. A. Rhea, 16th N. C.; William Williamson, 2nd Ark. Battalion; Jas. W. Powell, 1st N. C.; A. Jones, 19th Miss.; J. Atwood, 38th N. C.; Corporal M. R. Grabill, 44th Ga.; Thomas L. Stanfield, 16th N. C.; Calvin E. Buck, 7th Tenn.; D. D. Price, 34th N. C.; W. Hilson, 48th Ga.; one name unknown; H. C. Dunning, 2nd Miss.; A. M. Anthony, 16th N. C.; P. B. Bailey, 3rd N. C.; Lieut. D. Roberts, 44th Ga.; Sergeant W. G. Stikey, 1st Ala. Batt.; Jno. G. Phillips, 19th Ga.; Eugene Boofter, 14th Tenn.; Rufus Hester, 7th Tenn.; Wm. McManus, 14th Tenn.; R. D. Smith, 1st Tenn.; Wm. Shoemaker, Jas. K. Elliott, and Corporal Henry Abbott, 7th Tenn.; Enoch Signman, and Sergeant T. B. Regh, 16th N. C.; E. Zimber, and H. H. Walls, 19th Miss.; C. H. Long, 22nd N. C.; J. B. Bowers, and N. F. McCollum, 1st Tenn.; G. W. Hicks, 12th Miss.; J. R. Perry, 45th Ga.; W. Newman, 1st Tenn.; S. A. Hancock, 14th Ga.; W. A. Millan, 16th N. C.; P. A. Frickett, and H. W. Lee, 44th Ga.; J. Alwyn, 16th N. C.; J. M. Miller, 60th Va.; Corporal J. P. Bungurner, 16th N. C.; C. G. Barton, W. L. Bynum, J. A. Bynum, 2nd Miss.; J. J. Bishop, 56th Va.; Daniel Burford, 19th Va.; James Beacham, 2nd Miss.; William Ballam, Johnson's Battery; James Bain, 34th N. C.; Corporal J. A. Clark, 5th S. C.; P. H. Cristy, 14th La.; J. S. Cantree, 5th S. C.; Sergeant D. J. Casbrini, 12th Miss.; H. A. Clark, 22nd N. C.; W. H. Casey, 19th Miss.; J. R. Chambers, 16th N. C.; Lieut. A. H. Condon, La. Battery; F. W. Cox, 12th Miss.; McCoffey, 2nd N. C.; William Chambers, 19th Ga.; B. Carter, 8th Va.; Jno. W. Atkins, 2nd Miss.; Jno. Abbott, 8th Ala.; J. A. Acker, Hampton's Legion; H. C. Burgay, 44th Ga.; Henry Brady, 14th La.; Thomas J. Bell, 11th Miss.; Corporal M. C. Barnett, S. C.; William Barny, 4th Texas; Capt. James E. Blair, 19th Va.; Adam Beveridge, 3rd La.; Dan Brown, 11th S. C.; J. Bell, 1st N. C.; Corporal R. C. Bruns, 3rd Va.; J. W. Bowman, 35th Ga.; J. M. Badger, 22nd N. C.; J. H. Boon, 38th N. C.; J. P. Courtney, 55th Va.; D. C. Crites, 16th N. C.; G. P. Cox, B. F. Cox, E. M. Catler, 19th Va.; Corporal W. H. Cashing, 1st Tenn.; Sergeant Alexander G. Canwell, 20th Ga.; John T. Coker, 44th Ga.; H. H. Dobbs, 19th Ga.; Henry Doran, 2nd Miss.; James Diamond, 8th Va.; Benjamin Donnell, 12th N. C.; C. H. Davis, 37th N. C.; P. P. Derrick, 13th S. C.

BANNER HOSPITAL.

P. M. D. Rope, 44th Ga.; W. G. Mann, 44th Ga.; F. M. Hester, 44th Ga.; M. H. Hubbard, 44th Ga.; A. G. Mithum, 13th Ala.; James H. Battle, 12th Miss.; R. H. Cross, 14th Ala.; George C. Nex, 19th Ga.; R. C. Lackey, 38th N. C.; George Freeman, 44th Ga.; E. Sparkman, 3rd N. C.; P. Loving, 19th Miss.; S. M. Hines, W. C. Meacham, 38th N. C.; J. W. Butler, 19th Va.; Jacob Childers, 38th N. C.; D. W. Knight, 13th Ala.; J. W. Griffin, 47th Va.; W. T. Herndon, 7th N. C.; Isaac Priddy, 2nd Miss.; A. W. Mervin, 19th Miss.; J. D. Warwick, 40th Va.; Hiram Jarrell, 3rd N. C.; L. P. Carruth, 19th Miss.; William Melvany, 3rd La.; Lieut. Isaac L. King, 22nd N. C.; Martin Earles, 24th N. C.; Sergeant John Wynn, 1st N. C.; John J. Lynch, 14th La.; Henry Aber, 3rd La.; John B. Dean, 13th Ala.; J. V. Fields, 48th Ga.; J. Neal, J. Roberts, 3rd La.; J. N. Flick, 24th Va.; M. Riley, 6th La.; L. F. Maynor, 6th Ala.; J. Smith, D. G. Clemens, 18th Ga.; Junius J. Albury, 21st N. C.; Balaam Moore, 21st N. C.; Joseph W. Walker, 6th N. C.; J. P. Mimms, 15th Ga.; Seaburn Spradling, 13th Ala.; M. P. Pittman, 13th Ala.; James H. Mickle, 13th Ala.; Sergeant W. J. Cambron, 5th Ala. Batt.; E. J. Cambron, do.; W. H. Blackburn, 19th Ga.; Corporal William A. Cox, 6th N. C.; Wm. J. Hart, 6th N. C.; J. W. Emerson, 16th Miss.; George H. Smart, 28th N. C.; John D. Hudson, 28th N. C.; Wm. B. Sadwick, 17th Va.; Capt. Jos. N. Brown, 14th S. C.; Sergeant Wm. H. Franks, 14th S. C.; Albert M. Boyce, 14th S. C.; Isaac F. Fox, 14, S. C.; Jos. W. Childress, 42nd Va.; Daniel J. Phillips, 5th N. C.; J. J. Gilbert, 18th Ga.; Wm. H. Williams, 34th N. C.; E. M. L. Williams, 12th S. C.; Corporal J. H. Williams, 14th Tenn.; Corporal Daniel Daly, 19th Ga.; Thos. Dickinson, 14th Ga.; R. C. Harris, 1st Tenn.; Wm. Brown, 14th Ga.; D. M. Stroup, 34th N. C.; Wm. Harris, 34th N. C.; Wm. Harvell, 34th N. C.; N. B. Robertson, Orr's S. C.; Ellis Sartin, 22nd N. C.; Lieut. G. W. Marshall, 47th Va.; Abner Camp, 34th N. C.; Captain W. B. Valandigham, 12th S. C.; Colour Sergeant George Oordondok, 5th Texas; James A. May, 22nd N. C.; Patrick Gelday, 8th Ala.; R. A. Overcash, 34th N. C.; Benjamin Martin, 34th N. C.; Corporal William Wright, 34th N. C.; C. M. Branch, 56th Va.; A. W. Hicks, 8th Ga.; F. M. McKinney, 1st Tenn.; J. H. Critzer, 14th Tenn.; W. L. Gilliam, 11th Miss.; W. P. Rawls, 11th Miss.; O. Clark, 19th Miss.; Samuel Cunningham, 4th N. C.; J. H. Knight, 2nd Fla.; Lieut. Wm. C. Norrie, Orr's S. C.; B. J. Pace, 14th Ala.; Isaac W. Gill, 14th Ala.; Capt. D. A. Parker, 25th N. C.; John Brockwell, 28th N. C.; James L. May, 40th Va.; E. W. Chandler, 17th Ga.; Sol. W. Young, 28th N. C.; H. V. Bayne, J. V. Downing, 19th Miss.; Sergeant R. H. Teague, W. D. Barnes, F. W. Query, 7th N. C.; J. E. Taylor, 11th Miss.; Eli Brown, J. L. M. Clemmer, 37th N. C.; J. S. Thompson, C. W. Rowland, 28th N. C.; Wm. Chapple, 6th Ga.; W. Yow, 28th N. C.; J. H. Hockaday, 40th Va.; Thos. A. Gibson, J. M. Hendricke, 37th N. C.; R. H. Bird, W. H. Statts, 28th N. C.; H. J. Pettit, D. N. Sorebe, Richard Evans, W. A. Bell, 23rd Ga.; G. J. Huntley, 34th N. C.; Levi Coley, G. A. Parker, Azaria Brown, 28th N. C.; William Massey, 1st Tenn.; J. H. Katchford, 28th N. C.; William Shumate, 4th Texas; Jesse Oliver, 4th Texas; Julius Glazer, 4th Texas; Sergeant J. W. Green, 37th N. C.; J. N. Jackson, 5th S. C.; Sergeant J. W. Almon, 7th Ga.; E. F. Almon, do.; Lieut. S. L. Dorroh, 14th S. C.; Lieut. J. B. Sillman, 18th Ga.; J. W. Farmer, 49th Ga.; W. H. Gibson, 7th N. C.; J. F. Jones, 14th Ga.; Jesse Plinn, 2nd Miss.; Thos. Tailor, do.; John J. Patton, 5th Ala. Batt.; Joel Roberson, 13th Va.; E. J. L. Dorset, 21st La.; D. H. Mayes, 5th Texas; M. W. Ethredge, 45th Ga.; W. W. Vcal, 49th Ga.; Elijah Wheeler, do.; J. J. McMichael, 14th Ga.; Angus Bailey, 18th Ga.; W. A. Myers, 1st Tenn.; N. Land, 48th Ga.; J. D. Nebitt, 14th Tenn.; D. W. Nebitt, do.; Corporal H. A. Causey, do.; A. D. Mott, 2nd Fla.; T. M. Belt, 12th S. C.; W. W. Houston, 2nd Miss.; William Hutchison, 1st Tenn.; William S. Littleton, 4th Ala.; James H. Watson, 8th Ga.; Tim Sullivan, do.; Alex Reeves, 20th N. C.; E. F. Kemp, do.; Thomas Bullard, do.; William C. Smith, 2nd Miss. Batt.; L. Bodenheimer, do.; Corporal James Aubry, 8th Ala.; Hugh B. Harrison, 14th S. C.; G. W. Harris (chaplain), 8th Va.; Lieut. J. G. Willis, 1st Tenn.

CHRISTIAN AND LEA'S HOSPITAL.

Hooper Harman, 14th Ga.; Sergeant J. B. Angley, 1st N. C.; G. W. Jones, 12th Miss.; E. H. Miller, 6th S. C.; J. A. Moore, Palmetto Sharpshooters; Wm. Simmons, 56th Va.; E. M. Walter, 4th N. C.; L. B. Smith, 5th Texas; D. M. Jackson, 6th Ga.; Wm. Barlow, W. M. Chaney, Lynch Burton, E. P. Willis, J. W. Biggers, Dr. J. S. Stevenson, W. B. Seay, H. C. Moore, W. S. Simms, 2nd Ga.; J. T. Bowen, 17th Ga.; T. R. White, 15th Ga.; T. J. Millbrook, J. W. Wheeler, Jos. Rice, 2nd Ga.; J. B. Jones, 9th Ga.; R. H. Griffin, J. O. Jones, 2nd Ga.; O. Barr, J. N. Bimms, 15th Ga.; W. P. Stanley, 18th Ga.; Sergeant T. J. Harris, J. L. Neal, 9th Ga.; James B. Newman, 2nd Ga.; S. W. Hunt, 15th Ga.; Lewis Harris, 2nd Ga.; L. Deun, J. H. Mallory, 17th Ga.; David Hudson, 13th Ga.; H. L. Kirk, W. M. Nash, D. S. Musc, 7th Ga.; C. H. Heath, Corporal R. M. Andrews, 14th Ga.; S. J. Pennington 31st Ga.; Thomas Slack, William A. Tyler, 28th Va.; Uriah Etheridge, J. J. Chapman, 14th S. C.; H. F. Pridgea, 4th N. C.; J. W. Joliffe, A. B. Cross, 3rd Va.; H. Bradbury, 1st Tenn.; J. M. Jones, J. W. Carter, Jeff Davis Artillery; John Moore, H. C. Watts, Horace Windsor, J. D. Strickland, 2nd Ga.; Peter David 15th Ga.; James W. Dye, 15th Ga.; J. B. Watkins, 2nd Ga.; Lieut. William Jones, 18th Ga.; J. A. McCrery, 2nd Ga.; Jos. Allman, 6th N. C.; W. M. Tidd, 2nd Ga.; S. J. Pitts, do.; J. T. Jones, do.; W. A. Brown, 7th Ga.; W. J. Davis, 2nd Ga.; W. H. Nelms, do.; H. P. Shultz, 1st Texas; H. P. Freeman, 2nd Ga.; J. W. Edwards, 8th Ga.; C. G. Gray, 6th Ga.; L. R. Ragsdale, 8th Ga.; Jesse E. J. Leigh, do.; C. C. Bear, 15th Ala.; J. A. Hill, 7th Ga.; J. J. Patterson, 2nd Ga.; J. E. Maguire, 8th Ga.; D. W. Croft, do.; E. A. Crew, 2nd Ga.; E. A. Shepherd, do.; S. E. Goss, 17th Ga.; J. D. Hale, 9th Ga.; L. C. P. Jones, 8th Ga.; F. B. Scarborough, 15th Ga.; J. L. Hopkins, 2nd Ga.; Lieut. W. W. Williamson, 8th Ga.; W. D. Lewis, 2nd Ga.; Jacob A. Albright, do.; J. L. Barks, W. Roby, do.; Lieut. J. B. McCollum, do.; J. McCusters, do.; J. R. Manning, 8th Ga.; J. B. Reese, 8th Ga.; Jas. Lyle, 17th Ga.; E. P. Pearson, 2nd Ga.; A. H. Smith, 8th Ga.; J. T. Lewis, do.; R. A. Gentry, do.; James M. O. Shields, 2nd Tenn.; P. H. McDowell, Orr's Regiment; Lieut. A. J. Robertson, 19th Va.; D. A. Mann, 34th N. C.; C. D. S. Wilkins, 4th Texas; E. C. Riley, Orr's Regiment; George W. Newlin, 8th Va.; J. T. Freeman, 22nd N. C.; Thomas Rutherford, 14th Ala.; James E. Worthy, do.; Capt. J. J. Walton, 16th Miss.; M. W. Colder, do.; John F. Watson, 9th Ala.; Pat Dromay, do.; Fred. Miller, do.; Peter Casey, 11th Ala.; E. W. Pierce, 4th Texas; M. Rossam, 8th Ala.; Richard Row, 9th Ga.; Joel Avery, 45th Ga.; Charles Pool, 44th Ga.; Sergeant T. J. Parsons, 49th Ga.; P. W. Bashaw, 7th Tenn.; Jones Peterson, 10th N. C.; W. J. Smith, 5th Ala.; H. D. Benton, 8th Ga.; C. A. Kennedy, 20th N. C.; S. M. Roberts.

GLOBE HOSPITAL.

David N. Puckett, 35th Ga.; Dolphin T. McKenzie, 35th Ga.; George W. Bowen, 40th Va.; W. M. Bond, 35th Ga.; Corporal William Londenwick, 19th Miss.; J. D. Smith, 22nd Ga.; W. N. Tarpley, 44th Ga.; Corporal A. W. Baker, 12th Miss.; E. G. Randle, 2nd Miss. Batt.; J. S. Morrow, J. G. Duncan, 19th Miss.; John Woole, 19th Miss.; J. T. Wagner, 14th La.; Sergeant Henry Cines, 14th La.; M. McEvoy, 14th La.; William Cooke, 35th N. C.; John King, 1st N. C.; E. J. Hubbs, 3rd N. C.; Aug. Reese, 38th N. C.; Thomas Strickland, 1st N. C.; Captain H. C. Worley, 16th N. C.; H. C. Powell, 1st Texas; A. Baudaux, 3rd La. Batt.; Corporal James Glass, 2nd Miss. Batt.; Joshua Shepherd, 49th Ga.; N. Hollman, 44th Ga.; Lieut. T. S. Tatam, 44th Ga.; Sergeant G. W. Sullivan, 44th Ga.; Corporal Sandford Watson, 19th Ga.; J. B. Robertson, 19th Ga.; J. G. Sibley, R. H. Shoop, 19th Miss.; Joshua Culpepper, 3rd Va.; Lieut. Henry C. Michie, 56th Va.; Thomas Harmon, 58th Va.; J. S. Harlow, William G. Brown, 56th Va.; D. E. Campbell, William H. Felts, 38th N. C.; Sergeant T. J. Atkinson, Corporal J. B. Parker, 34th N. C.; H. H. Alived, 16th N. C.; James Floyd, 13th Ala.; Nickleson Adams, George W. Horn, William Shepherd, Pleasant Spaur, Sergeant George Horn, P. H. Kriele, J. W. Hall, William H. Page, 14th Tenn.; Thomas J. Foster, 1st Tenn.; John Myers, 14th La.; Albert Johnson, 11th S. C.; Sergeant B. M. Stone, 4th S. C.; J. W. Campbell, 2nd S. C.; J. L. Smith, 12th S. C.; F. W. Vonhadel, Henry H. Skamp, 11th S. C.; D. W. Montgomery, 12th S. C.; Thomas J. Knight, 22nd N. C. (one name unknown).

MOORE HOSPITAL.

J. W. Calder, Company E, 26th N. C.; Capt. Eugene Grissom, Company D, 30th N. C.; J. B. Shcats, Company A, 34th N. C.; Wm. R. Floyd, Company G, 16th N. C.; Wyley Green, Company H, 44th Ga.; George W. Shafer, Company H, 22nd N. C.; John W. Hutelins, Company H, 22nd N. C.; Thomas Crabtree, Company D, 22nd N. C.; Thomas E. Kates, Company D, 1st N. C.; John W. Pugh, Company F, 3rd N. C.; Wm. R. Robinson, Company C, 16th N. C.; Jesse Young, Company C, 16th N. C.; John Tachyfill, Company C, 16th N. C.; A. O. Lynch, Company C, 34th N. C.; Allen M. Melness, Company K, 34th N. C.; D. A. Wilson, Company G, 38th N. C.; Gilbert Arwood, Company F, 38th N. C.; Calvin J. Deal, Company G, 38th N. C.; G. B. Powell, Company I, 38th N. C.; Margania Jones, Company I, 38th N. C.; L. J. Wells, Company E, 38th N. C.; Dan Hoffman, Company F, 38th N.

C.; John D. Hoke, Company F, 38th N. C.; Alf Gross, Company G, 38th N. C.; Daniel M. Matthews, Company G, 38th N. C.; Wm. L. Lackey, Company G, 38th N. C.; James W. Lackey, Company G, 38th N. C.; D. B. Talley, Company B, 38th N. C.; Y. Brewer, Company C, 38th N. C.; H. Young, Company F, 16th N. C.; K. A. Painter, Company A, 16th N. C.; P. L. Edwards, Company L, 16th N. C.; E. M. Hunnicutt, Company C, 16th N. C.; Dallas James, Company F, 16th N. C.; Jos. B. Green, Company F, 16th N. C.; John M. Snelson, Company F, 16th N. C.; John K. Hall, Company A, 16th N. C.; John Gellick, Company A, 2nd Miss. Battalion; Levy C. Cooper, Company C, 44th Ga.; A. H. Jones, Company I, 1st N. C.; Thomas J. Roland, Company F, 48th Ga.; Benjamin F. Harrison, Company G, 3rd Va.; Robert M. Scott, Company D, 12th Miss.; Seth S. Martin, Company E, 12th Miss.; William H. Lewis, Company E, 1st N. C.; Isaac Rechelle, Company K, 3rd N. C.; Benjamin J. Garrish, 3rd N. C.; Company H; John Merillon, 3rd La. Batt. Company G; Owen Quen, 14th La. Regiment, Company A; William T. Brantly, 26th N. C.; Company L (died); James H. Belvio, Elijah W. Belvin, 1st N. C. Company I; James B. Beuton, 33rd N. C.; Company B; Elias S. Bruner, 12th Miss.; Company B; John R. Ruffin, 33rd N. C.; Company B; William Moore, 1st N. C.; Company G; A. W. Saadurity, 38th N. C.; Company H; Thomas Christian, 14th Ga., Company F; Joseph Ramage, 14th Ga., Company B; Lewis Miller, 16th N. C.; Company D; William J. Nelson, drummer, 7th N. C.; Company C; John W. Yates, 22nd N. C., Company E.

HOWARD HOSPITAL.

J. E. Moss, 25th N. C.; H. Helms, 48th N. C.; W. D. Sitton, J. J. Justice, J. H. Edney, 25th N. C.; Lieut. R. H. Grier, 49th N. C.; L. J. Erwin, 25th N. C.; J. P. Keating, J. M. Johnson, 4th Ga.; W. A. Roberts, 35th N. C.; Z. F. Milbourn, 8th Va.; R. Bowin, J. A. Campbell, 24th N. C.; M. B. Wells, Jno. Jearmont, 12th Va.; W. B. Coston, M. L. Williams, J. W. King, 25th N. C.; W. H. Calahan, J. N. Hopkins, 22nd Ga.; P. Nicholson, Jas. Kelley, 1st La.; H. P. Conner, 25th N. C.; Corporal J. A. Hedrick, 45th N. C.; J. B. Berkhalter, 22nd Ga.; W. T. Horn, 26th N. C.; G. McKirby, 5th Ala.; J. P. Smith, W. S. Alexander, W. A. Millard, 1st Tenn.; J. A. Stewart, Lieut. C. J. Dickerson, A. Hall, 12th Miss.; J. M. Cox, 22nd N. C.; W. R. Haynes, 38th N. C.; D. H. Hannick, 16th N. C.

BOYSTER HOSPITAL.

J. D. Oliver, 2nd N. C.; N. Gendro, 19th Miss.; P. P. Slayd, 1st N. C.; M. Clinton, 12th Miss.; S. E. Steed, 38th N. C.; J. P. Jones, 16th N. C.; Luther C. Hale, 24th N. C.; A. Williams, 5th Ala.; J. W. Whitesel, 28th Va.; 2nd Lieut. A. C. Chisholm, 9th Ala.; Lieut. T. M. Gresham, do.; G. W. Ridgway, do.; W. G. Winchester, do.; M. Miller, 26th Ala.; J. H. Sockwell, do.; H. O. M. Garrison, do.; John H. Jenkins, 4th Ga.; Jno. T. Nolan, do.; C. F. Floyd, 4th Ala.; F. P. Cumming, 8th Ala.; Ellis Carrell, 9th Ala.

CENTRAL DEPOT HOSPITAL.

W. Elliott, 24th N. C.; W. Ceson, 55th Va.; H. Heiney, 40th La.; J. Leadford, T. Darer, J. A. Clarke, W. Painter, 16th N. C.; J. A. Newton, 34th N. C.; F. Anlow, 16th N. C.; G. S. Dawtry, 38th N. C.; R. C. Holt, 2nd Va.; A. Garner, 40th Va.

FIRST ALABAMA HOSPITAL.

Lieut.-Col. S. F. Hall, 11th Ala.; W. P. Lucas, 5th Ala.; J. T. Hardaway, do.; W. A. Dudley, do.; J. W. Joiner, do.; P. Duke, 8th Ala.; John Dely, do.; Lieut. A. A. Walden, 11th Ala.; T. Avery, do.; Luther C. Kirksey, do.; Wm. H. H. Sanders, do.; Samuel A. Blake, do.; Sergeant Martin C. Norris, do.; Henry McGee, do.; Daniel N. Cosley, do.; Ellis Woods, do.; Sergeant W. R. Garthright, do.; W. C. Allen, 10th Ala.; Jas. H. Brownlee, do.; Wm. H. Malone, do.; Jos. S. Merrill, 11th Ala.; E. C. Reeves, 13th Ala.; Wm. B. Nance, 14th Ala.; J. Strother, do.; Sergeant W. Dozier, do.; J. J. Ogle, do.; Jasper O'Neil, do.; Corporal Jas. W. Garnett, do.; A. L. Kauffman, do.; J. J. Weaver, 26th Ala.; Corporal Benjamin Papsen, do.; Wilbur F. Claughton, Jeff. Davis Artillery, J. M. Jones, 3rd Va.

THIRD ALABAMA HOSPITAL.

Corporal W. M. Heath, William Harper, W. W. Cauthen, Israel Cottle, Sergeant C. M. Eden, J. R. Collyer, W. Johnson, R. A. Barker, S. P. Diliard, C. F. Shaw, 14th Ala.; A. A. Greer, G. M. Boyd, 5th Ala. Battalion; Lieut. J. B. Eamer, Lieut. J. B. Martin, W. W. Moragne, W. W. Burgess, H. H. Wood, 10th Ala.; W. W. Ellington, 11th Ala.; M. J. Boyle, John Mullard, Corporal, W. Matthews, 8th Ala.; H. W. Avery, Sergeant E. C. Richardson, T. S. Childers, A. Dunlap, R. H. Harris, D. F. Johnson, Sergeant W. F. Kirkland, Lieut. R. H. Sheton, 11th Ala.; J. L. Bentley, B. F. Adams, Sergeant A. F. Lewis, R. M. Rogers, 10th Ala.; H. P. Johnson, 8th Ala.; Charles Ellis, 4th Ala.; Corporal E. W. Thompson, E. L. Hammond, 5th Ala.; Richard Brown, F. E. Solley, 11th Ala.; J. F. Strange, Jacob L. Green, Silas Street, S. K. Hodge, W. T. Blair, W. B. Nivins, E. L. Millician, 10th Ala.; J. E. Beauchamp, William Hogan, 9th Ala.; R. S. Jones, 15th Ala.; C. L. Lovell, J. W. Bracken, J. Clive, J. W. White, 9th Ala.; Lieut. J. A. Burns, 5th Ala.; W. A. Sims, 5th Ala.; J. R. Coats, J. R. Britt, 11th Ala.; Henry Sharp, A. J. Boyd, W. E. Bledsoe, S. B. F. Watters, R. P. Lawley, 8th Ala.; Alex McJanis, W. N. Brownlee, 5th Ala.; Capt. G. C. Whaley, 10th Ala.; W. C. Broadway, 5th Ala. Battalion; E. P. Scruggs, 4th Ala.; N. Stallworth, 4th Ala.; B. B. Little, 5th Ala. Battalion; T. J. Gilhert, 5th Ala. Battalion; T. Bradshaw, 5th Ala. Battalion; J. W. Holloway, 5th Ala. Battalion; Noah Little, W. J. King, 5th Ala.; S. E. Andrews, W. J. King, 15th Ala.; B. Titus, H. P. Barkaloo, 8th Ala.; Sergeant F. P. Miller, 8th Ala.; John Closet, do.; A. P. Mansell, 15th Ala.; G. W. Sinton, do.; W. D. Farmer, do.; E. F. B. Broughton, do.; J. C. Hendrick, 10th Ala.; M. L. Brooks, 15th Ala.; W. Lindsey, do.; A. M. Downing, do.; J. M. Daddins, 4th Ala.; Sergeant W. Hammett, 11th Ala.; J. H. Rawls, do.; J. O. Duncan, do.; T. A. Lowry, do.; J. N. Gay, 8th Ala.; P. Herran, 5th Ala.; W. H. Nix, do.; Ira Howell, 1st S. C.; Sergeant S. L. Garrett, 6th Ala.; J. H. Franklin, 4th Ala.; J. W. Taylor, do.; J. D. Adrian, do.; J. T. Smith, 8th Ala.; D. N. Wheeler, 26th Ala.; T. K. Cuthy, 1st Ala.; L. C. Meyers, 6th Ala.; W. H. Ware, 4th Ala.; J. W. Wier, 11th Ala.; Corporal S. W. Chadwick, 5th Ala.; W. H. Dankin, 3rd Ala.; C. W. Goll, do.; J. H. Brownlee, 10th Ala.; Corporal W. R. Thomas, 5th Ala.; J. E. Cameron, 11th Ala.; Sergeant W. Western, 15th Ala.; Sergeant J. O. Malloy, 10th Ala.; Sergeant Thomas Brasher, do.; Lieut. J. E. Shelley, do.; T. S. Nabors, do.; J. W. Glover, do.; J. T. McAnahan, do.; J. A. Christian, do.; Sergeant J. M. Hackney, 9th Ala.; Corporal W. M. Barron, 13th Ala.; Lieut. David Reece, 26th Ala.; R. J. Stewart, 11th Ala.; J. H. Hill, 4th Ala.; J. L. King, 4th Ala.; Mr. J. Billingsley, 4th Ala.; Corporal J. H. Lindsay, 14th Ala.; Corporal N. L. Ferguson, 5th Ala. Battalion; James M. Patrick, 10th Ala.; V. Y. Allen, 14th Ala.; N. C. Beddin-field, 4th Ala.; John G. Ross, do.; W. H. Linebaugh, 8th Ala.; Lieut. F. C. Robins, 4th Ala.; Lieut. A. M. Moore, 10th Ala.; J. P. Clark, 11th Ala.; Capt. R. W. Cowan, 10th Ala.; Captain William Lee, do.; Corporal M. F. McClintock, 13th Ala.; S. P. Kennedy, do.; T. J. Yeatman, 40th Va.; D. L. Hodgins, 10th Ala.; Lieut. T. R. Herd, 8th Ala.; Corporal W. A. King, 11th Ala.; J. B. Cook, do.; James Brennan, 9th Ala.; Sergeant J. F. Maulitz, Jeff Davis Artillery; E. T. Saunders, 5th Ala. Battery; J. R. Stafford, 11th Ala.; George Craig, do.; B. F. R. Harris, do.; Isaac H. Reeves, 10th Ala.; Benj. Warren, do.; J. P. Campbell, 9th Ala.; J. K. Pinkston, 12th Ala.; D. Stoker, 11th Ala.; Corporal W. A. Davis, do.; W. T. Bryan, do.

FIRST GEORGIA HOSPITAL.

S. A. Willingham, Company C, 19th Ga.; J. R. Walker, Company I, 14th Ga.; R. G. Campbell, Company I, 44th Ga.; W. G. Allen, Company H, 19th Ga.; W. C. Gilmore, Company I, 45th Ga.; Sergeant W. G. Heard, Company I, 45th Ga.; G. W. Cowley, Company I, 48th Ga.; W. T. Hayslip, 55th Va.; J. T. Thompson, Company I, 22nd Ga.; W. A. Palmore, Company I, 2nd Ga.; J. O. Mulnir, Company I, 19th Ga.; A. M. Holland, Company K, 19th Ga.; A. K. Scott, Company K, 19th Ga.; S. Hemore, Company F, 19th Ga.; W. P. Parks, Company H, 19th Ga.; William White, Company F, 19th Ga.; W. H. Bednysfield, do.; William Camp, Company F, 23rd Ga.; E. D. Lane, Company D, 44th Ga.; W. B. Irby, Company I, 28th Ga.; B. H. Bragg, Company I, 25th Ga.; G. Elliott, Company G, 19th Ga.; and eleven sick men.

SECOND GEORGIA HOSPITAL.

22nd Georgia Regiment.—H. C. Broadwell, Company A; J. E. Loftis, Company E; C. W. Stewart, Company J; S. Hurst, Company A; L. N. Smith, Company E; Jno. Webb, Company E; Jesse Webb, do.; R. M. Howell, do.; C. W. Shaw, do.; W. A. Carroll, Company K; E. Tyler, Company F; J. W. Carroll, do.; Corporal W. E. Martin, do.; G. W. Barclay, Company N. 3rd Georgia Regiment.—J. N. English, Company C, 28th Georgia—S. M. Simpson, Company B, 44th Georgia—S. R. Aycock, Company C, 19th Mississippi—F. Fitzgibbon, Company B, 44th—J. Ralls, Company A; J. P. Wyatt, do. 19th Miss.—W. A. Hill, Company D, 44th Ga.—N. M. Christian, Company D; T. R. Daniel, Company D; G. W. Nunnally, Company C; B. Bachelior, Company F; Wm. W. Pascal, Company F; E. E. Macon, Company F; George W. Bunn, Company A; R. B. Richardson, Company A; W. H. Whaley, Company H, 48th Georgia—L. B. Sconyers, Company H, 44th Georgia—Wm. H. Peebles, Capt. Company A. J. R. Graham, Company H, 14th Ga.; Jas. Reed, Jno. Satterfield, Company K, 19th Ga.; Jas. McAlfey, Company B, 19th Ga.; H. M. Williams, Lt. Company H, 14th Ga.; H. B. Smith, Lt. Company H, 14th Ga.; W. P. Campbell, F. T. C. Barnes, Company F, 19th Ga.; A. C. Caldwell, Company E, 44th Ga.; S. G. Boon, Company F, 1st N. C.; T. J. Simmons, Lieut.-Col., 45th Ga.; Jno. Rigby, Company D, 35th Ga.; F. M. Stovall, Lt. Company A, 19th Ga.; J. J. Buckelerd, Company H, 44th Ga.; M. P. Sweeney, Company E, 44th Ga.; S. W. McMullen, Company I, 44th Ga.; P. W. Ward, Company F, 44th Ga.; J. P. Morris, Company I, 44th Ga.; J. V. Kelley, Company B, 44th Ga.; D. L. Hitchcock, Company F, 44th Ga.; P. M. Stewart, Company C, 44th Ga.; J. W. Lewis, Company D, 44th Ga.; C. L. Pitts, Company H, 44th Ga.; J. F. McKibben, Company D, 44th Ga.; J. W. Brooks, Company I, 44th Ga.; Samuel Milliam, Company F, 44th Ga.; J. M. Swann, Company D, 19th Ga.; L. Burroughs, Company K, 19th Ga.; E. A. Smith, Lt. Company K, 49th Ga.; J. W. Scott, Company H, 48th Ga.

THIRD GEORGIA HOSPITAL.

David Denton, 28th Ga.; J. H. Wodley, 14th Ga.; J. C. McGuigan, 38th N. C.; Wm. Derrick, 44th Ga.; A. C. Roberts, 35th Ga.; N. M. South, W. H. CLOPTON, W. H. Vaughan, 44th Ga.; F. M. Bairfield, 27th Ga.; Banks Crawford, Corporal J. Morrison, 19th Ga.; S. A. Parker, R. Chandler, E. Farrar, 2nd Ga.; J. Parker, Jno W. Jackson, 15th Ga.; H. W. Willis, 25th Ga.; J. P. S. Nash, 27th Ga.; J. H. H. Brown, 8th Ga.; W. C. Strickland, 31st Ga.; Jas. Gray, 13th Ga.; B. E. Brown, 2nd Fla.; Daniel Harris, 58th Va.; J. L. McCall, 5th S. C.

Casualties in the 40th Va. Regiment, June 26:—

Killed: M. Sibbe, Company D; S. Bell, Company C. Wounded: Adjt. Brokenbrough, shot in neck; Lieut. E. Brokenbrough, arm and leg broken; Capt. Sydnor, Company B, knee; Sergt. J. B. Williams, breast (slight); Sergt. J. R. Hall, breast (slight); Sergt. W. J. Stakes, leg (slight); J. G. Leeland, Company B, feet; R. R. Dunaway, Company H, shoulder; S. Rockwell, Company B, slightly in arm; W. H. McGowan, Company H, below knee; N. J. Saunders, Company H, slightly in hip; J. R. Cansey, Company A, thigh; Sergt. J. H. Edmonds, Company D, knee; D. D. Eford, Company E, hip; R. J. Loring, Company E, thigh; M. M. Murphy, Company K, foot; Sergt. G. W. Sanders, Company H, eye; Sergt. Geo. Walker, Company K, both legs; George Bowen, Company B, leg; C. H. Shaw, Company I, slightly in leg; E. S. Hughes, Company C, thigh; J. W. Henderson, Company I, thigh; J. B. Warwick, Company E, calf of leg (grape); N. H. Wilson, Company I, thigh; Sergt. Yeatman, Company D, knee.

List of Casualties of the 1st Regiment of Louisiana Volunteers, June 25, 1862:—

Field Officers.—Wounded: Lieut.-Col. Wm. R. Shivers, commanding, arm, severely; Sergt.-Major Henry E. Entzinger, leg broken.
Company A; Capt. Barman.—Killed: J. L. Turner, J. B. Babb, L. L. Gage, Jno. Sanders. Wounded: Sergt. A. H. Leonard, Sydney Atkinson, James Blair, Wm. Youngblood, Thos. J. Dolan, W. W. Williams, B. S. Gilham, S. Sparks, Johnson P. Kelly, Peter Nicholson, W. T. Logan, Thos. McGovern, Wm. Miles.
Company B; Capt. Groves.—Wounded: Sergeant J. M. Cavanaugh, 3rd Corporal Coburn, 2nd Corporal Jackson, Privates Belvin, Cooley, Fryer, Goynes, Horner, Knight, Nichols, Peavey, Thomas, Smith, Otto.
Company C; Lieut. Woodson in command.—Killed: Corporal Jos. Campbell, Frank R. Davis, Thos. Conlan. Wounded: Lieut. Wm. Woodson, 3rd Sergeant Jos. Bernier, 1st Corporal John Ahern, Michael Cass, Dewey, David Badley, Jas. E. Gofford, B. F. Gordon, Amos B. Grahb, Chas. Harrington, Thos. Moran, Jno. O'Sullivan, Richard Reiley, John Taylor, Chas. Taylor, Chas. Walters, Wm. Edgely.
Company D; Lieut. Buckley in command.—Killed: T. Pilkington. Wounded: Capt. Jas. Nelligan (acting Major), 1st Lieut. A. N. Cummings (acting Adjutant), 2nd Lieut. T. J. Buckley, 1st Sergeant R. McKeown, 4th Sergeant John

Kelly, J. Cain, T. Divine, T. Doyle, M. Golden, M. Kennedy, M. Mullias, J. White, O. Cole.

Company E (Montgomery Guards); Lieut. Gilmore in command.—Killed: 1st Lieut. Michael B. Gilmore, 2nd Lieut. Joseph Murphy, Michael R. Dwyer, Archy McDonald. Wounded: Sergeant James Barnwell, Corporal Michael Dwyer, Thomas Gleason, Michael Flannery, Jno. J. Sealler, Henry Heinmetz, William Powers, B. O'Connell, Pat Dorr, Jno. Berogan, Peter Keating, James Kelly, Tim McDermott, Michael J. Murray, Edward Whitbread, Jno. Fogarty, Martin Freeman, James Hanley, Thomas Eagan, William Buckley. Missing: Thomas Medley. Total—killed 4; wounded 20; and missing 1.

Company F; Captain Snowden.—Killed in skirmish of 23rd, Henry Meyers; in skirmish of 25th, Robert Williams and Thomas Bratcher. Wounded: Lieut. James Dillon, Corporal Jno. Grey, L. Callott, Henry Clark, Edward Hoffman, J. W. Spencer. Total—killed 3; wounded 6.

Company G, Capt. Willett.—Killed: Sergeant John McDonald; and Colamas W. Read. Wounded: 1st Lieut. W. D. Hendricks, 2nd Lieut. Mark O'Rourke, 1st Sergeant Philip H. Raymond, Sergeant J. T. Kelly, Samuel Kells, Samuel Brown, W. C. Lee, William Hensig, David H. De Silva. Total—killed 2; wounded 9.

Company H (Shreveport Grays); Lieut. Lamkin in command.—Wounded: Robert Johnson, A. B. Spell, J. E. Youngblood, L. Loeb, R. T. Mansfield. Total—wounded 5.

Company I; Lieut. Trott in command. Killed: Lieut. George L. Trott and Jno. Bain. Wounded: Capt. Charles E. Cormier, 1st Lieut. Jos. Taylor, Jacob Euredorf, George Almindinger, Avery Breed, Nat Barnes, Henry Coleman, William Hunter, J. T. Lorains, Robert Jackson, William Triple. Missing: Robert Garraway and James M. Grant. Total—killed 2; wounded 12; missing 2.

Company K; Capt. William L. Randall.—Killed: Pat Moran and Thomas Reardon. Wounded: Capt. William L. Randall, Lieut. James Malloy, Corporal Jeremiah Keller, A. Crommeller, Jno. Doan, Philip Georges, William O'Callaghan, Charles Thiehl, George Zuger. Missing: Samuel J. Block. Total—killed 2; wounded 2; missing 1.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Colonel Starke, 60th Virginia, left hand shattered.
Colonel Johnson, 13th Georgia, mortally wounded.
Major Burke, Capt. Brooks, Capt. Street, Capt. Jett, wounded; Lieut. C. T. Goodrick, wounded in leg, 55th Virginia, all at Mechanicsville, Thursday night.
Adjutant Brokenbrough, wounded in neck; Lieut. Brokenbrough, arm broken and wounded in hip; Capt. Sydnor, shot through the knee, 40th Virginia.
Adjutant Holcomb, killed; Capt. Vandergraft, wounded in foot, 5th Alabama Battalion.
Capt. Geo. C. Lewis, Company K, 12th North Carolina, slight wound in thigh.

THE following despatch of General Lee, addressed to President Davis, and written in the flush of victory, is in marked contrast to the arrogant, boastful despatches of General McClellan.

Headquarters, June 27, 1862.

His Excellency President Davis:—

Mr. President,—Profoundly grateful to Almighty God for the signal victory granted to us, it is my pleasing task to announce to you the success achieved by this army to-day.

The enemy was this morning driven from his strong position behind Beaver Dam Creek, and pursued to that behind Powhite Creek, and finally, after a severe contest of five hours, entirely repulsed from the field.

Night put an end to the contest. I grieve to state that our loss in officers and men is great.

We sleep on the field, and shall renew the contest in the morning. I have the honour to be, very respectfully, (Signed) R. E. LEE, General.

The Richmond Dispatch has the following in reference to the flight of the Federals on Sunday, June 29:—

About one a.m., Sunday morning, our pickets down the Nine Mile Road were fiercely attacked by the enemy, and a severe and lively fight ensued. The enemy were easily driven back with loss, many prisoners falling into our hands. Many of the Federals threw down their arms and surrendered voluntarily. Sunday morning, about six or seven o'clock, another fierce picket fight occurred. General Griffith's Mississippi Brigade moved down and pursued them past their fortifications, which were found for the most part deserted. It thus became a matter of fact that the enemy were in full flight.

Pursuit was instantly made, and several fights ensued. All their camps—waggons, commissary, and quartermaster camps, also—were totally destroyed. Immense piles of stores were blazing at the moment of our visit, the Mississippians pursuing over the red ashes of the camps and stores. Our army is following close at their heels, and many prisoners are hourly arriving. Loud explosions were heard during the afternoon, caused by the destruction of vast quantities of ammunition. Dense columns of smoke darkened the sky. The railroad Merrimac was far in advance of our men, and was vigorously shelling the enemy at every turn. They are endeavouring to reach James River, but are totally cut off therefrom. Their loss must prove fearful.

General Griffith was mortally wounded by a fragment of a shell, whilst standing near the Merrimac, on the railroad. Col. Bartsdall, of the 13th Mississippi, now commands the Mississippi Brigade. The Richmond Dispatch says:—

The Federal flag made by the Yankees to float over our Capitol, was captured by Major Bloomfield, of General Magrader's staff, in the Federal camps, and was exhibited, with great applause, to our troops. It is an immense piece of work, fully twenty feet long, having thirteen stripes and thirty-two stars thereon! We understand McClellan received it as a present from the ladies of the city of Boston, and promised to plant it on the veritable "last ditch" to which the rebels should be run, and afterwards would elevate it, with all military honours, on our Capitol at Richmond. How are the mighty fallen!

PRIVATE LETTERS.

Extract from a letter from a Southern lady:—

One of my brothers from New Orleans is here now; he left on July 11, and brings accounts of General Butler and his brutality, which are beyond recital. There is no Union feeling in New Orleans—nothing but coercion, with the pistol pointed at the victim, or the prison open to receive him, produces submission. Butler's serenades are by his own order, and the bands of his own regiments. He is encased in mail up to his chin, and sits with a table before him, upon which lies a loaded pistol. He pronounces sentences with a diabolical scowl, and grating his teeth. He says he wishes to have nothing to do with ordinary persons, but desires the handling of the first people of the community, that he may make an example of them. Dr. Stone was arrested, no reason being given, and was told to go to Fort Jackson, or pay a fine of $500. The latter he refused to do, saying that if he did, every one in the community who had that sum might be subjected to the same imposition; whereupon he was taken to prison; Mrs. Stone approving his course. Butler has organized a system of secret police, whose emissaries stand at the corner to overhear remarks made by one friend to another. Dr. McPherson was imprisoned for saying that Butler's proclamation regarding the ladies of New Orleans was an "infamous paragraph."

My brother will soon start for Europe, but my other two cannot leave New Orleans, as Butler has issued another proclamation, which requires all who leave the city to take the oath."

The following is an Extract from a letter written by a lady residing in Louisville to her brother in London:—

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, July 23, 1862.

Since writing the above, this city has been thrown into the greatest commotion by the news that the guerillas had attacked Lebanon, and were marching on Louisville. I cannot describe to you the excitement of our citizens. Meetings have been held calling on every man who can shoulder a musket to prepare to defend the city. Morgan's name has struck terror into the hearts of some of the people here. Quiet, peaceable citizens are arrested daily, and the military prisons are crowded. No mails have been sent to Nashville for several days; they are afraid to trust the cars on the road, and are expecting that city to be attacked daily. We are in the midst of a most terrible state of affairs, hearing of nothing but blood and carnage on all sides; people seem to think the loss of life a mere trifle, and talk of the loss of thousands of precious lives with perfect indifference, seeming not to think of the hearts rent and torn with grief, or the many happy homes made desolate. Such is human nature, we get used to anything. Last 4th July was celebrated here with more festivity and boisterousness than for several years past. I felt more than usually sad that day, as it brought back happy days gone for ever, and dear forms never more to be seen in this world, thanks to this horrid war, the existence of which, curiously enough, seems to have added fresh lustre to that glorious day, once so proudly boasted of.

The sad condition of our country is enough to cast a gloom over every thinking mind, and now the Reign of Terror seems to have commenced—guerilla warfare right in our midst—God only knows where it will end—for my part, I think the war has only just begun.

All those having Southern sympathies are commanded to keep them to themselves, under penalty of being imprisoned; and—would you believe it?—they have fitted up Fanny Bullitt's fine house, in Jefferson-street, as a prison for ladies! Think of that in chivalrous Kentucky!

There is a very strong Southern feeling here, which is only waiting for a suitable time to break out. The successes of the Confederate arms in Virginia, and the dread of foreign intervention, recently has shaken most severely the faith of some of the most rabid and staunch Unionists of this State. Come what may, there never can be a Union of feeling between the North and South.

Military matters here are pretty much in the hands of the Dutch and other foreign mercenaries, and, you may judge, that they make very good use of their temporary power, by lording it over those who may fall in their way. One of them, a guard at a prison, shot a Southern man dead the other day, for waving his handkerchief out of the window at a passing friend. Union officers have been seen drinking whiskey and consorting with negro women in the filthiest and lowest precincts of the city. I was accosted in the streets a few days ago by one of these Northern hiring officers, who had the impudence to give me the military salute. I felt like spitting in the vile wretch's face. Be assured that Kentucky will yet awake from her disgraceful thralldom, and then let the Lincolnites look to it.

The following is from the letter of one of the oldest tobacco houses in Richmond, written just before the late battles:—

Some parties have removed their tobacco into the interior, since the enemy has moved closer upon us, as tobacco, as with cotton, will be burned wherever there is danger of its falling into the hands of the enemy.

Preparation has been made for applying the torch to our warehouses, if it becomes necessary, to which we are willing to submit; and our people are so firmly determined to resist to the last and bitter end, that we prefer to see the capital shelled and in ashes, rather than quietly let it fall into the possession of the enemy, as we are tired of this giving up cities to them.

We have made a great mistake in trying to defend too extended a line, but having drawn the lines in, we will fight it out, and even if defeated here, we shall never give up. But we have no fear that the enemy can ever get here with their gunboats, nor do we believe that they will by land, if McClellan will give battle.

We are expecting a great struggle near this city, and also at Corinth, upon which so much depends; if we are successful, we hope our success will be followed up; but if defeated, it will only protract, but not end the war, for submission or reconstructing is not thought of. If we had the same facilities of procuring from Europe what we need, that are open to the North, we could have had more men in the field, and made a better defence. But by the time you receive this, probably something decisive may have occurred. We are hopeful and sanguine of success.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, July 26, 1862.

The violent storm that raged in Wall-street for some days has been succeeded by an ominous calm; breakers, however, are quite visible ahead, everything is drifting ashore, and there will soon be a general wreck. Mr. Chase's "card house" is still standing, but his extra story of new issues, and attic of postage stamps, will cause the paper structure to fall to pieces. The first batch of United States' demand notes merely took the place of the circulation of the country banks, leaving that of the moneyed institutions of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, as large as it was a year ago; the second instalment now being emitted will drive all bank notes out of existence, and there will be nothing left as a medium or basis for transactions but Government paper. The effect of this will shortly be apparent at the Stock boards of the three cities, where nearly all the transactions in Federal interest-paying securities take place; there will no longer be a market for them. The bulls and the bears cannot speculate for a rise or a fall, as the only margin for the exercise of such financial talent is in the trifling difference between the fixed rate of interest and the current rate of discount, which would not pay the brokerage. Such operations will be worse than barter, they would simply be swapping one article for another of the same kind. Nor is this all. The banks and bankers have been making large loans to contractors upon promissory notes, with United States' Treasury notes and certificates of indebtedness as collateral, the value of the same being dictated by the quotations at the Stock Exchange; so, as soon as they cease to be a football for those transactions, it will be impossible to borrow money upon them. The truth is, that of the $1600,000,000 of Government debt, scrip of the various kinds has only been issued to the extent of $900,000,000, and of this amount not over $200,000,000 have been taken for bona fide investment; notwithstanding facetious economists say these securities are permanent in their character, the enormous remainder is floated in the manner described.

The round figures of 20 per cent. attracted many of the small holders of specie to part with five gold dollars for six paper dollars. The importers and foreign bankers, all of whom are heavily in debt to Europe, have withheld from the market in order to lower the premium, and a natural recession of 2 to 3 per cent. has taken place; but there will be an upward turn again next week. In the face of the large balances due to Lombard-street, for past business, and the limited exports of produce in comparison with the imports, it is idle to suppose that gold can be kept from rising; many of our financiers and merchants are blinded by being so near the scene of action.

The feeling in favour of a termination of the war has taken a strong hold among the masses, who, for the first time, are beginning to feel its cost in the increased expense of living; for all their requirements they have to pay an enhanced price, except house-rent, which is lower than for many years. The Washington authorities are endeavouring to rouse up the people to aid in the continuance of hostilities; on June 28, after they had heard of the first three days' fighting before Richmond, and before they communicated the same to the public, they "forged" a letter in reference to more troops, requesting permission by telegraph to use the names of the Governors of States; finding that not to answer the purpose, they are now resorting to most disreputable means, through the aid of certain officials in the North, which may soon cause the large cities to be placed under the control of Vigilance Committees. We expect some exciting times in political affairs.

PARIS, August 6.

The Secretary of the Navy has just returned from visiting in succession the four great military French ports, Cherbourg, Lorient, Brest, and Toulon. He is reported to have given at all of these maritime arsenals the most urgent directions to expedite the naval armaments destined for Mexico, and the greatest exertions are made in every department to execute his imperative and pressing orders. The last accounts from that country were of a favourable character. The little French band had handsomely worsted its numerous opponents, and Zaragoza's army was reported to be in a condition of discouragement, weakened by numerous daily desertions and unable to renew their attacks. But there exists always the same conviction that the French navy must be prepared for some other work than operations against a Republic which has no ships, and the Patrie of yesterday had the following, under the signature of E. E. Gulland:—"A naval squadron will have arrived at the beginning of November in the Vermilion Sea. Our army then will march on the city of Mexico. It is important that such a demonstration should take place at that moment, in order to watch the events which may take place on the coast of Sonora and of old California."

The orders for the formation of this fleet were given simultaneously with the explanations requested from the Government of President Lincoln by our representative at Washington on the subject of the loan to Juarez, and the security thereof consisting in the pawning by Juarez of some of the provinces of the Republic which he governs.

My thoughts are principally directed to America; but I cannot help being struck with the dangers that seem to be now threatening the repose of Europe. Garibaldi was looked upon as having somewhat "la tête près du bonnet," but no one imagined that his restless mind would carry him to such crazy attempts against the laws and against the safety of his own country, as he has been actually guilty of. "El re gallantuomo," had to make proclamations to oppose those of his general, who is kind enough to continue his praise of his King, but would like, it appears, to take to himself the arbitrament of peace and war. As for Parliament, he does not care for it. Not content with endeavouring to let loose again in Italy the dogs of war, he wants to help Hungary, Poland, Montenegro, Servia, Greece, and what not, into universal conflagration. Victor Emmanuel and himself are represented as great friends, but I wonder if the former does not sometimes regret that the Red Shirt Champion has not accepted the offer of the Federals to take command of their cosmopolitan bands. It is hard to tell what he will do, and where he will go. A large number of young men from the north of Italy are joining him. Will his English friends be as much delighted if he pounces upon the Turks as if he confines himself to landing upon the Roman coast, and driving away Count de Montebello, just as if the last were a Neapolitan general, with a Neapolitan force under him? He has fought against the French, and also on the same side with them; and if his head was clear, he would know better. I have no patience with all these mob-leaders, and that part of the press who are the devotees of the mob everywhere. They are, of course, great sympathizers with the North, and bitter, venomous, lying opponents of the South. But they will learn before long that no numbers, no wealth, no brutal strength, no despotism, no embodiment of all possible superior practical advantages, when under the control of a mob, can compete with the honest, patriotic, lawful, and conservative spirit of a people who defend their legitimate rights, and respect the rights of others.

The war in Montenegro, on the other hand, and the disaffection in Servia, have come to a dangerous crisis. The whole diplomatic talent of Europe are busy at Constantinople, trying to avoid, or rather to postpone, what seems threatening—the final scene of the great drama of Turkish empire in Europe. The hopes of an understanding between the Prince of Montenegro and the Government of the Sultan, on account of an armistice having been proposed, are abandoned, and negotiations are at an end. The mountaineers, under their chief, Mirko, are preparing for a desperate resistance; every boy, not under twelve years old, has joined the army.

M. Thouvenel has not enjoyed a long leave of absence, and returned yesterday to Paris. The Emperor is expected to-morrow. His Majesty will remain at St. Cloud until the 19th inst., and will then start for the camp at Châlons, whilst the Empress and the Imperial Prince will go to Biarritz. If the current rumours are to be credited, the Emperor Napoleon will make a short stay at Châlons, and will undertake a journey of several days before joining the Empress. The object of such journey will be the already announced meeting of crowned heads to take place in one of the towns of the German frontier. The above information I believe correct.

Some uneasiness had been felt about the crops, because of the late heavy rains. I am happy to say that according to the most reliable reports, the corn crop has, on the contrary, been improved by them. It is confidently believed that there will be fully enough of wheat for the year's consumption of the nation, and a certain quantity to spare is expected.

Despite the ambiguous denials of Earl Russell, the belief is unshaken that an amicable advice is on its way to the Government at Washington from the great Powers of Europe. But the news of Mitchell's and Turchin's conduct in Alabama has aroused the unqualified indignation of every French gentleman. In the bloodiest times of civil wars, a school containing young ladies has always been held sacred by the most savage combatants.

True, such infamy incidentally helps the Southern cause; but better to sacrifice the lives of thousands of men on the altar of Liberty, rather than be benefited by such crimes. The outrage will be revenged, though not on the women or children of the Northern brigands; but the crime shall be washed out in the blood of the monsters themselves. There is not a Southerner, native or adopted citizen, who, at any time, at any place, and to his last day, will meet one of Turchin's command, and not kill him as a mad dog.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE RECOGNITION OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, Lord CAMPBELL rose to move for copies or extracts of any correspondence which Her Majesty's Government had received from Mr. Mason, the Southern Envoy, relating to the acknowledgment of the Confederate States of America by Great Britain. He said, as the Government had already laid before Parliament, in the first number of the papers on America, the despatch of Colonel Mann and Mr. Yancey, demanding the acknowledgment of the Southern Confederacy in 1861, and had also laid before Parliament a despatch of Mr. Mann at the beginning of the present year on the blockade, there could be no technical objection to present any correspondence of a later period. It was well known that the Southern envoys, both in London and in Paris, had recently demanded the acknowledgment of the States they represented, and of which the power to defend their capital against an invading force, was in the last days of June triumphantly asserted. In one sense, indeed, the papers would be useless; they could do little to enhance—so strong was it already—the conviction which appeared to pervade society and Parliament, that the war ought to end in separation of the Northern and the Southern Powers. It was not too much to say that no class or party in the country any longer desired to see the reconquest of the South and the reconstruction of the Union. The unanimity might be traced to many different causes. It was owing in some measure to the seasonable flood of light which Mr. Spence, in his well-known work, had thrown upon the subject; it was owing in a still greater measure to the speech of the noble lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on the 10th of March, in which he told the world that separation was the issue of the struggle which he contemplated, and that at a period not distant from the time when he was speaking. It was owing also to the labours of enlightened men in the House of Commons, of whom Mr. Gregory had been the most conspicuous. But still more should the unanimous desire for separation and aversion to reconquest in this country be traced to the conviction that the interest of the negro race would be promoted by the former and retarded by the latter; that the area of slavery must be limited when separation happened, and would most likely be extended if reconquest unhappily occurred. It was further strengthened by the fact that the limited advance of the invaders had, during part of the year, and the capture of New Orleans, disproved the existence of any Southern party, for the Union, had revealed in the South a self-sacrificing heroism and inexhaustible endurance which could not have been counted on before; had shown, in point of fact, that the South could only be restored to the Government which formerly possessed it, by an exterminating war, as well as an aggressive one. Besides the devastation and destruction it would bring upon the South, it was generally seen that reconquest of the Union threatened the North with military despotism, trade with insupportable restrictions, and Europe with prolonged uneasiness. These papers were not wanted to give new force to a conviction so prevailing, but they might throw light upon the course which Great Britain ought to follow amid the dangers which surrounded her in consequence of this civil war. The first danger of Great Britain—viz., the possibility of Southern subjugation, and all the evils it involved, might be, perhaps, dismissed as a remote one. The second danger, which arose from the continuance of the war—the manufacturing distress it must occasion—was far more serious and imminent. So long as the war continued, a scarcity of cotton must be apprehended. If, indeed, the American supply were utterly and finally extinguished, the means would not, perhaps, be wanting to replace it; but so long as the American supply was constantly impeding on the market they could not hope to gain a large amount from Africa or India. And who should say what degree of social or political disorder might not follow manufacturing distress if it extended over four years or upwards? Another danger for Great Britain, more likely to remain unnoticed, but not less easy to describe, was that, if the war should end in separation before this country had merited alliance from the Southern Power, Canada was exposed without an adequate defence to at least a possible invader. If Canada was unable to support a numerous militia, if Britain was unable to send large armies to her succour, what defence could they rely on except a firm ally upon that continent, prepared at any moment to cross the frontier of the Power by which an unjust attack was made upon our dependency? It should never be forgotten that we were not able to secure the duration of the contest—that after the exhaustion of the combatants, we could not prevent other Powers by their influence from bringing the war to a conclusion, although we might refuse to share so great and meritorious an effort. Some persons have ingeniously contended that, looking to British objects, we ought not to bring about or to desire a termination of hostilities; that the evils arising from such a termination were greater than the evils which the war itself inflicted on us, and that our policy and business was to stand still and let it rage as long and burn out as gradually as possible. Such counsels might be just if we had any guarantee for its continuance. But we clearly had not. Suppose Great Britain held aloof completely in the present autumn, while the other Powers of Europe, swayed by the French Government, employed their moral force to terminate the war in Southern independence. In two months Canada might be assailed and Great Britain be without the least support on that continent. If, however, Great Britain had united with the other Powers of Europe (after showing every observance to the Government of Washington) in acknowledging the independence of the South, she would not be unsupported in America when separation happened. Such a mode of acting, if it did not at once remove the chance of Southern subjugation, was calculated to remove it. If it did not at once arrest the civil war, it was calculated to arrest it. Of the three dangers, therefore, he had ventured to enumerate, it provided against one, and had a tendency, at least, to neutralize the others. But if no one could allude to the line of action which became us, without the greatest caution and reserve, there was one point on which any man might speak with openness and firmness. Recognition being put out of the question, the civil war could never end until foreign Powers had recognized the Government of Richmond. Since modern Europe came into existence no civil war had ended in the sovereignty of the insurgent Power until that Power had been recognized by neutral States, giving an example to the State which aimed at its reconquest. It was not till Portugal had been acknowledged by Great Britain twenty-five years, that Spain consented to acknowledge her existence as an independent Power. It was not till long after nearly all the Governments of Europe had acknowledged the United Provinces of Holland, that Spain gave up the hope of re-absorbing them. The same circumstance applied to the United States, the South American Republics, to Greece, to Belgium, and to Italy. The acknowledgment by neutral Powers had always preceded the acknowledgment by the Power which first endeavored to control the insurrection. It was not too much to lay down as a principle, that war must go on against an insurgent State until neutral Powers had acknowledged it. The war for a reconquest could not be abandoned while neutral Powers sanctioned its continuance. At least it never had been. And that principle would have the strongest application to the Government of Washington. However sickened of the war, it was only by the voice of Europe they could be delivered from the horrible necessity of waging it. Some new and powerful authority was requisite to pave the way for so great a change of system upon their part. Having undertaken to coerce the Southern States; having drawn 500,000 men from peaceful avocations; having sent the tax-gatherer to range among homes which he had never darkened; having ensnared the people of the North into unprecedented sacrifices by a vision which ninety days would always enable them to grasp; but which after two campaigns remained impalpable as ever; with what face could they recede from their engagements, renounce their aspirations, avow at once their error and their guilt, while Europe still declined to acknowledge Southern independence. Separation was impossible, until the effort to reconquer was discarded. The effort to reconquer must go on, until foreign Powers granted to the South the recognition which it asked for. So long as they withheld it, they compelled the Government of Washington to persevere in its unnatural and sanguinary labours. The whole question as regarded acknowledgment appeared to turn upon the moment. If other Powers of Europe were prepared, had England a right to count upon a better one? Operations of gunboats were retarded by the dryness of the navigable rivers; operations on land, by the fearful heat and the diseases it engendered. Richmond was no longer menaced. Securities at New York had undergone a great depreciation. The war, as far as they could judge, had lost its hold on popular opinion. The Abolitionists who followed Mr. Sumner had ceased to give it their support. Mr. Lincoln in vain endeavored to raise 300,000 men. The invading army, under Halleck, near the Mississippi was not able to advance. And if many of the most reflecting men believed that in December and January last Europe lost an opportunity of taking that step without which the war could scarcely end, and which would then, perhaps, have closed it, with what decision and despatch ought not a new conjuncture which invited to such a mode of acting be made use of? There was this difference between the present and the former opportunity. In January the Federals had never been victorious in battle, and, however resigned to separation, however hopeless of reconquest, might still prolong the war in order to recover their prestige, and repair their military losses. Now the greater balance of success was likely to extinguish such a difficulty. But if the present moment is abandoned what are we to wait for?—not for Northern victories. Such victories would closely limit our capacity to acknowledge Southern independence, as it was limited from the defeat and death of Zollicoffer in the winter down to the events which have lately driven General McClellan to the river. We are to wait, therefore, for new misfortunes to the Government of Washington before we grant to this unhappy strife the possibility of closing. If so, how hard a situation do we place them in. The language of the noble lord in March, the tenor of events, and the impressions of the world, forbid them any longer to aspire to reconquest. But yet until their prospects are more dark and their embarrassments more fatal, we will not help them to conclude the war by separation. Is it not enough to see their armies driven back, their capital alarmed, their spirits gone, and their finance exhausted? Before we grant the extrication they must owe to neutral Powers, are we to wait until the Southern forces are again aggressive and triumphant; until the invaders are invaded, until the avengers are the victims, until the Northern States are overrun, until Washington is occupied—until, at least, its Government has encountered new humiliations, losses, and disasters at the hands of the people whom they had rashly undertaken to chastise and to subdue? At least, England is hardly justified in waiting for new reverses to the Federals, unless it is the only conduct in which the other Powers of Europe would support us. In that case no doubt we are entitled to pursue it. Perhaps the noble lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would describe such a case as being the real one. If not, his silence would explode it. The noble lord concluded by moving for the correspondence.

Earl RUSSELL said, I am sorry that it is not convenient to give the papers which have been moved for. The Envoy of the Southern States has never been officially received here, and, as the correspondence has been entirely of an unofficial character, I do not think it would be advisable to produce it. There is, however, a despatch of Mr. Seward's, communicated to me by Mr. Adams, and another to Mr. Seward in reply, in which the views of Her Majesty's Government are stated. We remain as we were a few months ago—we have not altered our position, and there is little more than that fact contained in the despatch. In the event of adopting any new line of policy, I should think it necessary to communicate with the maritime Powers of Europe before taking any steps. My noble friend seems to understand that the maritime Powers wish to recognize the Southern States, and that some objection on our part has prevented the recognition. Now, I have had no communication from any foreign Power stating any wish or making any proposition with regard to the recognition of the Southern States of America. Under these circumstances, I hope my noble friend will not press his motion, as it would not be convenient to give the papers now, though I may produce them hereafter. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of MALMESBURY said the noble earl had used a wise discretion in not producing communications from a person who was not officially recognized. He did not know whether the noble lord would give some information to the House on one or two points at this time of the Session. They were now, at a most anxious moment, about to separate for five months, and the country was very ignorant of the state of affairs, and felt a great anxiety to know a little more, if the noble earl thought it within his duty to give the information. He (the Earl of Malmesbury), from the first day of the Session, had always said that the whole question of the blockade, or of interference by way of recognition or mediation, was one of time, and must be left to Her Majesty's Government, who alone were responsible for choosing the proper time for acting. It would, however, be very interesting to know whether, when that time did arrive, the noble earl had ascertained that he would be assisted in a policy of recognition or mediation by any or several of our allies. He did not think it possible that anything could be done by this country alone. We should be doing more harm than good if we were to attempt it, in consequence of the very unjust feeling which seemed to exist in the United States. But he could not but hope, when the moment arrived for something to be done, that we should be backed by our ally on the other side of the Channel, by Russia, and by other Powers of Europe. He should be glad to know if the noble lord had some hopes of bringing the opinion of those Powers to bear on the question. He could not help feeling that this country had some confidence in such a question being discussed. He thought the time, moreover, was approaching when it might be discussed with the United States if Lord Lyons were at his post, but he feared that Lord Lyons's absence, if it were much prolonged, would, besides being a disadvantage to the noble earl's policy, make it appear to many persons that the time when Her Majesty's Government could interfere was not very near at hand. He did not believe that Lord Lyons had been recalled by anything but very pressing business of his own. He should be sorry to interfere with any pressing concerns on the part of Lord Lyons, but the noble earl would agree with him that for the sake of appearances, as well as on other considerations, it was not desirable that Lord Lyons should be very long absent from his post.

Earl RUSSELL.—I will answer as well as I can the questions put to me by the noble earl. With regard to the first question, I agree with the noble earl that if any steps are taken it would be desirable that they should be taken by all the principal Powers of Europe. I do not doubt that the opinion of the maritime Powers of Europe would carry much weight with the Government of the United States; but it is very desirable that all the great Powers should join in any representations that may be made. With regard to France, all I can say is, that hitherto there has been an intimate and unreserved communication between Her Majesty's Government and that of the Emperor of the French, and I do not recollect any instance in which a difference of opinion has arisen between them on this subject. With regard to the Government of Russia, I am not in the same constant communication with that Government, but, if I were to state the inclination of my mind, it would be that Russia would be ready to consider any step that might be thought necessary, and that both Russia and France would weigh in a most impartial spirit any proposition that might be made to those Governments. With regard to the other Powers of Europe, I should say that they are disposed to take the same view. If, however, I thought it my duty, and if Her Majesty's Government thought it their duty, to make any such communications they ought very deliberately to consider the matter before any such step is taken. Unfortunately, an opinion prevails in the United States with regard to this country which is not justified by any conduct on our part, because it has been as friendly and as straightforward as possible. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the second question, as to Lord Lyons, I would say that no man ever attended more assiduously to the duties of his mission than Lord Lyons, and those duties have been not only onerous, but have caused him great anxiety from time to time. Lord Lyons has acted with perfect discretion on every occasion, but after two or three years' discharge of the duties to which he was recommended by the noble earl, and after filling the position he occupied at Washington, his health gave way. We felt that we could not expect to obtain the full benefit of his advice and assistance if he were in a bad state of health, and when Lord Lyons asked for a short leave of absence, to spend the summer here, his request was granted. About the beginning of October he will return to his post, and in the meantime the duties of the mission will be adequately and effectually performed by Mr. Stuart, who is in friendly communication with the United States' Government.

Lord Kingsdown said that their lordships had reposed a most unusual confidence in the Government, for during the whole of the Session, with perhaps, only a single exception, matters of extreme nicety and importance had been left to the judgment and discretion of Her Majesty's Government. He did not complain of this, but one reason for abstaining from discussing this subject had been that the noble earl (Russell) had entertained and expressed a more sanguine view of the termination of this dispute than the event had justified. The noble earl had expressed a confident belief that in the space of two or three months the dispute between the North and the South would be so far settled that any interference on the part of the Legislature in the meantime would be prejudicial rather than advantageous. He did not blame the noble earl for being mistaken, for it was impossible to anticipate the course of events in the United States. At that time a question of very great moment, and one which well deserved the most serious consideration of their lordships, was at issue—namely, the principle of the efficiency or inefficiency of the blockade of the ports of the Southern States. It was now perfectly useless to enter upon this question. If this country were to recognize the independence of the South the right to blockade the ports of the South would remain, and any interference on our part with that blockade would probably be followed by a war with the Northern States. He trusted that the noble lord would withdraw a motion which could not be attended with any good results.

Earl RUSSELL said he felt very grateful to their lordships for abstaining from interfering with the discretion of Her Majesty's Government, which he trusted had been wisely exercised in this matter.

The motion, after a few words from Lord STRATHEDEN, was then withdrawn.

The Albany Argus has the following reply to a recent article in the New York Tribune :—

THOU ART THE MAN!—We defy any person to name a partizan of the rebellion, North or South, who is not also a partizan of slavery. And mountains of obloquy heaped on Abolitionists will not obscure the fact that ninety-nine of every hundred of those branded Abolitionists have ever been for the Union, and are now the most determined foes of slaveholding treason.

The Tribune need not go far to find the character it "defies" any one to discover. Certainly the Tribune would not desire to be regarded as "a partizan of slavery," yet that it has been one of the strongest partizans of the rebellion in all that it seeks and maintains—to wit, a separation of the Confederacy, and the right of the seceding States to withdraw from the Union and set up an independent Government—is clearly established by the following extracts from its own columns:—

(From the Tribune of November 9, 1860.)

"If the Cotton States shall become satisfied that they can do better out of the Union than in it, we insist on letting them go in peace. The right to secede may be a revolutionary one, but it exists, nevertheless. * * * We must ever resist the right of any State to remain in the Union and nullify or defy the laws thereof. To withdraw from the Union is quite another matter, and whenever a considerable section of our Union shall deliberately resolve to go out, we shall resist all coercive measures designed to keep it in. We hope never to live in a Republic whereof one section is pined to another by bayonets."

(From the Tribune of November 20, 1860.)

"If the Cotton States, untidely and earnestly, wish to withdraw peacefully from the Union, we think they should and would be allowed to do so. Any attempt to compel them by force to remain would be contrary to the principles enunciated in the immortal Declaration of Independence, contrary to the fundamental ideas on which human liberty is based."

(From the Tribune of December 17, 1860.)

"If it (the Declaration of Independence) justified the secession from the British Empire of 3,000,000 of colonists in 1776, we do not see why it should not justify the Secession of 5,000,000 of Southerners from the Union in 1861."

(From the Tribune of February 23, 1861.)

"We have repeatedly said, and we once more insist, that the great principle embodied by Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence, that governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed, is sound and just; and that, if the Slave States and Cotton States, or the Gulf States only, choose to form an independent nation, they have a clear moral right to do so. * * * Whenever it shall be clear that the great body of the Southern people have become conclusively alienated from the Union, and anxious to escape from it, we will do our best to forward their views."

But not only is the Tribune in its dull prose a partizan of the rebellious States in their struggle for the "clear moral right to secede," as a poet, it brings its genius and its eloquence to the aid of the traitors' cause, and thus applauds in stirring song the acts of those who "tear down" and "destroy" what the Tribune poetically designates "Hate's polluted rag," but which, in sober prose, is known as the National Ensign:—

"Tear down the flaunting Lie!
Half-mast the starry flag!
Insult no sunny sky
With hate's polluted rag!
Destroy it, ye who can!
Deep sink it in the waves!
It bears a fellow-man
To groan with fellow-slaves."

It is unnecessary to enter upon an arithmetical calculation to test the assertion that "ninety-nine out of every hundred branded Abolitionists" have always been true to the Union, which, for a quarter of a century, they have denounced as "a covenant with sin and a league with hell," but certainly if the Tribune's figures are correct, it is itself the "one in a hundred" that forms the exception to the rule.

THE NIGGER AGAIN.—The Indiana State Sentinel says:—"The 7th Indiana Regiment marched from Fredericksburg to Port Republic in a destitute condition, a large number without shoes, and their route could have been traced by the blood which marked their footsteps. On Saturday night last 400 wounded men from the battle-field of Port Republic arrived in Washington in box cars, and it was late the next day before they were removed to quarters where they could receive the much-needed surgical attention, and be relieved from their sufferings. At the same time the Government were supporting in comfortable quarters some 1100 lazy runaway negroes. That shows the sympathy of the powers that be. The gallant men who had been wounded while bravely fighting the battles of the Constitution and the Union must have found great consolation in this contrast in the paternal care of the governmental authorities. Buncombe resolutions of stay-at-home patriots will not avail much with the wounded and neglected soldier."

The Richmond Whig says:—

"General Gregg's brigade is composed of the following regiments, which average over 1,000 men each:—1st S. C. Volunteers, Colonel D. H. Hamilton; 12th S. C. Volunteers, Colonel O. E. Edwards; 13th S. C. Volunteers, Lieutenant-Colonel D. Barnes; 14th S. C. Volunteers, Colonel S. McGowan; Rifle Regiment S. C. Volunteers, Colonel J. Foster Marshall. To this brigade two batteries are attached—Colonel Marmaduke Johnson's Richmond Battery, and Captain Crenshaw's Richmond Battery."

Corruption in the Federal army is not confined to such high personages as General Fremont. The Chicago Tribune of a recent date notes the arrest of a Lieutenant Patrick Higgins, of the Irish Brigade, for conspiring with Confederate prisoners to release them from Camp Douglas for a consideration. For a certain sum, to be paid in advance by each prisoner who desired to regain his liberty, he would assist them to pass the guard and escape. One man, it is said, agreed to pay him $150; others, smaller sums—the price of liberty having no fixed rate. Colonel Mulligan discovered the treachery of the speculating Higgins through one of the prisoners, and he was arrested.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY ROTZ, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 25s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 7, 1862.

The Extension of the War.

THE last telegrams from New York tell us of deep despondency, and that a feeling of uneasiness pervades all classes of the community. Irrespective of the impending financial collapse, the aspect of the war is sufficient to account for such wide-spread and gloomy despair. Those who looked for the conquest of the South, as well as those who thought the restoration of the Union possible, can no longer blind themselves to the fact that their expectations will not be realized. The Confederate camp has become co-extensive with the Confederate States. The North has not merely to fight gallant armies, commanded by generals who have manifested military genius of the highest order, but it has to contend against an actively hostile population. We are told by the North that Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana, and, indeed, the whole of the Southern States, swarm with guerilla bands. At Louisville a conspiracy has been discovered, in which the principal inhabitants were concerned, to hand over the city to the Confederates. The Governor of Missouri has found it necessary to order the organization of the whole militia of the State to defend the Federal power against Confederate aggression. In Maryland, the spirit of Secession has been rapidly developed, and at Baltimore a majority of the Municipality, after twice rejecting the proposal to vote bounty-money for volunteers, have resigned.

It has been said that the Federal authority in the South does not extend beyond the range of Federal guns; but this statement gives a flattering view of the Federal position, for even in those places where the invader has obtained a footing—even in New Orleans, for months under the cruel and despotic tyranny of General Butler—there is no submission to Federal authority; and from day to day, at every opportunity, the men, women, and children evince their contempt and enmity for those whom the fortune of war has for the time made their rulers.

Not only is the uprising in the South universal, but the movements of the Confederates are so skillfully directed that what the North is pleased to call guerilla bands are being, at available points, massed into armies for the purpose of operating against the Federal armies of occupation. We are informed via New York that General Morgan has retreated from Kentucky through Cumberland Gap—which, by the way, must be held by the Confederates, and not by the Federals, as reported by the North—into Tennessee; and when we consider that Nashville is threatened, and that Tennessee swarms with Confederate troops, that the army lately commanded by General Halleck must be out-numbered and surrounded, unless a retreat to the bank of the Mississippi is still open to it—the North has little cause to rejoice at the advent of General Morgan's army in Tennessee. That the Washington Government is aware of the desperate condition of its forces in the West, is evident from the order issued to General Lane, in Kansas, to raise an army irrespective of colour. We shall probably shortly hear of decisive movements in Tennessee; and since the North has no means at its disposal for checking the progress of Secession in Missouri and Kentucky, the Federal tenure in those States is in considerable jeopardy.

Vicksburg, so often reported as captured, is not only uncaptured, but the attempt to reduce it seems for the present to have been abandoned. Commander Porter's fleet is in the Hampton Roads, and Commodore Farragut has taken his fleet to New Orleans. The Confederate ram Arkansas, and the subsidence of the waters of the Mississippi, have compelled Commodore Farragut to practise the strategy of retreat. It was supposed, and not unreasonably, that wherever the Federal gunboats could penetrate they would be victorious; but that they are not omnipotent or invincible is proved by the safety of Mobile, Charleston, and Vicksburg. And further, we may infer that should New Orleans again pass into the hands of the Confederates before the termination of the war, it could be successfully defended against the operations of Federal gunboats.

The news from Virginia, though exceedingly contradictory, shows the weakness and fears of the North. One day it is positively asserted that General "Stonewall" Jackson is at Gordonsville; next day, that he is marching on Harper's Ferry; a few hours afterwards, that he is concentrating his forces on the James River, between City Point and Richmond; and before this news is cold, indeed almost simultaneously, he is said to be in the Shenandoah Valley, preparing for an encounter with General Pope. Then, again, General Beauregard, who, a fortnight since, was reported to be sick at Richmond, and last week to be at Chattanooga, with 60,000 men, is now declared to be on the left bank of the James River, in command of an army 30,000 strong. The utter ignorance of the Federals with respect to Confederate movements is astounding; for we cannot suppose that the Washington Government, anxious to allay the alarming excitement of the people, would permit the circulation of these distracting and panic-creating reports, if it could give any true or tangible account of the Confederate position. With respect to General McClellan's army, we have to record an ominous official silence; but we gather, from rumours entitled to some credence, that it is not only hemmed in, not only paralyzed by its late defeat, but that it is daily weakened by excessive sickness, and that many thousands of the remnant of the once numerically splendid and costly equipped army of the Potomac are hors de combat by those fell enemies, fever and ague—enemies that cannot be held in check by entrenchments and the cover of gunboats. There are no more promises of an advance on Richmond, but at one time rumours of the preparation of an iron-clad ram, intended to replace the terrible Virginia; and at another, that the Confederates have multiplied the obstructions in the James River, so as to make the advance of the Federal gunboats a sheer impossibility. It is also known that the Confederates are throwing up earthworks and planting cannon on the banks of the James River, in the rear of General McClellan, and thus threatening to cut off his supplies. Verily the War Council being held at Washington has ample matter for grave and anxious deliberation. Verily, there is sufficient ground for the deep despondency and the feeling of uneasiness that pervades all classes.

In the midst of all this, Mr. Lincoln vainly calls for more men. Neither the offer of enormous bounties, of pay in advance, of service limited to nine months, nor the vigorous efforts of the classes who dread the conscription, can induce men to enlist. A conscription seems inevitable, but how ill-timed it will be, seeing that in many of the States it is deemed necessary to prepare for defence against the threatened incursions of the Confederates. And if armies can be raised, where are the generals to command them? The appointment of General Halleck—who has been so completely out-manœuvred by General Beauregard, and under whose auspices the army of the West has done nothing, literally nothing—as Commander-in-Chief inspires no confidence. General McDowell is looked upon as a failure; General Banks has shown his inefficiency;

General Pope, as yet, has done no more than write mendacious despatches and issue a mendacious proclamation; and General McClellan, the Young Napoleon, is given up by his friends, who now say he is not a man of action. Still, we do not deny the possibility of the North carrying on the war; but we think that the impossibility of subjugating the South must be palpable even to the Northerners.

The American Question in the House of Lords.

LORD CAMPBELL, on Monday evening last, presented to the Peers the strongest argument that has yet been urged in Parliament for the recognition of the Confederate States, as a means of bringing to a close the unfortunate war in America. He argued, and we think with irresistible logic, that, according to all modern experience, the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States by the United States, which is the only probable or possible termination of the war, cannot be expected to take place so long as neutral nations withhold that recognition. No Power, whether weak or strong, has ever been the first to acknowledge a de facto Government raised upon its own dethroned authority. Not Great Britain, which did not recognize the independence of her revolted American colonies until France, Spain, and Holland, her three great maritime rivals of that period, had done so. Not Spain, which refused recognition to the Netherlands a quarter of a century after all hope of reconquest had vanished, and to her former South American colonies after every other nation had treaties with them. Not Holland, which only recognized Belgium at the bidding of all the great Powers of Europe; nor Turkey, which had to be similarly forced into the recognition of Greece. Not Austria, which even yet refuses to recognize the Kingdom of Italy. Thus it is in fact, and thus it should be in theory; for neutral and disinterested nations must necessarily be the best judges of the fulfilment of the conditions on which recognition may justly be demanded, and they may also be presumed to be more ready to listen to the demands of justice than the Power which has the strongest interest in denying them. So long, then, as neutral nations withhold recognition, the Government whose authority is impugned is not only justified in urging its pretensions, but it may plead the tacit admission of its co-peers, both of the justice of those pretensions and of its ability to make them good. In other words, the non-recognition of a de facto Government by neutral Powers after a clear title to recognition is made out, is a virtual encouragement to its enemies to persevere in their efforts against it. This reasoning applies with peculiar force to the case of the American belligerents, for the people of the United States are as thoroughly convinced as we are that every motive of self-interest should incline European Governments to a friendly treatment of the "rebels." That instead of such friendly treatment, conditions of unprecedented severity have been exacted from the Confederate States they also understand, and explain, reasonably enough, upon the supposition that European Governments are deterred by fear, and by despair of the success of those they vain would help if they dared.

Lord Campbell's speech was in support of a motion for the correspondence between Her Majesty's Foreign Office and the Southern Commissioner in London; it being generally understood that Mr. Mason had made a formal demand for recognition on Her Majesty's Government, and that the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs had officially replied thereto. Earl Russell declined to produce these papers, but without condescending to give any intelligible reason for his refusal. It could not have been on account of the, as yet, unofficial character of the Southern negotiator, for Earl Russell had caused to be published among the Parliamentary papers of the earlier period of the session his correspondence with Messrs. Yancey, Rost, and Mann, who occupied precisely the same position as their successor, Mr. Mason; and had caused to be inserted among these papers a letter from Mr. Mason himself, on the subject of the blockade. Neither did Earl Russell condescend to reply to any of the points presented in Lord Campbell's speech; content, perhaps, with the prophetic reply he once before gave to the same interlocutor, and which time has not verified any more than if it had only been a prediction of Mr. Seward's, instead of one from the Foreign Minister of the British Empire. Earl Russell did not deny that the Confederate States, by a successful resistance of eighteen months, by the unanimity, skilled valour, and unflinching determination of their people, has established a claim to be treated as, at least, a de facto Government. He did not deny that nine-tenths of intelligent Englishmen—himself among the number, according to his own well-remembered statement in the same place—had arrived at the deliberate conviction that the reconquest of the South was no longer within the bounds of possibility, nor was desirable for the welfare of either party. He denied nothing, asserted nothing. If ever the hackneyed motto, "that words are designed to conceal thoughts," was successfully applied, it was by Earl Russell, on Monday night, in the House of Lords. Whether this is exactly the mode of treating a grave question on which the public mind is anxious, and on the immediate solution of which interests of the vastest magnitude depend, we leave to others to decide.

One admission, however, we obtain from the noble Earl's language, despite his studied reticence—and this is in reply to Lord Malmesbury's point-blank query—that the other Powers of Europe stand ready to follow the example of England whenever she chooses to set it. This is not frankly stated; but after a careful study of Earl Russell's evasive style, we can gather no other meaning from his words. It is difficult, indeed, to reconcile with the outgivings of the French semi-official press, and the more or less well-authenticated rumours which fill the public ear, his other declaration that he has received no communications from other Powers bearing on recognition of the South. We are tempted to suspect that the noble Earl does not think it beneath his dignity to play on words; that oral propositions are not by him considered communications; and that preliminary consultations about mediation are not to be spoken of from his place in the House of Lords, as having any bearing on recognition.

As the Foreign Secretary wraps himself in the mantle of mystery, the public is left to mere surmises in regard to his motives and intentions in American policy. Little penetration, however, is required to see that this policy is still to be procrastination—procrastination, though the golden opportunity for ending the war may again be lost, like so many others before, and though every day makes the American problem more complicated and more difficult of solution—procrastination, though an important branch of British industry is threatened with a vital danger, and though the interruption of the world's commerce daily costs Great Britain as much in treasure as it costs at least one of the parties to the war. As to the motives of this strange policy, in absence of the Minister, the leading member of the London press undertakes to expound them. It affects to consider this motive as a friendly one to the South.—The war, such is the substance of its reasoning—is now dying out for lack of fuel; any action on our part would again fan it into a flame. We have so often treated the effect of recognition upon Mr. Lincoln's recruiting powers, that we will not weary our readers with the repetition of arguments which have never been contravened. Suffice it now to say, that if the Times' views be correct, both North and South are singularly blind to their true interests. Mr. Seward has exhausted the weapons of diplomacy to prevent recognition. He has wheedled, and threatened, and bullied, and recanted unwearingly, all to this purpose. Even now, when he is thinking of conscription to raise more men, he sends quartermasters' charts to Lord Palmerston to show how many hundreds on hundreds of thousands he has already in the field on paper. The North's champions in Parliament (Mr. Forster and Mr. Taylor) quote the argument that recognition would facilitate recruiting in the North, and thus prolong the war, and it is, in fact, from them that the Times has borrowed it. The South, on the other hand, so little is it of the Times' opinion, or so little dread has it of the stimulated recruiting, is asking recognition, and only recognition; to which it conceives itself justly entitled by international usage. Through its representative in England, it is stated in Parliament, it has just made, for the first time, a formal demand to that effect. We may fairly assume Mr. Mason to be the best judge of what would benefit his country, and most quickly end the war; and similarly, that Mr. Seward understands what would most obstruct the objects of his Government, and cripple it for the prolongation of the contest. Both agree that this would be the recognition of the Confederate States by the Powers of Europe.

The Last Card of the North.

WE hear, by the last mail, of a demand for Emancipation at the North. There is nothing in the news that should surprise or startle us. Every one has known from the first that the Federalists held this card in their hand, and would play it at last, if the game were not previously interrupted. But it was clear, at the same time, that this was the last card they would play, and that it would not be forthcoming until without it the game was obviously and irretrievably lost. In the first place, it is illegal; and Mr. Lincoln has hitherto endeavoured to preserve at least the shadow of legality. Congress has no more right to interfere with the institutions of Maryland or Kentucky than with those of Canada or Mexico; it has no more legal authority in the internal affairs of the States than has the British Parliament. By law, any ordinance emancipating the slaves of the South is utterly null and void, and would be set aside at once, as unconstitutional, by the Supreme Court. But even those in the North who care least for law might well hesitate in face of the possible practical consequences of such an act. Under existing circumstances, Emancipation has no other meaning than the excitement of servile revolt; and any civilized nation may well pause before it decides to incur the frightful guilt of such a measure. Were the present demand acceded to, and were the results such as are generally expected by all unacquainted with the realities of Southern life, the Northern people would be answerable for horrors which would disgust even the ferocity excited by a year of disaster and disgrace, and would leave a load of infamy on their national reputation which even to them would be intolerable. Therefore we are sure that Emancipation is the last card of the Federal Government, and when that card is played, we know that they consider the game as lost.

What would be the meaning and result of an Emancipation Act passed by the Northern Congress, and what is the intention of those who ask for it? What some of them intend is clear enough. Mr. Garrison, Mr. Wendell Phillips, and their followers really desire to abolish slavery. That is their one idea; Abolition is their policy, their moral code, their religion; and in pursuing that end they think nothing of means, and nothing of consequences. Obligations, political and moral, the laws of their country, and the common principles of humanity, are of no account in their eyes. They were prepared, years ago, to break up the Union rather than tolerate slavery; they are now waging war for the Union, in the hope that the war may root out slavery. The Abolitionists are consistent, if not reasonable. But no Emancipation Act will effect their purpose. Congress can no more emancipate the slaves of the Confederate States by passing laws to that effect, than Mr. Lincoln can put down the rebellion by proclamation. The measure just passed condemns all rebels to death and forfeiture; but Mr. Lincoln must catch his rebels before he can have the satisfaction of hanging them. Another measure may declare slavery abolished, but before the slaves can be freed under such a law, the lawgivers must have conquered the South. The Abolitionists are pursuing a policy which can plead very ancient precedents in favour. They are not the first hunters who have sold the bear's skin before they caught him. But they are, perhaps, the first who ever imagined that selling the skin would help them to catch the bear.

But the Abolitionist proper is even yet a rare animal in America. The Northern people in general—nay, even the bulk of the Republican Party—have no rooted aversion to slavery, and no interest in the fate of the subject race. The Republicans railed against it while they were in opposition, and the slave-owners were in power; but when they attained office, they were willing to sacrifice the slaves for ever, if they might be allowed to retain the full advantages of their new position. They dislike slavery in the Territories, because they wanted the future vote of the Territories when they became States. The Northern people generally disliked it, because they dreaded the competition of slave-labour. They did not wish to attack slavery in the Southern States with any zeal for the benefit of the slaves; they did not desire to flood the country with free blacks. In the first place, for political reasons, they dread, and do their best to prevent, the immigration of coloured freemen into the Free States. Everywhere in the North those unhappy creatures are maltreated, degraded, insulted; from many States they are actually excluded by penal laws. They are found a nuisance—there is no disguising the fact. And, with the example of their Mexican and other neighbours before their eyes, the Americans regard with fear and abhorrence the very notion of that which can alone render the position of the free negro satisfactory—the amalgamation of the superior and inferior races. Wholesale Emancipation, involving this consequence, they would regard with unmixed horror if they thought it likely to affect themselves—that is, if they still hoped to restore the Union. Further, there is at the North a feeling of physical aversion to the black race. The Yankee may cordially hate the Southern planter, but his hatred has been so far kept under control that the two races have long lived under one Government and may hereafter live peaceably side by side; it is political and national enmity, not personal aversion. But towards the negro the white man of the North entertains a feeling of personal repugnance, of the strength of which Englishmen have no idea; in a word, he loathes the race. The imagination that the Northern people are fighting on behalf of the negro, could never have entered the mind of any man who understands America. Those who propose Emancipation—the Abolitionist sect apart—have no desire to liberate the negroes and receive them as fellow-citizens. They would repudiate the idea of Abolition as soon as they saw any hope of restoring the Union; as they would cease to burn the property, close the ports, and destroy the industry of the South, if they could recover the Southern trade. They do not intend Emancipation with reunion. They are not proposing a scheme of legislative action for the benefit of the black race. They are not proposing a new object for the war; they do not mean to spend millions of Northern money, and tens of thousands of Northern lives, in order to emancipate the negro. With them, Emancipation is simply an expedient of hostility; a measure supposed to be likely to assist their military operations. It is a question not of justice, not of humanity, not of policy, but simply of war. The negro is regarded not as a friend, not as a protégé, but as a weapon. And the important practical consideration is not the legislative results, but the military effect and political influence of the proposed measure. Will it, or will it not, produce servile insurrection? Will it, or will it not, bring valuable assistance to the Northern armies? We propose to offer a few suggestions on these points.

It is asserted that the proclamation of liberty to the slaves will "diminish the rebel army by calling many rebel officers and men to the defence of their homes." This phrase clearly contemplates an attempt to create a general servile insurrection—that is, to deliver over the women and children of hundreds of thousands of families, English by speech and descent, to all, and more than all, the horrors endured in a town taken by storm. Happily for humanity, for the South, for the Northern people—happily, above all, for the slaves themselves—nothing of the kind will take place. Throughout the Atlantic States, where the owners reside and manage their property themselves, they might safely arm their slaves to resist the invader; they might, and do, safely leave their families to the care and fidelity of the negroes. It were as easy—different as the relations are—to raise the English peasantry against their landlords, or the Highland clans of 1745 against their chieftains, as to excite these negroes to revolt against their masters. The capture of New Orleans and Beaufort, of Hatteras, Norfolk, and Newbern, has produced no servile insurrection. General Hunter's incendiary proclamation has been without effect, and the negroes can hardly be supposed capable of distinguishing between an Act of Congress and the order of a Federal general—both of which, by the way, have equal legal value in such a matter. In Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, the slaves will never rise, except with their masters and against the Yankees. In some part of the region watered by the Mississippi the case may be different. There absenteeism has worked much mischief, created much wretchedness, evoked much discontent, as in Ireland before 1848; there, in too many cases, the master does not live among his dependents, but delegates the management of his estate entirely to an overseer; there planting is too often a mere speculation, entrusted to overseers chosen simply by their reputation for getting so many bales per hand, and somewhat indifferent to the consequences of their high-pressure system to the slaves under their charge. In such a quarter it is not improbable that here and there the slaves on some peculiarly unfortunate plantation may mutiny, and be joined by some of their neighbours; that there may be, in fact, a series of small servile outbreaks. All white women and children within reach will be the victims of such outrages as always distinguish the uprisings of a subject race, and especially of a race naturally licentious, of weak intellect, and strong animal impulses. There will be murder, torture, incendiarism, and worse horrors—horrors which will scandalize Europe, disgust all the sober people at the North, and inflame the South to vindictive fury. The perpetrators will take refuge within the Federal lines. They will be useful enough, under compulsion, in that kind of warfare in which the Northern armies especially shine, for they know how to handle a spade; but if led into the field against their masters they will prove worse than useless. The Sepoys were of a race far superior to the negro; they had fought gallantly when led by English officers against Sikhs or Goorkhas; but when they rebelled against English rule, and had to confront English troops in the field, it was found that not merely discipline, but courage had deserted them. Their awe of the master-race had not been extinguished in the blood of white women and children; it filled them with dismay when they found themselves in presence of their former masters, and they were conquered as much by their sense of inferiority as by the courage and discipline of the small army that encountered them. The negro may be induced to imitate, and even to outdo, the crimes of the Sepoys; he may be roused to murder, outrage, and rapine; but he will never stand in the line of battle before the race which he has been accustomed to fear and to obey. A regiment of Virginian cavalry would disperse a negro army as easily as a troop of the Guards scatters an English mob. Congress may, then, proclaim Emancipation; it may thereby cause the conflagration of an unguarded village, the murder of a few families, the destruction of crops and plantations; it may revive in Mississippi the crimes and provoke the punishment of Delhi and Cawnpore; but its acts cannot affect, except in the interest of the South, the progress of the war.

One effect of the Emancipation movement ought not to be overlooked. It will divide the people of the Free States among themselves; for half at least of those who are not against the war are bitterly hostile to Abolition; the men who set most store by the Union are most furious against the sect whose restless machinations have brought about its disruption. It will unite the people of Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland, where even those who are hostile to Secession would never tolerate or forgive a reckless violation of their State rights, and a high-handed interference with their domestic institutions; and it will exasperate the wrath and confirm the resolution of the South, already sufficiently embittered by the infamous atrocities of men like Mitchell, Johnson, and Butler. The torches that fire the homes of citizens light up in the most lukewarm breasts the flame of patriotism; outrages on women are never left unavenged by men of Anglo-Saxon blood. Dividing the exhausted North, alienating the last remnant of Unionism in the middle States, rousing the South to redoubled exertion, the proposed Act of Emancipation would sound the death-knell of the Federal cause.

British Protection.

FORTY shipowners of Liverpool allege that "the Federal cruisers are now blockading the British port of Nassau," and "seizing vessels sailing from one British port to another with British goods, though such vessels are perfectly innocent of any attempt to run the blockade." And further, "that the confidence of mercantile men in the sanctity of the British flag is thoroughly shaken," and they demand "that steps may be taken by the Government to protect British shipping," etc., etc. In answer to which the nobleman to whom England entrusts the care of her subjects and her property abroad answers, that he is informed "by Mr. Seward and Mr. Adams that ships are sent from this country with a fixed purpose to run the blockade," and "arms and provisions have been thus conveyed to the Southern States to enable them to carry on the war." "He is not surprised the cruisers should watch with vigilance a port said to be the great entrepôt of this commerce, and does not doubt the equity and adherence to legal requirement of the United States' Prize Courts, though the loss is far from compensated, even by a favourable decision, and suggests that the true remedy is that they abstain from this species of trade." In the name of common sense, remedy for what? For a blockade of British ports, and seizure of vessels perfectly innocent of such trade, as alleged by the memorialists. Is this the end of the innestasy in the world, the most fearless and scientific officers, and the whole fabric of our magnificent naval superiority? We have in London a perfectly organized body of police, and Lord Russell's reply to a memorial stating that perfectly innocent people were dragged by the police before a tribunal, and their property confiscated, would run thus—"There are certain malefactors whom the police have a right to take up; all you have to do is not to commit their crimes." Most happily, here in England not only does a jury heavily punish such misconduct on the part of the police, and all who set them in motion, if they make a mistake, but we punish, even to the highest servant of the Crown, all who would aid and abet them. But this case goes even further; for, as far as Lord Russell is concerned, the only offence he has to recognize is breaking the Queen's Proclamation. The Liverpool shipowners did not ask him to protect them against the consequences of that, but against violent and illegal interruption of innocent trade from one British port to another. And yet Lord Russell declines to interfere, except to allow the police of our own waters to be kept by the cruisers of the very people who, he acknowledges, have arms and ammunition sent to them equally in contravention of that neutrality which it has proclaimed, and are, therefore, participes criminis. And he proposes to the people of England to believe that "all that the Government can fairly do is to urge the Federal Government to enjoin upon their naval officers greater caution in the exercise of their belligerent rights." It surely was bad enough to have the trade with 3800 miles of coast blockaded by fifty extempore vessels of war, who succeeded in taking a per centage of the vessels that ran in. But it seems now that the whole force is to be concentrated on what Lord Russell is told is the great entrepôt of the commerce. Has the blockade, then, been extended to British ports as well? It has, and Lord Russell knows it, and his excuse for his inaction is, that he begs Commodore Wilkes and his brother officers to use greater caution. How far their caution may lead them we know from the celebrated letter that gentleman wrote in answer to the promotion in rank, the letter of thanks from his Government, and the public ovation he got for one of the most ludicrous acts of piracy that the naval history of nations records—an act without one single extenuating circumstance, unsupported by one single argument, either in America or in Europe, and which inevitably resulted in the shame and disgrace of his humiliated country. An honest man is ashamed of a bad action, but even a dishonest one is cowed at not only being found out and punished, but still more at having to give up that for stealing which he lost his good name. These are the sort of men to whose greater caution Lord Russell is content to leave the great interests of British commerce. For our own part, we thought the Federals would have enough to do to guard against vessels running goods from Nassau to the Confederate coasts; but it seems they are now authorized by Lord Russell, always saving the greater caution, to guard against innocent trade being carried from England into her own or foreign ports. We wonder why they do not simply blockade Liverpool? It would save them a great deal of trouble. One of these same naval officers in seizing a vessel, at once and without looking over the cargo or papers, pronounced the vessel to be contraband solely because she sailed from Liverpool, though, unfortunately for him, the United States' Prize Court was not of the same opinion. But, seriously speaking, this is another great cause of congratulation for the Confederate States. For, in sober earnestness, not the justice or holiness of their cause; not the vigor and skill of their arms; not their noble defence of their country and laws, invaded and trampled upon by hordes of German and Irish ruffians; not the masterly generalship and skill of Johnson, Lee, and Beauregard (not strategy, we hope); nor the solemn and statesmanlike governorship of the President and his Council, have shown the people of England the true state of affairs in this wretched war, and won their honest sympathies one half so much as the mendacious arrogance of official telegrams, the utter worthlessness of official boasts and prophesies. And, still more, the inhuman and brutal wickednesses of the Federal troops have made every honest heart burn with indignation against them and their cause. Such men as Blenker, Butler, and Mitchell, such statesmen as Fremont, and Seward, and Cameron, have been the true friends of the South, and in this sense Lord Russell's answer will, to every lawyer, to every statesman in Europe, as well as to British merchants and to British sailors, give a further reason for sympathy with the South and their glorious independence.

THE subjoined extract is taken from a letter of the Times' correspondent at New York:—

The public has been greatly scandalized during the last week by the series of charges brought against General Mitchell, the astronomer of Cincinnati—charges of incapacity, ferocity, and brutality—involving details that are said to be utterly unfit for publication. Further investigation has shown that the worst of these charges did not apply to General Mitchell personally, but to an officer under his command, for whose conduct he was more or less responsible. The charges will, doubtless, form a subject for the investigation of a court-martial, and if substantiated cannot but end in the dismissal of General Mitchell from the service, and the hanging, on a high gallows, of Colonel Turchin, the officer principally implicated. Leaving for the present the minor charges against General Mitchell, and coming to those affecting Colonel Turchin, a German, from Cincinnati, it appears that when General Mitchell was in command at Huntsville, in Alabama, he ordered Turchin to proceed, with a considerable force, to the pleasant little town of Athens, twenty-five miles distant, and reduce it to obedience to Federal authority. Athens made an unavailing but obstinate resistance, which so exasperated Turchin, that just before the place was captured, he told his soldiers that "he would shut his eyes for two hours" after they took it. The town is situated in Northern Alabama, on high and healthy ground. Its coolness renders it an agreeable summer residence, and it contains the finest and most celebrated high school for young ladies in all the South. The charge is that while Turchin "shut his eyes," the town was plundered, and that the young ladies at the school, daughters of some of the principal people in Alabama were subjected to atrocities that the tongue may name, but that the pen may not write or the printing-press divulge, except by periphrasis and innuendo. It is further stated that General Mitchell was made aware of the facts and took no notice of them. The New York press passes the matter over with slight remark, but it is so publicly spoken of here in every society, and so openly canvassed by the press of Cincinnati and other cities nearer the scene, that it has become quite impossible for Mr. Lincoln, as Commander-in-Chief of the army, to imitate Turchin's example, and shut his eyes to the atrocities of his subordinates. General Mitchell himself must demand inquiry if he would stand well with the public either as a gentleman or a soldier; and, as for Turchin and his whole company, if the charge be true, they should be shot en masse—if such a death be not too soldierly for brutes like them, who deserve flagellation first and hanging afterwards, as the more befitting punishment.

We have no doubt that great cruelty and ferocity has been exhibited, but we unfeignedly say, God forbid that the worst allegations of the above should be confirmed! Until we have further evidence, it would be a shame to deem it possible. The pupils of the school referred to are daughters of the first people of the South, who are sent there, from fourteen to seventeen years of age, to finish their education. If they have been subjected to atrocities "that the pen may not write or the printing-press divulge, except by periphrasis and innuendo," then the most deadly and unrelenting vengeance will become the duty of the men of the South. But we trust that the savage barbarity of the invaders has not been so diabolically manifested.

The Cruise of the Sumter.

FROM NOTES TAKEN ON BOARD BY ONE OF HER OFFICERS.

A CRUISE IN THE WESTERN OCEAN.

THE weather, which now seemed to have settled down into a continued series of heavy squalls, attended by very ugly seas, culminated finally with a severe gale from the south-west. The ship was hove to, under a close-reefed main topsail and storm staysails, riding most beautifully the tremendous waves. It is an old maxim with sailors, that to cross the Western ocean in winter is no child's play, and in no part of the world can the fearful power of the elements be witnessed to such advantage as in a voyage across the Atlantic at that season of the year. I have often thought it a merciful dispensation of the providence of God that the waves are long and regular, for were they the short chop seas of the Pacific, few ships could live through those terrible storms. Every time the Sumter would settle in the trough of the sea, her destruction seemed almost inevitable from the mountain waves curling far above her; but she rose most buoyantly, and though leaking badly, the utmost confidence was reposed in her sea-going qualities by all on board.

At about two p.m. a crash forward, like the report of a sixty-eight, started us all out of our slumbers, and on going to the scene of this explosion it was found that a sea had boarded us, staving in the bow port and casting adrift the bow gun; while those whose hammocks were near the scene of the disaster struck out for dear life, wondering at this rude interruption of their watch below. The cause of this accident was the negligence of the man at the wheel in not easing the ship into the sea. The strong fighting bolts wrenched from the beams in which they were imbedded, with the broken and twisted knees at the sides of the port, attested the fearful power of the water under such circumstances, and rendered very probable the stories which one hears of a ship's decks being swept fore and aft in a storm. The damage was repaired temporarily, after two or three hours' hard exertion; and with the substitution of a careful hand at the wheel, the Sumter was all right again. The gale abated towards the evening of the 12th, so as to enable us to carry the foresail, and finally subsided into a fine strong breeze from the south-west, wafting us rapidly on at the rate of nine or ten knots per hour.

The prisoners on board now numbered nearly as many as our own crew, and it was necessary to guard them very carefully, only liberating a few at a time from confinement below. They were most troublesome customers, and one pastime very fashionable among them was for each one to appropriate his neighbour's property, without leave or license, and then to charge the theft to the sailors or to the marines on guard. These accusations generally led to a general search and overhauling of luggage, which ended in the defrauded property-owner finding the missing article on the person of one of his companions, or in eliciting a confession of his never having possessed any such item of property.

Nothing worth mentioning occurred to vary the regular routine of sea-life in a man-of-war for many days. Sometimes a sail would be discovered far off on the horizon, but as Yankees were very scarce it was considered a waste of time to give chase, and we let them go by unmolested.

Advantage was taken of the fine weather to perfect the men in the use of arms of every description, and this was done until they had attained a high degree of efficiency.

AT CADIZ.

Sunday, 22nd.—After a long chase we succeeded in overhauling an English bark, on her way to the West Indies, from Aberdeen. When we first came up, the United States' colours were flying at our peak, which frightened the Englishman terribly, he expecting nothing else but capture, as a war was then imminent between Great Britain and the Northern States. We despatched a boat on board, obtained the latest papers, and sent him on his way rejoicing. We here first heard of the death of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort, and all knew that a great and good man had passed away from earth. The name of Prince Albert will ever retain a bright place in the memory of man; his munificent gifts for the benefit of the poor, his earnest promotion of the cause of education and morality, and the manly probity and honour manifested throughout his whole career, are monuments which stand for ever.

None supposed that Messrs. Mason and Slidell would be released by the United States, after the fêtes and letters of thanks which had been given to Captain Wilkes; and when we read the accounts of the preparations which the English were making, a war between the two countries was looked upon as certain; but it seems we were deceived, for the prisoners were given up; while the meek and eloquent Sumner proclaimed to the world, from his seat in the Senate, one more great moral victory for the American Republic.

Sails were becoming very plentiful now; on several occasions as many as twenty or thirty were sighted in one day; but we found no Yankees, and wondered what had become of the many tall clippers that were wont to ply between New York, Boston, and the various ports of the Mediterranean. After many days of storms and calms we at last made Cadiz light on the evening of January 2, 1862, and by eight o'clock next morning were riding safely at anchor, abreast of this most beautiful city of South Spain. The health officer came alongside, and after a most suspicious examination of about an hour, declared us to be in quarantine for the space of three days. Of all vexations and disappointments allotted to ordinary mortals, a tedious, useless quarantine, after a long cruise at sea, seems to me to be the most harassing. Cadiz lay before us in all its tempting attractions, yet the precincts of the fair town were tabooed to us, so we were forced to devour our salt fare, and to content ourselves with grumbling at the stupidity of the Spaniards. Mr. Carl Schury, the United States' Minister, as soon as our arrival was reported, hastened to inform the Spanish Government of our character, and to denounce us as a rebel and pirate, threatening the extreme displeasure of the Federal Government, in case the authorities should allow us to remain in the harbour of Cadiz. The consequence of his communications was an order for the Sumter to leave in twenty-four hours, but being unfit to put to sea, and, moreover, very jealous of our rights as a belligerent, we flatly refused the demand. A Government boat dropped anchor a short distance from us, and established a strict surveillance on our movements, and when a large steam-frigate also took a position just outside of the Sumter, a collision was not by any means deemed improbable. We were, however, deceived, for they intended nothing of the kind. The next morning the frigate had disappeared, and a communication was received requesting us to delay our departure, while some functionary should consult the benevolent feelings of Her Most Catholic Majesty. We were released from quarantine, and allowed to avail ourselves of every facility of the port.

I had visited Cadiz a year ago, then wearing the uniform of a United States' officer, and had any prophet foretold that I should, in twelve months, again see the city, in my present circumstances, I should have deemed him mad; those formerly considered brothers were now deadly and implacable foes, and the flag that I once revered was now an emblem of the vilest despotism. All Southern men once loved that flag, not for the piece of bunting, but on account of the principles which it represented; so when the Constitution was desecrated, and our rights invaded, the stars seemed to fade from its once glorious blazentry, leaving only the stripes as fitting emblems of the degradation of the South.

All our prisoners were landed, and most of them seemed very much pleased at their departure from the pirate, though some of the "darkies" were much disposed to turn corsair, and offered to stop, but were refused. We enjoyed with great zest the various gaieties of fair Cadiz; the opera, the lounge in the hotels, and the promenade on the beautiful Alameda, are amusements peculiarly attractive to men that have been tossed for weeks on the stormy billows of the Atlantic.

BURNING THE NEAPOLITAN.

We remained at anchor in the harbour of Cadiz a few days longer, and on the 11th inst. steamed up the bay to Caraccas, in order to avail ourselves of the docks which are established at that place. The harbour was crowded with shipping, and as we threaded our way through their mazes a great many American vessels were seen laid up in ordinary and partially dismantled, which told plainly that people were not at present quite so willing to trust their property in a Yankee bottom as they were before the war. The country on all sides was thickly populated, and under a high state of cultivation. I have seldom been favoured with more beautiful views than those presented by the town of San Fernando and the buildings of the Spanish Naval College.

Spain was formerly celebrated for the magnificence of her naval stations, and the fine docks of Caraccas attest her ancient superiority in this respect. They are four in number, and two of them would be creditable to any nation. The Sumter was moored to a buoy for the night, and on the morning of the 12th inst. was hauled into dock.

Some potent influence was again brought to bear on the Spaniards by Mr. Schury, and on the 14th inst. the Sumter was discharged when her repairs were only half completed, and towed down the bay again to her anchorage in the harbour of Cadiz. We were again ordered to leave, and immediately returned a second refusal; but on the 17th ult. the anchor was weighed, and the Sumter stood out of the harbour bound for Gibraltar.

We were prepared to return with interest any iron messengers which the Spaniards might feel disposed to send after us from their numerous batteries, but nothing of the kind occurred, and an official, all bedizened in gold lace, who shouted most vociferously while endeavouring to overtake us in one of the small Spanish boats, was our only pursuer. This gentleman held in his hand a public document, which, we afterwards understood, contained another consignment of philanthropic ebullitions from the heart of Her Most Catholic Majesty; but the Sumter stood sullenly on, and no heed was taken either of the document or of its possessor. Steaming slowly along all night, we entered the Straits at about four a.m., and at seven were opposite the Rock of Gibraltar.

We gave chase to a fine rakish-looking bark that was endeavouring to work her way through the straits, and on overhauling her she was found to be the Neapolitan, from some port of Spain, for Boston, with a cargo of fifty tons of sulphur. The master was full of guesses and calculations as to the character of the stranger, and finally, asked directly the sleepy-looking officer who boarded him whether it was the Sumter or not; but the said official either felt disinclined to answer him, or was too much under the influence of the drowsy god to do so, and merely said that it was an American vessel, whereupon the worthy skipper launched out into all manner of rabid denunciations of the rebels and their cause. Upon his arrival on board the Sumter, he was what the sailors call completely taken a-back, and declared that his cargo was English property. The English Government having forbidden the exportation to America of any ingredients for gunpowder, and the captain, moreover, being unable to produce any papers in confirmation of his statement, it was concluded to burn his vessel, and a prize crew was sent aboard of her to strip the ship preparatory to applying the torch, while the Sumter went in pursuit of, and brought to, the bark Investigator, also bound for Boston. This latter vessel had an English cargo on board; and after transferring the crew of the Neapolitan to her, we ransomed the Investigator and let her go.

There were two females on board, one of whom was the captain's wife, the other being either a passenger, or officiating in the capacity of stewardess; she was evidently from Green Erin, and was far more emphatic than complimentary, several times stigmatizing us in our presence with being "oult pirates."

A strong breeze sprung up towards evening from the westward, and caused us to hasten our preparations for firing the bark. She burnt very rapidly when set on fire, and when a short distance from her we observed a solid column of fire shoot up from the main-hold, and the once beautiful Neapolitan was reduced to a shapeless burning mass upon the water. The captain of the Neapolitan afterwards represented that we had violated the neutrality of Spain by capturing him when within two miles of the land; but as he said that he was six miles from one shore and two from the other, while the Straits, at this point, are known to be thirteen miles across, his statement is not correct, nor is it at all complimentary to his knowledge of one of the fundamental rules of arithmetic.

We anchored in Gibraltar Bay at eight p.m. the next morning. Official visits were exchanged, and every possible facility afforded us for repairing and provisioning the ship.

Reviews.

SOUTHERN STATISTICS.

IV.—CRIME AND PAUPERISM.

THE world no longer believes the Northern reports of Southern enervation and dependence. On many a bloody field the people of the Confederate States have shown that they are the worthy descendants of a superior and conquering race, and it is now well known that the prosperity of the North was due to the energetic production of wealth in the South; and we venture to hope that, ere long, the good sense and justice of Europe will repudiate the scandalous imputations cast upon the social condition of the Southerners by their Northern detractors. In our last paper we gave some statistics that proved, in respect to religion, the South was as much, even more, advanced than the North. We shall, on the present occasion, refute the accusation of the prevalence of crime, and this, by abstracting two returns from the compendium of the census of 1850.

The following table gives the total number of criminals convicted in the year 1850, and the number of prisoners on June 1st of that year. We need scarcely remark that such a return, depending solely on official documents, is strictly accurate:—

Whole number of Convictions within the Year:—

Alabama	122	California	1
Arkansas	25	Columbia	132
Florida	39	Connecticut	850
Georgia	80	Delaware	22
Kentucky	160	Illinois	316
Louisiana	297	Indiana	175
Maryland	207	Iowa	3
Mississippi	51	Maine	744
Missouri	908	Massachusetts	7,250
North Carolina	647	Michigan	659
South Carolina	46	New Hampshire	90
Tennessee	81	New Jersey	603
Texas	19	New York	10,279
Virginia	107	Ohio	843
		Pennsylvania	857
		Rhode Island	596
		Vermont	79
		Wisconsin	267
	2,789		23,966

To make the above return available for comparison, it is necessary we should allow for the respective population of the united sections in 1850. We give the aggregate population of the respective States, including, of course, the slaves, who, we should observe, are included in the above criminal returns:—

Aggregate Population in 1850.

Alabama	771,623	California	92,597
Arkansas	209,897	Columbia	51,687
Florida	87,445	Connecticut	370,792
Georgia	906,185	Delaware	91,532
Kentucky	982,405	Illinois	851,470
Louisiana	517,762	Indiana	988,416
Maryland	583,034	Iowa	192,214
Mississippi	606,326	Maine	583,169
Missouri	682,044	Massachusetts	994,514
N. Carolina	869,039	Michigan	397,654
S. Carolina	668,507	New Hampshire	317,976
Tennessee	1,002,717	New Jersey	489,555
Texas	212,592	New York	3,097,394
Virginia	1,421,661	Ohio	1,980,329
		Pennsylvania	2,311,786
		Rhode Island	147,545
		Vermont	314,120
		Wisconsin	305,391
	9,521,237		13,568,141

With a population of 9,500,000, the number of criminals in the South was 2789, and therefore, with a population of 13,500,000, the number of criminals in the North should have been rather less than 4000; but the number of criminal convictions in the North was 23,767, being 19,000 above the average, or nearly six times as numerous, even allowing for the difference in population. Admitting that to a limited extent the petty offences of the slaves are punished by their masters, this is a startling result to those who have believed the infamous slanders of the maligners of the South. How much more would the South be justified in pointing a finger of scorn at the North! Yet, that the social condition of the North should be worse than the South was to be expected. In the former there was an incongruous assemblage of races, a perpetual immigration of the most discontented and least orderly classes of Europe, an insane passion for getting money by sharp dealing, a demoralizing dependency indigenous to a class or nation which does not in itself create wealth, but gets rich solely by being the medium for the exchange of the wealth of others. On the other hand, in the South the dominant race is singularly united, the immigration is small, and being an agricultural community, there is a spirit of individual independence, and the dollar, though not despised, is not deified. Indeed, the South, though particularly energetic in acquiring wealth, has been all but culpably negligent in its distribution, or Northern profits would not have been so great. National morality or immorality is mainly the result of circumstances, favourable or unfavourable, and the United States has much to plead in excuse for her demoralized state as compared with the South, but no excuse can be found for the atrocious vilification of the South.

We have heard very much about the demoralizing influences of the Southern institutions. There is a return of which one item will satisfactorily dispose of this accusation. It comprises an elaborate table of the "State Prisons and Penitentiaries for 1850," giving the number of inmates in each prison and the ratio of inmates to 10,000 of the population. The item to which we direct especial attention is this:—

In every 10,000 Coloured Persons, excluding Slaves:—
Slaveholding States	938
Non-Slaveholding States	28,743

So that the influence of Southern institutions upon the coloured race is 2800 per cent. better than the influence of Northern institutions.

Poverty, much more than ignorance, is the parent of crime, though we do not mean by this to deny the blessing of mental culture. We must confess that in Europe, with the increase of schools there has not been a commensurate diminution in the number of criminals, and the principal effect on the criminal returns produced by the spread of education is to increase the number of criminals who "can read and write;" and we expect one reason that so small a percentage of our criminals are persons of "superior education" is, that such persons are not in such poverty as to be homeless and foodless. Thus, then, much and deeply as we value education, we would rather take the returns of pauperism than the returns of education as a test of the criminality of a nation. Do the returns of pauperism in the United States' census endorse the criminal returns? In answer to this question we will give the "whole number of paupers supported in whole or part within the year ending June 1, 1850:—

Alabama	363	California	No return
Arkansas	105	Connecticut	2,327
Florida	76	Delaware	697
Georgia	1,036	Illinois	797
Kentucky	1,126	Indiana	1,182
Louisiana	423	Iowa	135
Maryland	4,494	Maine	5,503
Mississippi	260	Massachusetts	15,777
Missouri	2,977	Michigan	1,190
N. Carolina	1,931	New Hampshire	3,600
S. Carolina	1,642	New Jersey	2,392
Tennessee	1,005	New York	59,855
Texas	7	Ohio	2,513
Virginia	5,118	Pennsylvania	11,551
		Rhode Island	2,560
		Vermont	3,654
		Wisconsin	668
	20,563		114,199

The cost of pauperism in the South in 1850 was $565,159, and in the North $2,389,647. Thus the pauperism coincides with the criminality. One cause of pauperism is the immigration of paupers; but we have to deal with results, not causes, and the results we have presented in this article show that in respect to crime and pauperism the vilified South occupies an immensely higher position than the calumniating North.

Why Pennsylvania should become one of the Confederate States of America. By a NATIVE OF PENNSYLVANIA. London: J. Wilson, 93, Great Russell-street.

THIS pamphlet displays a clear conception of the issue being tried between the North and South, and it is characterized by a thoroughly liberal and patriotic spirit. The author points out the difference in race between the Northerners and Southerners, and that it originated from the settlement and colonization of the respective sections. He also shows that Pennsylvania has less interest in the North than in the South, and that her politics have more affinity with the loyal Conservatism of the Confederate States than with the revolutionary policy of the United States. We do not dispute that Pennsylvania would derive great advantages from joining the Confederates, but the author of the pamphlet, does not convince us that the junction is feasible, or that it is a natural, and, therefore, would be a proper addition to the Southern Confederacy.

He appeals to the people of Pennsylvania to put an end to the war by refusing any further aid to the North, and certainly such an appeal ought not to be unheeded by a State which, in an especial manner, assumes to be the advocate of peace, and which can boast of superior intellectual standing as compared with other Federal States. But this influence Pennsylvania can exert without becoming a member of the Southern Confederacy, and for her own interest, and for the sake of humanity, she ought to come forward as the champion of peace. We should be glad to hear that this able pamphlet was extensively circulated amongst the author's countrymen, for though it might not persuade them to secede from the United States, it could not fail to forcibly remind them of their responsibility with respect to the present war, and that they can do much towards putting an end to the desolating conflict.

The American Struggle. An Appeal to the People of the North. By PHILo-AMERICUS. London: Effingham Wilson; Liverpool: Webb and Hart.

THE object of this pamphlet, which is extremely moderate in its tone, is to show the people of the North the utter hopelessness of the task in which they are engaged. Having pointed out that the reasons that might at first have excused the war are no longer tenable, because it is now proved, beyond a doubt, that Secession was the act of the people, and not merely of the politicians of the South; the author dilates on the evils that are likely to ensue if the contest is continued. Whilst we admire the benevolent sentiments of Philo-Americanus, we cannot endorse all his opinions, nor assent to his views with respect to the boundary question. We do not agree with him that the North, "in virtue of its superior resources and power," has a right to a single inch of Southern territory.

ENGLAND AND THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—It is very difficult to write with soberness and temper on the present aspect of British sympathy; for the proceedings of the Washington Cabinet, and the acts of their servants, form so strong a contrast, both to the apathy of the English Government and the unanimous feelings of the educated classes throughout Great Britain, that the mind is staggered at the inconsistency. For instance, when Lord Malmesbury, on Monday night, requested to know whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to state what concert might exist between England and foreign nations, in any jointaction to be taken during the long recess of Parliament, Her Majesty's Government, by the mouth of the Foreign Minister, replied that France was entirely in unison with us on the question, and that, in fact, they had asked no one else. Now, the first of these two propositions we know to be erroneous; for the French Ministers have over and over again published to the world that they have urged the English Cabinet to some action, and that they have been deterred from acting themselves by the refusal of England to consider it. And with regard to the second—how comes it that in a question where the plain law of nations, the undeniable interest of commerce, and the simple dictates of humanity, exactly and identically correspond with the feelings of the community, they have not taken the trouble to ascertain what would be the wishes of other nations, whose law, whose interests, and whose feelings would materially assist us in dealing with a question which, sooner or later, will have to be met, and at no very distant period? I leave it to the Times newspaper, which is the strenuous defender of Lord Palmerston's Government, to explain Mr. Layard's answer to the protest of the merchants against the blockade of British ports by the Federal cruisers. It carries its own refutation upon the face of it, and will most assuredly meet with a different interpretation at the hands of British merchants, British seamen, and, above all, the British Navy, from that put upon it by the Times leader. But the main fact lies behind all these pranks of little men dressed in a brief authority; and that is, the heartfelt thanks of Englishmen and Englishwomen, that the Confederate States, of their own action and with their own strong right hand, have hewn down the monstrous machine that was set in motion by the Empire-seekers of Washington: that they have quenched in the blood of the marauding Irish and German hordes the dreams of ambition that haunted the loafers of New York, and have vindicated in the face of day, and before the civilized world, that English blood dares to be free and can win freedom by their own unaided might. What the Butlers, Blenkers, and Mitchells have perpetrated we shall not know for months—perhaps, in full, never; but the trials of the South have won for her not only compassion for her sufferings and bitter indignation at her wrongs, but the warmest admiration and affection that her noble defence could call forth. Whether England recognizes them or not, the nation accepts them as brethren worthy of their race, and the welcome which greets their joining the family of nations will come warm from the heart of England. That heart, believe me, Sir, was never warmer than at this moment, though overlaid with every kind of cant and humbug. The lesson of the utter and complete failure of Democracy in America—the disgust at the attempt of certain money-mongers in England to foist on our honest countrymen an admiration of the institutions which have resulted in such exhibitions as Mr. Cameron's contracts, Mr. Seward's despatches, and such military strategies as Butler's, Hunter's, Fremont's, Halleck's, and Pope's information have presented to an amazed audience of the whole world—tell the tale in letters that he who runs may read. Those who once thought that a respectable and honest element existed in the thinking and educated men of the Northern States, which would at the proper time leave the surging mass of inconsiderate ruffians, now repent their error.

Those who still cling desperately to the hope that national bankruptcy will sober the bloody counsels of beaten mob-leaders will have to bewail their folly. The history of the world has never shown one instance of warfare by such men being retarded for want of funds in the national treasury. They have sown the dragon's teeth, and the crop will destroy them. They initiated a cruel and wicked war for an empire, and their own troops will eat them up—aye, to the last loaf. And then, when their commerce is destroyed, when all faith in the honour and honesty of public men has fled wailing from the nation, when their Treasury bonds lie repudiated in the hands of the silly dupes who trusted Mr. Chase, when the West bitterly reviles them for the useless slaughter of so many thousands of her hardy settlers, and, above all, when they see the Confederate States respected and honoured, rich and powerful, they may learn what the worship of the "almighty dollar" has led them to, and measure the consequences to nations as well as to individuals of reckless and unbridled arrogance at home, and insolence without bounds abroad.

AN ENGLISH SYMPATHIZER.

The Hunt of the Steam Ship Nashville.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT ON BOARD THE NASHVILLE.

IN the recent speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at Manchester, he very justly remarked, that in no instance in ancient or modern times had the civilized world suffered so much without interfering, as in the present struggle between the Northern and Southern States of America. What Mr. Gladstone really meant, the kind of suffering he indicated, or the inference to be adduced from his statement, it is not difficult to understand. There is one kind of mishap to the world, however, arising out of this struggle quite as much to be deplored as those of a merely physical nature. This the world will long have cause to remember and regret. Public opinion everywhere must long since have been shocked with the entire want of integrity and truthfulness exhibited by the press of the Northern States of America in anything relating to the war. Faults and errors of the Government have been glossed over, and unjustifiable acts on the part of the Government have been painted in bright and rosy colours. Defeats in the field have been magnified into victories, and non-existent circumstances have been paraded as history. The honesty of the press is a subject in which all true men take pride. The New York press, with a few honourable exceptions, have taken an inglorious lead in this infamous work of fabrication; and the annals of mendacity may be searched in vain for anything so mendacious as has appeared in the Herald. This journal has, on more than one occasion, manufactured victories for men who have been suffering all the humiliations of defeat, and imagination can picture some of the gallant and honest generals who have been placed in this very trying position. Other warriors have been put at the head of, and been described as manoeuvring, armies who were known to be unequal to drill a company, and deeds of valour have been related entirely fabricated by the editorial pen.

These remarks are called for in reference to the present subject; because all that has been accomplished by the Thomas L. Wrag, of Nassau, N. P. (late the Nashville), and her brave commanders since the period of the Southern Secession, has been either falsified or ignored by the Yankee journals. One instance in proof may suffice. After successfully entering Beaufort, under the command of Captain Peagrim, she ran the blockade outwards on the 18th of March, this year, in charge of Captain Gooding, her present commander. In accomplishing this latter gallant feat she passed between two Federal cruisers, and thus became the target for a continuous running fire. Nevertheless, Captain Gooding brought her safely out. The work was one of great difficulty, requiring not only tact and skill, but coolness and bravery. A generous enemy would have praised the feat, but, as the fact could not be disputed, and the gunnery of the cruisers having proved a failure, the editor of the Herald came to the rescue. If the firing of the Nashville's opponents on that occasion had been as true as this gentleman's statements were false, if their practice had been equal to his skill in throwing the "hatchet," the Nashville's doom would have been sealed. Every tyro in geography knows, and on consulting a chart any one may ascertain, that there is only one entrance channel to Beaufort, and that in passing either in or out a ship must go through it. How the Nashville came out of the ordeal could not have been unknown to the naval historian of the Herald; but something required to be done to cover the Federal disgrace. Investing geographical science with inaccuracy, he boldly asserted that there were three channels to Beaufort, that in each of the outer ones a cruiser was stationed, and that by the centre the Nashville escaped. Something of this kind will be attempted by the same veracious authority in reference to her recent appearance off Charleston, and we, anxious to correct such audacity, pen the following short account of the adventure:—"The Thomas L. Wrag left Nassau on Friday, June 20, and arrived off Charleston at an early hour on the morning of Monday the 23rd. Except at parting, when she took on board Captain Carlin and a portion of the crew of the steamship Cecile, lost on a reef near Abaco, nothing occurred of importance during the passage. The desired land was sighted, the true position of the ship ascertained, and one cruiser carefully examined during the process of sailing round him. At about three o'clock the intricacies of the navigation were being overcome, and everything seemed to indicate a successful finale. Suddenly, however, the somnolent cruiser woke up, flashed his signal light, and fired a gun. Lights and ships, six or eight in number, appeared in all directions. Two were right ahead, others on the port and starboard bows, and one showed nearly astern. Shotted guns were fired, and 'about ship' was the word. When day broke the Nashville appeared to be in a very perilous situation, and, in a few minutes after, one of the most memorable chases on record commenced. The fastest side-wheel steamer of the blockading fleet, supposed to be the Key-stone State, took up the gauntlet, and, at about a mile and a half, followed in the Nashville's wake. A large propeller attempting to cut her off was soon got rid of, and at eleven o'clock, a.m., with alternating distances apart, the pursued and pursuer kept on their several courses. Considering the issue, and the large sum offered for capture ($200,000, in addition to the value of the ship and cargo), the anxiety to catch the Nashville may be imagined. Shortly after eleven, all sail was set on the cruiser, and she contrived to near her position. Captain Gooding, however, [had his ship well in hand, and as he was well assisted by an able engineer, and an energetic crew, an improved pace was speedily effected.

"At twelve (noon), a large steamer was observed right ahead, and the Nashville was again in jeopardy. The pursuer, taking the stranger for a colleague, fired a gun, either to say 'lend a hand,' or this is 'my bird,' when all doubt was dispelled on a nearer approach. She proved to be English, either a man-of-war or large passenger ship, and at once sent up her colours. She shut off her steam, and for a short time quietly looked on, and no doubt enjoyed the scene. Under her awning many faces could be seen, and, in all probability, no one on board had ever witnessed such a gallant struggle. As the day advanced the Nashville and the prize dollars began to disappear. The cruiser now took in all sail, sent down her yards and topmasts, and prepared for work in right-down good earnest. A stern chase is proverbially long, and this one, the longest that ever took place between two steamers, continued during the entire day. At about eight p.m. the dollars and ship were nearly out of sight. The Yankee was fast disappearing in a blaze of Western light, and in a few minutes more it was all over. Borrowing the quaint phraseology of John Bunyan, the Nashville 'went on her way and saw him no more.'

D.

PROCLAMATION OF THE GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

The General Assembly of Virginia, impelled by the sacred obligation to protect the citizens of this State from the usurpations and tyranny of the Government of the United States, having passed an Act "to authorise a force of 10,000 men to be raised for the defence of the Commonwealth," it becomes my duty to endeavour to execute that Act. And, notwithstanding the heavy calls which have been heretofore made, and which have been unflinchingly responded to by my people, yet I again confidently appeal to Virginians to give their hands and their hearts to this undertaking. The people of Virginia, by overwhelming majorities of their Convention and Legislature, have solemnly announced to the world the purpose of this Commonwealth, under no conceivable circumstances again to acknowledge allegiance to, or unite the destinies of our people with those of the United States. Under these circumstances, it is their duty to put forth their power with whatever of energy may be at their command. A large portion of the Western and North-western parts of the State has been in the occupancy of the enemy, and though there are as warm and as loyal hearts there, as in any part of the Commonwealth, yet from this untoward circumstance, they have been able hitherto to do but little. The new force now called for is intended chiefly for the defence of Western Virginia. Is it expecting too much to ask these valiant men to come forth and aid in raising this force for this great and laudable object? The General Assembly have appointed a Western man to command this force—a man identified with you in interest by connexion, by family ties, by a noble ancestry, by long tried public service. They have evinced their confidence in his ability, in his zeal, in his patriotism, in his devotion to the great cause in which we are engaged, by appointing him. Will you not rally to his standard, and give him the force necessary to make the law effectual? Will not all Virginians aid in this noble purpose? If anything other than the love of country and obedience to the call of your mother Virginia be wanting, it will be found in the execrable acts of the Lincoln Government. A recital of a few of these acts, which are undeniable, will suffice for justification in the eyes of the world.

The course they pursued previous to the war was more than sufficient to justify our separation from them; but their disgraceful violations of the Constitution and of plighted faith since the war; their utter perversions of truth; their reckless disregard of justice and of the rights of property, and their departure, in numerous instances, from the usages of civilized warfare; the invasion of our homes and the murder of our peaceful citizens, render a connection with them in future odious to our sense of honour and abhorrent to our feelings. It has produced an estrangement as enduring as if there was an impassable gulf between us.

The Constitution, as they interpret it; the contempt of its provisions, according to their own interpretation; the laws made in conformity with it, and those in direct conflict with its plainest provisions, which are equally approved by them; the men who have been the instruments to execute their power and vengeance, and the hirelings who have pillaged our land, desecrated our churches, polluted our fair fields, sacked our towns, and insulted the innocent and helpless, render them alike detestable to us and disgraceful to humanity.

They were bound by the Constitution to guarantee to us our rights, and protect us against invasion. They have invaded us themselves, with the avowed object to subjugate and overwhelm us, to confiscate our property and banish us from our domain.

They were required to give no preference by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. They have shut up all our ports and prohibited us from having intercourse with ourselves or the nations of the earth, while they have left all of their own ports open to the commerce of the world. They have refused to permit us to obtain with our own means even the medicines necessary for our sick and wounded—articles never hitherto considered contraband by any civilized nation.

They were prohibited from forming or erecting a new State within the jurisdiction of any other State. They have permitted an illegal Legislature, not acknowledged by the Constitution or laws of this State, or by a majority of our people, to profess to establish a new State within the jurisdiction of Virginia, acknowledging the acts of the Governor of that State, receiving its representatives and Senators into the Congress of the United States without the colour of law, justice, or right, and paying for their pretended services out of the public fisc. They have granted to this pretended Governor money which they have acknowledged to be due to the State of Virginia. They have authorized the raising of troops within this pretended State to war against our people and desolate the firesides of their brethren, and stimulated them to bloodshed and massacre.

They have allowed vacancies in the representation of this State to be filled by writs issued by the false Executive of this pretended State, against the express provision that the Executive authority of Virginia alone shall issue such writs, with the full knowledge on their part that the rightful Governor of this State had been undoubtedly and constitutionally elected by a majority of the entire population of the State, before the commencement of the war, and that he still continues in office under his regular appointment, and in which election the people of this pretended State participated. They have permitted such representatives to be elected by soldiers in the army, and not by the people in the district, against an express provision in the Constitution of Virginia, which prohibits soldiers in the service of the United States from voting in such elections; thus recognizing the base traitor against his own State as a fit associate and colleague for representatives who are entitled to the station, and allowing low pretenders to the position of Senators, to be dignified with that honourable distinction.

They were prohibited from making any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. They have sent their myrmidons into churches and dragged our ministers from the sacred desk, for a mere omission to put up a petition to the Almighty for their execrated President. They have shut up our places of worship for the same cause, and prohibited our people from assembling together for the exercise of religious duties.

They were denied authority to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press. They have recklessly imprisoned private citizens, holding no office or position, civil or military, for expressing a mere difference of opinion with themselves, and for fearlessly uttering their sentiments; and even incarcerated our honourable women for similar cause, permitting their armed jailors to watch and insult them in the privacy of their cells. They have placed the press of the country, wherever their power extends, under censorship, and in numerous cases prohibited the circulation of papers, broken up their forms, and scattered their types to the winds.

They were restrained from infringing the right of the people to keep and bear arms. They have disarmed large portions of the people of one of the States still in their Union, and hunted and baited those in others who have presumed to keep their own arms against their mandate.

They were expressly prohibited from quartering soldiers in any house without the consent of the owner, and not even in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law. They have not only thus quartered them, but they have instigated their soldiers, when so quartered, to plunder them of every valuable, and wantonly to destroy what their cupidity could not carry away. They have not only shot down helpless owners who ought to have been revered for their age and sex, but have consumed the owners and their dwellings in one undistinguished conflagration. And when they have professed to pay for property illegally obtained, they have paid the owners in pretended money which they have previously criminally counterfeited and debased.

With this catalogue of violations of solemn constitutional obligations, well may we say, they keep no faith, and pervert truth, justice, and right.

When, in the history of civilized nations, has it been known that non-combatants, plain citizens, engaged only in farming pursuits, were imprisoned for having shown allegiance to their own State laws? When has it been known that wives and pure and spotless maidens have been violated by soldiers without an effort on the part of their officers to pursue the perpetrators with the vengeance of the law? What civilized nation would not blush to conceal its own flag, the emblem of its nationality and honour, and hoist on the battle-field the flag of its enemy, in order to decoy that enemy into a murderous fire, and then glory in the meanness of the deception and the cowardice of the act?

What ancient or modern nation ever used a flag of truce to decoy an enemy in battle other than the United States of America? Let history record the disgrace, and brand the infamy upon their brow for all time to come.

What ancient or modern nation would openly fire upon a public hospital, in which the sick, the wounded, and the dying are being cared for by the generous and the kind-hearted, the surgeon and the Sister of Charity? We brand it as a crime upon the United States, and call upon the historian to record it against them.

They were required to guarantee to every State a Republican form of Government. Wherever their armies have obtained a foothold, they have established a military government, and appointed military satraps and provost-marshal to execute laws never sanctioned by the people or the Government which they created, and have executed arbitrary power, enforcing it by bayonets and at the mouths of cannon; these military rulers issuing proclamations insulting to the people, unknown to civilization and brutally disgraceful, compelling obedience by presenting the alternatives of submission or starvation; and, by their mere military order, causing some of our most patriotic citizens to be ignominiously hung upon a charge of treason, without trial and without law!

Can any people be expected to submit to such wrongs? Will the people of Virginia tamely submit to such tyranny? If such acts are perpetrated while they have but partial control, what may we not expect when the demons have full sway and authority?

Citizens of Virginia, the State appeals to you to add to your many noble exertions for the cause in which we are engaged, this one effort to redeem our fair State from the hand of the oppressor. Make up the force now called for and be prompt in your action.

Given under my hand and under the seal of the Commonwealth, at Richmond, this 27th day of June, 1862, and in the 86th year of the Commonwealth, JOHN LETCUMER.

By the Governor,

GEORGE W. MUNFORD, Secretary of the Commonwealth.

ADDRESS OF GOVERNOR MOORE TO THE PEOPLE OF LOUISIANA.

The occupation by the enemy of a portion of the territory of our State imposes upon us new and unaccustomed responsibilities. It creates an anomalous condition of affairs, and establishes between the citizens of New Orleans and all other of our towns in the actual occupation of the enemy, and those of the country parishes, relations very different from those which regulate their ordinary intercourse. It is not surprising that a people who are now experiencing the first invasion of their State, should not at the outset have appreciated the duties and necessities of the new position in which they suddenly find themselves placed. New Orleans is the commercial depot of the State. To it the whole agricultural products of our soil are conveyed, and from it are brought in return a large measure of the supplies for our plantations, and the merchandise which forms the object of every species of traffic. The channels of trade constantly flow between it and the country, freighted with the every-day transactions of all classes of our citizens, thus binding our urban and rural populations together by the strong bonds of mutual dependence and reciprocal benefit.

Trade with the Enemy Forbidden.—A state of public war, resulting in the armed occupancy of New Orleans by the enemy, changes these relations. There cannot be a war for arms and a peace for trade between two people at the same time. The armed occupants of that city are our enemies. To each loyal citizen of Louisiana and of the Confederacy, every citizen of the country hostile to us is an enemy. We cannot harter our products for theirs. We cannot exchange our corn, cattle, sugar, or cotton for their gold. We have no right even to pay money that was owing to the citizens of the now hostile States before the war. Absolute non-intercourse—the entire suspension of communication by visit or for trade—is the only safe rule for our guidance. It is a rule recognized as imperative by all writers on public law, and universally administered by the authorities of nations at war.

Communication with Citizens of Occupied Places Must Cease.—Nor is it prudent to hold communication with citizens of any portion of our territory temporarily occupied by the enemy. However much we may deplore their misfortunes, we must not permit these to be the instruments for our further damage. The only proper and permissible manner in which we can communicate with the enemy, or those under his control who are within his lines, is under a flag of truce. Communication with New Orleans since its armed occupation has been almost unrestrained, save by the fears of those who desired, from motives either of gain or curiosity, to enter the lines of the enemy. This communication must cease, and at once. It is well-known that the general commanding the invading army opposes no obstacle to the ingress of any of our citizens into New Orleans, but invariably attaches to the passport for egress the statement, "This pass is given upon the parole of honour of the holder, that he will in no way give information, countenance, aid, or support to the so-called Confederate Government or States." This cunningly-devised trap to catch the unsuspecting visitor was expected to traipse him in the rendition of those services which his country demands. No parole is ever taken when these passports are delivered—none ever required. This condition is inserted in the passport without notification to the applicant that it is to be required, in the belief that the apparent tacit consent of the receiver to a condition thus sneakily sought to be foisted upon him would be held binding in morals and in conscience.

At first the passports were received unsuspectingly, and without knowledge of the characteristic treachery contained in this clause, but it is now well known that none are given without it.

Using the Enemy's Passport.—Whoever, therefore, now voluntarily places himself in the power of the enemy, by entering their lines, throws a shade upon his loyalty to his Government. The possession of a passport containing the clause above quoted, subjects the holder to grave suspicion. Its receipt is incipient neutrality. The desire to fulfil the condition assumed to be imposed is only disguised indifference to our success. The attempt to fulfil it is treachery to our cause. No man can pretend to assimilate this ex parte declaration of a Federal Provost Marshal, to which no assent is made by parole or act, to the parole of honour well recognized in military usage, the observance of which must ever be regarded as a primary duty. Such paroles are given to, and received by, prisoners on either side, that they will not renew their participation in hostilities until exchanged, and by persons sent from without the lines, that they will not reveal what their presence has enabled them to see and hear. Neither the citizens of New Orleans nor those visitors who have gone there since its occupation by the enemy are regarded by him as prisoners of war. If prisoners, it is his manifest duty to feed them, and when permitted to depart from his lines he would require of them a parole to cease hostilities until exchanged.

The Passports shall not be a Shelter from Duty.—It has come to my knowledge that some persons have gone into New Orleans voluntarily, and without any apparent or avowed purpose to accomplish save the gratification of an idle curiosity, and have since returned with some of these passports. When required to perform militia duty afterwards, or accosted by the enrolling officer of conscripts, they present the passport, in which a Federal officer has assumed a promise that the holder will not countenance, or aid his Government. If any citizen of this State confesses to such a promise, he is self-condemned of treason. If such citizen holds himself bound not to countenance his own Government, he must be a traitor to it. He cannot ignore his own Government. If he does not countenance that, he must necessarily recognize the pretensions of those who seek to crush it. Nor can he separate one part of the pretended parole from another. He cannot claim that he holds himself bound by the stipulation not to give aid or support to his Government, and thus avoid military duty, without also confessing to an obligation not to countenance it, which is treason unmasked.

The military officers will be charged with orders on this subject, the rigorous execution of which will be required. The Confederacy and the States recognize but two classes—its friends and its foes. In this mighty and awful struggle for our sacred rights, for the sanctity of our homes, for the enjoyment of liberty, for the salvation of our country, all considerations of blood or friendship must give way—all apprehensions for the safety of property must be disregarded. Obedience to the laws and acquiescence in the policy of the Government will be the cheerful homage that every true man will make. Those who are not true must be deprived of the power to do harm.

Spies, Salaried Informers and Tories.—Not the least evil of the consequences flowing from communication by our citizens with the places occupied by the enemy, is the facility it affords to spies who traverse the country through the negligence of officers, or the unsuspecting security of the people. These spies communicate with salaried informers, who are to be found in some localities, ready to serve any master for gold.

The world has never furnished an instance of a people renouncing their Government, and establishing a new one with the unanimity which has characterized the people of the Confederate States. Not even the men of '76, those forefathers whom we are accustomed to think of as battling with undivided hearts for a severance from the crown, and the independence of their nation, approached so near to perfect unity as ourselves in this struggle against a foe more malignant and vindictive than the one confronted by them. In the revolt of the colonies, whole districts were inhabited by Tories, who strove to throttle the infant liberties of their country, and bind her by fetters to the throne. In our struggle they are rarely to be met, but though very few in number, they exist, and with a hate to our Government not exceeded by the hate of their predecessors to the Government of George Washington. They can be tolerated no longer. If they did not wish to live under the Confederate Government, they were warned by its President a year ago that they were at liberty to depart. They have made their option. They cannot live here and disregard our laws. They can neither hold property or enjoy liberty if they disown the Government which protects the one and insures the other. This would be true even in ordinary circumstances, but when the foe who aims at our subjugation is pressing our soil short must be the shrift of those who stand ready to welcome him.

All possible vigilance must therefore be exercised for the detection of these spies and salaried informers, and for their apprehension. All citizens should report to the nearest authorities, the names, and the proof or grounds of suspicion. Nor must less rigour be enforced in the cases of those persons who have not obeyed the President's warning. Strangers must give a satisfactory account of themselves; the doubtful must be closely watched; the disloyal must be imprisoned, and when found guilty of treason must be held liable to the penalty due to that capital crime.

Confederate Notes, the Currency of our Country.—Manifest are the inducements presented by the enemy to begin trade with him. As temptations to you to thus violate your sacred duty as citizens of the Confederate States, he offers high prices for your products, which he promises to pay in gold and silver. With equal assiduity he is engaged in efforts to depreciate the currency of your country. He forgets that every Confederate bond is a record and certificate of a sum that has been contributed by generous and confiding citizens to secure the independence of their country—that every Confederate note is the evidence that thus much of the wealth of the people has been loaned to the Government to help it in its struggle—that all these sources of a republic of 10,000,000 of people, occupying a vast territory of unsurpassed productiveness, are pledged for their redemption—that they constitute a currency that measures the value of all your property, and that custom and loyalty recognize them as a legal tender. They are received and paid as such by all patriots. He who refuses to receive them in payment of a debt, or in exchange for what he offers for sale, does a direct injury to our sacred cause, fans the latent sparks of treason, and gives indirect aid and comfort to the ruthless enemy who invades our soil, ravages our coasts, insults our mothers, wives, and daughters, and tyrannizes over our conquered cities. The refusal to take Confederate money, if general, would at once paralyze our Government, and put the Confederacy in imminent peril. Such refusal affords a presumption of disloyalty, and the plea of ignorance is but a slight palliation of the grave offence.

River Steamboats for Transports.—The enemy needs river steamboats to transport his troops on their plundering expedition along the Mississippi, and seizes all within his reach. He searches for them in bayous seldom navigated, and by the aid of traitorous informers, he has succeeded in capturing those that were thought to be effectually hidden. This must be prevented at any cost. As no concealment can be depended on, the boats must be destroyed whenever the near approach of the enemy shall leave no other means of preventing their capture.

Supplies of Provisions for New Orleans.—The delicate question of permitting New Orleans to be supplied with provisions while in the occupation of the enemy was presented to me for decision soon after my return from Camp Moore, whither I had gone for the purpose of concerting with the authorities at Richmond plans for the future, which will soon be made manifest. Much was and is to be said for and against the policy. It is sufficient for my present purpose to say that I gave permits to two agents of the committee of the city to carry provisions to our citizens so long as the Federal general should faithfully observe his pledge not to appropriate any portions of the provisions to other uses than supplying the wants of our own people. I was not aware of the danger that attended such a policy in affording advantages for the establishment of an intercourse which the previous part of this address will show I could not approve. But I did not expect that such a concession, made in tender consideration of the pressing wants of the city, would be abused by any of its own citizens to the extent of committing an act little short of affording direct aid to the enemy. The recent act of the cashier of the Bank of America and his accomplices has convinced me that any departure from the rule, that the necessities of the population of any locality must be held subservient to the paramount consideration of the public safety, is attended with peril, and that in my desire to relieve the people of New Orleans I was subjecting the public interests to danger of injury. No boats will hereafter be permitted to go to New Orleans or Baton Rouge while these places are occupied by the enemy, unless, after the arrival of the commanding general, Confederate officers should be detailed for the purpose of going in charge of them, in the manner usually practised by belligerents.

Continued Resistance our Paramount Duty.—It is not proper, for obvious reasons, to state here in detail the measures I have taken and the plans devised for the defence of our homes. The loss of New Orleans, and the opening of the Mississippi, which will soon follow, have greatly increased our danger and deprived us of many resources for defence. With less means we have more to do than before. Every weapon we have, and all that our skillful mechanics can make, will be needed. Every able-bodied citizen must hold himself in readiness for immediate active service. Brave, vigilant, energetic officers are authorized to raise bands of partisan rangers. Let every possible assistance be rendered them in forming, arming, equipping, and mounting their companies, and in giving them support and information when in service. Let every citizen be an armed sentinel to give warning of any approach of the insolent foe. Let all our river banks swarm with armed patriots to teach the hated invader that the rifle will be his only welcome on his errands of plunder and destruction. Wherever he dares to raise the hated emblem of tyranny, tear it down and rend it in tatters.

Mumford the Martyr.—The noble heroism of the patriot Mumford has placed his name high on the list of our martyred sons. When the Federal navy reached New Orleans a squad of marines was sent on shore, who hoisted their flag on the Mint. The city was not occupied by the United States' troops, nor had they reached there. The place was not in their possession. William B. Mumford pulled down the detested symbol with his own hands, and for that was condemned to be hung by General Butler after his arrival. Brought in full view of the scaffold, his murderers hoped to appal his heroic soul by the exhibition of the implements of ignominious death. With the evidence of their determination to consummate their brutal purpose before his eyes, they offered him life on the condition that he would abjure his country, and swear allegiance to her foe. He spurned the offer. Scorning to stain his soul with such foul dishonour, he met his fate courageously, and has transmitted to his countrymen a fresh example of what men will do and dare when under the inspiration of fervid patriotism. I shall not forget the outrage of his murder, nor shall it pass unatoned.

Rules that will not be relaxed.—I am not introducing any new regulations for the conduct of our citizens, but am only placing before them those that every nation at war recognizes as necessary and proper to be enforced. It is needless, therefore, to say that they will not be relaxed. On the contrary, I am but awaiting the assistance and presence of the General appointed to the department to inaugurate the most effectual method for their enforcement. It is well to repeat them:—

Trading with the enemy is prohibited under all circumstances.

Travelling to and from New Orleans and other places occupied by the enemy is forbidden. All passengers will be arrested.

Citizens going to those places, and returning with the enemy's usual passport, will be arrested.

Conscripts or militiamen, having in possession such passports, and seeking to shun duty under the pretext of a parole, shall be treated as public enemies. No such papers will be held sufficient excuse for inaction by any citizen.

The utmost vigilance must be used by officers and citizens in the detection of spies and salaried informers, and their apprehension promptly effected.

Tories must suffer the fate that every betrayer of his country deserves.

Confederate notes shall be received and used as the currency of the country.

River steamboats must, in no case, be permitted to be captured. Burn them when they cannot be saved.

Provisions may be conveyed to New Orleans only in charge of officers, and under the precautions governing communication between belligerents.

Our Struggle and its Sure Result.—The loss of New Orleans, bitter humiliation as it was to Louisianians, has not created despondency, nor shaken our ardent faith in our success. Not to the eye of the enthusiastic patriot alone, who might be expected to colour events with his hopes, but to the more impassioned gaze of the statesman, that success was certain from the beginning. It is only the timid, the unreflecting, and the property owner who thinks more of his possession than his country, that will succumb to the depressing influences of disaster. The great heart of the people has swelled with more intense aspirations for the cause the more it seemed to totter. Their confidence is well founded. The possession by the enemy of our seaboard and main water-courses ought to have been foreseen by us. His overwhelming naval force necessarily accomplished the same results attained by the British with the same force in their war of subjugation. The final result will be the same. Let us turn unheeding ears to the rumours of foreign intervention. To believe is to rely on them. We must rely only on ourselves. Our recognition as a nation is one of those certainties of the future which nothing but our own unfaithfulness can prevent. We must not look around for friends for help when the enemy is straight before us. Help yourselves. It is the great instrument of national as of individual success.

THOMAS O. MOORE,
Governor of Louisiana.

Opelousas, June 18, 1862.

BRITISH TRADE WITH THE BAHAMAS.

The following correspondence has passed between a highly influential body of shipowners in Liverpool and the Foreign Office:—

TO HER MAJESTY'S PRINCIPAL SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The humble memorial of the undersigned British merchants and shipowners sheweth,—

That your memorialists view with considerable anxiety and apprehension the hostile attitude at present assumed by Federal cruisers in the Bahama waters. These cruisers are now blockading the British port of Nassau as if it were a Confederate port, and are making prize of British vessels sailing from one British port to another with British goods, though such vessels are perfectly innocent of any attempt to run the blockade. If such a violation of international rights be passed over by Her Majesty's Government very disastrous consequences will ensue to your memorialists and other merchants and shipowners trading in those waters. Many British vessels fitted out for sea with British cargoes for Nassau are now deterred from sailing in apprehension of seizure, for, though it may be clearly proved that such seizure is unjustifiable, your memorialists have no confidence in the administration of justice in the Federal Prize Courts, or in the prospect of being compensated for the injury inflicted. The confidence of mercantile men in the sanctity of the British flag is already so much shaken that underwriters are demanding 10 per cent. premium for insuring from risk of capture British goods in British bottoms, sailing from one British port to another. Your memorialists, therefore, pray that steps may be taken by Her Majesty's Government to protect British shipping in the Bahama waters, and to put a check on the unwarrantable seizures so repeatedly perpetrated by the Federal cruisers. And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

(Signed by 40 shipowners.)

Foreign Office, July 5, 1862.

Sir,—I am directed by Earl Russell to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2nd inst., enclosing a memorial from certain British merchants and shipowners at Liverpool, in which they state that they view with considerable anxiety and apprehension the hostile attitude assumed by Federal cruisers in the Bahama waters, and the memorialists pray that steps may be taken by Her Majesty's Government to protect British shipping in those waters, and put a check on the seizures so repeatedly made by the Federal cruisers. I am to state to you, in reply, that it is alleged, on the other hand, by Mr. Seward and Mr. Adams, that ships have been sent from this country to America with a fixed purpose to run the blockade; that high premiums of insurance have been paid with this view; and that arms and ammunition have been thus conveyed to the Southern States to enable them to carry on the war. Lord Russell was unable to deny the truth of those allegations or to prosecute to conviction the parties engaged in those transactions. But he cannot be surprised that the cruisers of the United States should watch with vigilance a port which is said to be the great entrepôt of this commerce. Her Majesty's Government have no reason to doubt the equity and adherence to legal requirement of the United States' Prize Courts. But he is aware that many vessels are subject to harsh treatment, and that, if captured, the loss to the merchant is far from being compensated, even by a favourable decision in a Prize Court. The true remedy would be, that the merchants and shipowners of Liverpool should refrain from this species of trade. It exposes innocent commerce to vexatious detention and search by American cruisers; it produces irritation and illwill on the part of the population of the Northern States of America; it is contrary to the spirit of Her Majesty's proclamation; and it exposes the British name to suspicions of bad faith, to which neither Her Majesty's Government nor the great body of the nation are justly obnoxious. It is true, indeed, the supplies of arms and ammunition have been sent to the Federals equally in contravention of that neutrality which Her Majesty has proclaimed. It is true, also, that the Federals obtain more freely and more easily that of which they stand in need. But if the Confederates had command of the sea they would, no doubt, watch as vigilantly, and capture as readily, British vessels going to New York, as the Federals now watch Charleston and capture vessels seeking to break the blockade. There can be no doubt that the watchfulness exercised by Federal cruisers to prevent supplies reaching the Confederates by sea will occasionally lead to vexatious visits of merchant ships not engaged in any pursuit to which the Federals can properly object. This, however, is an evil to which war on the ocean is liable to expose neutral commerce, and Her Majesty's Government have done all they can fairly do; that is to say, they have urged the Federal Government to enjoin upon their naval officers greater caution in the exercise of their belligerent rights. Her Majesty's Government, having represented to the United States' Government every case in which they were justified in interfering, have only further to observe that it is the duty of Her Majesty's subjects to conform to Her Majesty's proclamation, and abstain from furnishing to either of the belligerent parties any of the means of war which are forbidden to be furnished by that proclamation.

I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

A. H. LAYARD.

Thomas Berry Horsfall, Esq., 42, Portland-place.

THE CONFISCATION AND EMANCIPATION BILL.

The following is the text of the Bill:—

A Bill to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of Rebels, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person who shall hereafter commit the crime of treason against the United States, and shall be adjudged guilty thereof, shall suffer death, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; or he shall be imprisoned for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; said fine shall be levied and collected on any or all of the property, real and personal, excluding slaves, of which the said person so convicted was the owner at the time of committing the said crime, any sale or conveyance to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall hereafter idle, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States, or the laws thereof, or shall give aid or comfort thereto, or shall engage in, or give aid and comfort to, any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, by a fine not exceeding $10,000, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person guilty of either of the offences described in this act shall be for ever incapable and disqualified to hold any office under the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be construed in any way to affect or alter the prosecution, conviction, or punishment of any person or persons guilty of treason against the United States before the passage of this act, unless such person is convicted under this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estate and property, money, stocks, credits, and effects of the persons hereafter named in this section, and to apply and use the same, and the proceeds thereof, for the support of the Army of the United States, that is to say: First, of any person hereafter acting as an officer of the army or navy of the Rebels in arms against the Government of the United States; secondly, of any person hereafter acting as President, Vice-President, Member of Congress, Judge of any Court, Cabinet Officer, Foreign Minister, Commissioner, or Consul of the so-called Confederate States of America; thirdly, of any person acting as Governor of a State, member of a Convention or Legislature, or judge of any Court of any of the so-called Confederate States of America; fourthly, of any person who, having held an office of honour, trust, or profit in the United States, shall hereafter hold an office in the so-called Confederate States of America; fifthly, of any person hereafter holding any office or agency under the Government of the so-called Confederate States of America, or under any of the several States of the said Confederacy, or the laws thereof, whether such office or agency be national, State or municipal in its name or character: Provided, That the persons, thirdly, fourthly, and fifthly, above described, shall have accepted their appointment or election since the date of the pretended ordinance of Secession of the State, or shall have taken an oath of allegiance to or to support the Constitution of the so-called Confederate States; sixthly, of any persons who, owning property in any loyal State or Territory of the United States, or in the district of Columbia, shall hereafter assist and give aid and comfort to such rebellion, and all sales, transfers, or conveyances of any such property shall be null and void; and it shall be a sufficient bar to any suit brought by such person for the possession or the use of such property, or any of it, to allege and prove that he is one of the persons described in this section.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person within any State or Territory of the United States, other than those named as aforesaid, after the passage of this act, being engaged in armed rebellion against the Government of the United States, or aiding or abetting such rebellion, shall not, within sixty days after public warning and proclamation, duly given and made by the President of the United States, cease to aid, countenance, and abet such rebellion, and return to his allegiance to the United States, all the estate and property, moneys, stocks, and credits of such person shall be liable to seizure as aforesaid, and it shall be the duty of the President to seize and use them as aforesaid, or the proceeds thereof. And all sales, transfers, or conveyances of any such property, after the expiration of the said sixty days from the date of such warning and proclamation, shall be null and void; and it shall be a sufficient bar to any suit brought by such person for the possession or the use of such property, or any of it, to allege and prove that he is one of the persons described in this section.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That to secure the condemnation and sale of any such property after the same shall have been seized, so that it may be made available for the purposes aforesaid, proceedings in rem shall be instituted in the name of the United States in any District Court thereof, or in any Territorial Court, or in the United States' District Court for the District of Columbia, within which the property above described or any part thereof may be found, or into which the same, if moveable, may first be brought, which proceedings shall conform as nearly as may be to proceedings in admiralty or revenue cases, and if said property, whether real or personal, shall be found to have belonged to a person engaged in rebellion, or who has given aid or comfort thereto, the same shall be condemned as enemies' property, and become the property of the United States, and may be disposed of as the Court shall decree, and the proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury of the United States for the purposes aforesaid.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the several courts aforesaid shall have power to make such orders, establish such forms of decree and sale, and direct such deeds and conveyances to be executed and delivered by the marshals thereof, where real estate shall be the subject of sale, as shall fitly and efficiently effect the purposes of this act, and vest in the purchasers of such property good and valid titles thereto. And the said Court shall have power to allow such fees and charges of their officers as shall be reasonable and proper to the premises.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That all slaves of persons who shall hereafter be engaged in rebellion against the Government of the United States, or who shall in any way give aid or comfort thereto, escaping from such persons, and taking refuge within the lines of the army; and all slaves captured from such persons, or deserted by them and coming under the control of the Government of the United States; and all slaves of such persons found or being within any place occupied by Rebel forces, and afterward occupied by the forces of the United States, shall be deemed captives of war, and shall be for ever free of their servitude, and not again held as slaves.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That no slave escaping into any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, from any other State, shall be delivered up, or in any way impeded or hindered of his liberty, except for crime, or some offence against the laws, unless the person claiming said fugitive shall first make oath that the person to whom the labour or service of such fugitive is alleged to be due, is his lawful owner, and has not borne arms against the United States in the present rebellion, nor in any way given aid and comfort thereto; and no person engaged in the military or naval service of the United States shall, under any pretence whatever, assume to decide on the validity of the claim of any person to the service or labour of any other person, or surrender up any such person to the claimant, on pain of being dismissed from the service.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is authorized to employ as many persons of African descent as he may deem necessary and proper for the suppression of this rebellion; and for this purpose he may organize and use them in such manner as he may judge best for the public welfare.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to make provision for the transportation, colonization, and settlement, in some tropical country beyond the limits of the United States, of such persons of the African race, made free by the provisions of this act, as may be willing to emigrate, having first obtained the consent of the Government of said country to their protection and settlement within the same, with all the rights and privileges of freemen.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the Courts of the United States shall have full power to institute proceedings, make orders and decrees, issue process, and do all other things necessary to carry this act into effect.

THE ALBANY Evening Journal, edited by Thurlow Weed, says:—"It is feared that the enlistments under the new call will not be active enough for the emergency. We share somewhat in this fear. Ten days will decide. If at the expiration of that time those fears shall be realized, then let us have a draft. The demand is too pressing to be delayed. The men must be had—voluntarily or otherwise."

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE, Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants, GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN, Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

H. D. WEED AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN, Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO., Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA. Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rutherford-place, Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO., Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS. Office—No. 56, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool. Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA. General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER, Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A. Represented by Jos. T. Robinson & Co., India Buildings, Water-street, Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO., CHARLESTON. South Carolina. FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO., Liverpool, Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE, GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS. This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON, TREDEGAR IRON WORKS. Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines, all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c., RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO., General Commission Merchants, RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO., Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton, Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE, Commission Merchant, ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer, MANCHESTER. Three and Six Cord Spool Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE, New York; F. RIMAILHO AND NEYREY, New Orleans.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM, Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON, Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds, Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO., Commission Merchants, MOBILE and NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A. Represented by R. G. BRESLEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY, Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN, Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and America. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms. 102, Fleet-street, London.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDERICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published the following Catalogues of their Stock:—

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books.—Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature, History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature, History, Bolles Lettres.
5. MAP-CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages, History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History, Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London, and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised, classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING. Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interests that mighty lever, "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies. Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade. The object of this Agency is twofold:—

- 1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.
- 2nd. To advertise Southern business, property, &c., in European journals.
- 3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors, WILLIAM H. BARNES, SUPERINTENDENT. Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Elysees—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best French and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY under fifteen. Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier, 17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

GENTLEMEN requiring an excellent Tailor are recommended to the establishments of A. M. GAUTIER, 229, Regent-street, London (above Curry's Restaurant), and 20, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris.

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC. On Wednesday, the 30th, will be published, in 1 vol. 8vo.

THOMAS JEFFERSON: an Historical View of Democracy in America. By CORNELIUS DE WITTE. Translated, with the Author's sanction, by R. S. H. CHURCH. London: LONGMAN, GREEN, AND CO., 14, Ludgate-hill.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company. The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after the second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES. Geo. W. West Vice-President. M. Masson. R. P. Hunt. D. Jamison. Martin Gordon, jun. Ar. Miltenberger. Cesaire Olivier. J. Leisy. A. Bohn. Jas. A. White. Numa Augustin. Douglas West. Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE: 78, Camp Street. Amount of Premiums for the year ending 31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47 Amount of Profits for year ending 31st December, 1861..... 282,908 38 Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent. interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem the Scrip of 1857. Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on and after 10th February next. Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROCHER, President. H. WHEELER, Secretary. New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE: Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets. Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 699,528 70

Amount of Profits for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74 Amount of Assets for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 866,420 98

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent. interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue of 1859. Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday in May next. Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES RIGGS, President. R. P. JANVIER, Secretary. New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day, it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent. interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS. Geo. Connelly. J. N. Nevins. John Pemberton. S. O. Nelson. P. Maspero. C. H. Scloomb. P. Pont. B. F. Voorheis. C. Ronald. B. O. Vignaud. G. Miltenberger.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE: Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months ending 30th April, 1861..... $21,876 14 Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27

Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,959 95

The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent. of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861. Twenty per cent. 1st September, 1861.

Scrip Certificates for the year 1861 deliverable on and after the 12th day of August next.

THOMAS A. ADAMS, President. G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERICAN ROYAL MAIL SHIPS.

NOTICE. These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent. Primage.

PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 6s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading the payment of Freight, will, upon examination incur a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact.

The British and North American Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship, or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquariol, oil of vitriol, gunpowder, or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of loading, or of any such offence, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum. Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XV. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political, social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent, commercial, however remote, however small the class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—startled Europe with, out at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thoughts, that even now—when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This co-operation has been most generously accorded us. There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no outlet through the muzzled press of those States. Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible misapprehension—that it is not the sole object. Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance. "THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, Fleet-street, London E.C.—August 7, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I—No. 16.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 14, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	241
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	243
Manchester Letter	243
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Battle of Gaines's Mills	243
Mr. Seward and Earl Russell	245
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	230
Paris	230
LEADERS—
The Latest Intelligence	243
Position of the Federal Armies	248
The Cotton Manufacture and the Cotton Famine	249
The Sheffield Manifesto	250
The Two Campaigns	251
Editorials	252
REVIEWS—
A Northern View of the American War	252
On the Recognition of the Southern Confederation	253
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR	237
LIEUTENANT MAURY AND THE AMERICAN STRUGGLE	254
THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN EUROPE	255
ADVERTISEMENTS	256

THE LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

We have briefly commented on the following telegrams in our leading column:—

NEW YORK, Aug. 2, 1862.

The situation of McClellan in the Peninsula inspires great anxiety. His army is suffering severely from scurvy, and he receives but few reinforcements. The prospect of immediate evacuation is openly canvassed.

The Confederates are in great force at Richmond, and on the James River.

Their batteries on the bank opened fire yesterday on the Federal mail boats' landing, and the head-quarters of Colonel Ingall.

Some of the Federal shipping was damaged; four men were killed and five wounded.

Vicksburg is still uncoquered.

An unsuccessful attempt was made on the 22nd ult., to capture the Confederate ram Arkansas, in which the Federal gunboats Queen and Essex received severe damage.

General Pope's troops continue to forage upon the farms in the vale of Shenandoah.

The people refuse to take the oath of Allegiance.

The recruiting in answer to the President's call for 300,000 men, makes little or no progress.

Money continues to be liberally subscribed for the volunteers, but the men do not offer themselves.

A proclamation issued by the Governor of Kentucky, calling the Legislature of the State together, is considered treasonable in purpose.

Ex-Governor Wickliffe, of Kentucky, lately made a speech declaring that to save the Union it was necessary to throw over all Abolitionists, and denouncing the emancipation and confiscation policy.

NEW YORK, Aug. 4, Evening.

President Lincoln has called for another 300,000 men for nine months, in addition to the 300,000 already required.

Draughting is to commence immediately.

The President has declined to accept the negro regiments as soldiers, but will avail himself of them as labourers.

A force from General McClellan's army has made a reconnaissance to within fourteen miles of Petersburg. After slight fighting the Federals destroyed the Confederate camp at Sycamore Church position.

General Pope's force has crossed the Rapedan, and captured Orange Court-house, driving thence two regiments of Confederate cavalry.

AUG. 5, Afternoon.

President Lincoln has officially ordered 300,000 men to be draughted from the Militia, to serve for nine months. If the 300,000 Volunteers previously called for are not enrolled by the 15th of August, the deficiency will be made up by a special draught from the Militia.

Despatches from General Pope's command state that it is believed the Confederates have really evacuated Richmond, and taken up the south bank of the James River as their line of defence.

A Washington despatch says there is reasonable suspicion that pestilence in Richmond was the cause of its evacuation.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

"THE present position of General McClellan's army is said to be good for defence, but neither favourable for offensive purposes nor for a retreat." Such is the first paragraph in the telegram per North American from New York, under date August 1, and it certainly is a neat, though somewhat prolix, paraphrase of "General McClellan is trapped." He cannot advance and he cannot retreat; why then he must remain where he is, whilst his army melts away. Such a position is surely very good for defence, for the enemy would never think of attacking an army in a hostile country that can neither advance nor retreat, is, in fact, imprisoned, with this important difference, that instead of being fed at the cost of the enemy, it has to feed itself. But we must not construe this too rigidly. Probably the meaning intended by the writer is that so long as General McClellan remains in his trap he is safe, but if he moves either to advance or retreat, he does so at considerable peril. According to the Northern accounts of the Confederate movements, the position of General McClellan is quite as bad as described in the paragraph we have quoted. On the south bank of the Chickahominy, and in the rear of the Federal army, are Confederate lines strongly supported by artillery. The Confederate troops command either side of the James River, between Richmond and the Federal army; and, moreover, in the rear of General McClellan, on the opposite side of the James River, are Confederate batteries, which, we are told, on the last day of July "opened with light artillery on the Federal mail boats and shipping, and the encampments near Harrison's Landing, killing and wounding several Federals. The Federal batteries replied, and silenced the Confederates." Assuming this account to be substantially correct, it follows that a part of McClellan's camp is exposed to the fire of the Confederate batteries, as well as the shipping on the river. It is reported that the elevation of the south bank of the James River will enable the Confederates to erect batteries to shell the enemy's camp. It is also stated that the Confederates are being massed in force between the junction of the Appomattox and James Rivers and Richmond.

Still more important is the account that "a new Merrimac and another ram, built at Richmond, have appeared in the James River, and came down as far as Turkey Bend. The Federal gunboats took up a position in line of battle, but no engagement ensued." If the "new Merrimac and another ram" are severally as invulnerable and destructive as the ram Arkansas, the Federal gunboats may not be able to protect the Federal shipping on the James River, or to prevent McClellan's supplies being cut off. If the Confederate vessels have come even as far as Turkey Bend, it shows that the obstructions in the river are not upon the "stone fleet" principle, but are of a character to permit of temporary removal or modification. The construction of the rams is a striking proof of the indomitable energy of the South; and though it is not in immediate prospect, the South may open some of the blockaded ports. Indeed, there is a rumour—to which, in the absence of further information, we attach no credit—that the port of Mobile has been opened.

Under such conditions, although General McClellan's position may be "good for defence" against assault, "unfavourable for advance or retreat," it is manifestly untenable if he can be constantly harassed by the enemy in his front, rear, and flanks, and if a new Merrimac and another ram are ready to contest the mastery of the James River. If a movement is inevitable, in which direction will it be? An advance with the remnant of the army of the Potomac is apparently impossible. That a movement is intended we may conclude, because General McClellan "has ordered the expulsion of all civilians from the lines, including the newspaper correspondents." All circumstances considered, the rumour that General McClellan's army will evacuate Yorktown Peninsula, and fall back upon Washington, is not incredible, but it is not likely that the evacuation of the Peninsula can be effected without disastrous opposition.

As we announced in our last issue, Commander Porter's mortar fleet has arrived in the Hampton Roads. We are informed that as soon as the whole of the vessels are together "it is supposed that they will be employed to reduce Fort Darling." With telegraphic brevity, the words "if they can" are omitted. As the fleet failed at Vicksburg it is, to say the least, just possible that the attempt to reduce Fort Darling may likewise be unsuccessful.

The rest of the news from Virginia is vague and contradictory. One day "Stonewall" Jackson is reported dead, and the next day he is living, and preparing to attack General Pope in the Shenandoah Valley; and finally, "General Jackson is reported to be preparing to attack Generals McClellan or Pope [or any other General!], but nothing definite can be ascertained of his movements." Such ignorance of an enemy's movements is neither wise nor blissful; but the blame is no doubt due to the obstinate reticence of the Confederates as to what they intend doing. General Pope has taken the field, and is said to have advanced beyond Warrenton with 60,000 men. It is reported that General Ewell is at Gordonsville with 30,000 troops.

General Johnson's official report of the Battle of Seven Pines says:—

We took in the battle of Seven Pines 10 pieces of artillery 6000 muskets, one garrison flag, and four regimental colours, besides a large quantity of tents and camp equipage. Major-General Longstreet reports the loss in his command as being about 3000, and Major-General G. W. Smith reports his loss at 1283. The loss of the enemy is stated in their own newspapers to have exceeded 10,000, an estimate which is no doubt short of the truth.

A letter dated Paris, and published in the Times, says:—

The following is a correct list of military supplies and prisoners taken in the late battles before Richmond:—80 large guns, 200 spiked guns (destroyed), 1700 mules, 2500 horses, 62,000 stand of arms, $6,000,000 worth of various stores, the balloon, with all its tackle; 2 major-generals, 6 brigadier-generals, 13 colonels, 180 commissioned officers, 11,000 prisoners.

This statement is taken from a private letter of a Confederate officer, written to a friend in this city.

It seems, from later accounts, that Commodore Farragut, though no longer attacking Vicksburg, is still in that neighbourhood. The sickness on board the fleet has rendered more than half the crews unfit for duty. It is said the fleet is to return to Memphis; but it appears that Commodore Farragut may, owing to the fall of the river, be fixed for some time. During the end of July there was but eighteen feet of water between Vicksburg and New Orleans, and the river was steadily receding, and some of the Federal gunboats, the Hertford, for instance, draws sixteen feet. According to a private letter from Vicksburg, published in the Mobile Register, a flag of truce had been sent to General Van Dorn, asking for permission to pass the batteries unmolested, upon condition of evacuating New Orleans and the river. We shall offer no other comment on this, further than to observe that the Mobile Register does not appear to vouch for its accuracy, but merely gives it on the faith of a correspondent supposed to be responsible. The extracts referred to are as follows:—

July 13.

We have just received exciting news from our batteries. A Yankee flag of truce has arrived to request permission for their gunboats to pass our batteries at Vicksburg and Baton Rouge unmolested, and that they will evacuate New Orleans and the river. It is said that General Van Dorn has refused the request, for he says that before two months he shall have the whole of the Yankee fleet between Vicksburg and Baton Rouge. General Breckinridge has command of the troops on the opposite side of the river, at Monroe, Louisiana, and is marching to capture the Yankee batteries over there, and to prevent supplies reaching the Yankee fleet. The whole of the Yankee fleet went down the river yesterday for the purpose of securing our batteries at Baton Rouge, but I am happy to say they have a very poor chance of doing so, as we have reopened the batteries on both sides of the river, and are mounting more guns and erecting new fortifications. There is no doubt that we made a brilliant strategic stroke in the re-capture of that town. Meanwhile a large light artillery force has been stationed on the banks of the river, with orders to attack all transports and Yankee boats that attempt to pass. So you see the Yankees have "got their paw in the wrong pot" this time.

5 P.M.

News has just arrived that Van Dorn sent the following answer to Farragut, commanding United States' fleet above and below Vicksburg:—

"Sir,—Your communication, under flag of truce, has been received. In answer, I beg to say that the only way you shall pass my batteries is at the mouth of the cannon.

"E. VAN DORN."

The ram Arkansas, of whose brilliant feats we reproduce some Northern accounts in another part of our issue, is still before Vicksburg.

"Guerilla conflicts are active all over the Border States;" but it must be remarked that the Confederate Government has recognized these so-called guerilla bands—that they are under Government control, and can be massed at the fitting moment into armies. The Washington Government knew what an effective force "guerilla bands" were under the able direction of General Price.

The agitation in Kentucky is great, and increasing. The determination to throw off the Federal yoke becomes daily more apparent. As a proof of the desperate efforts made by the Federals to keep their footing in the State, we cite a handbill posted in Kentucky, of which the following is a copy:—

Louisville, Kentucky, July 13, 1862.

It is ordered that every able-bodied man take arms and aid in repelling the marauders. Every man who does not join will remain in his house forty-eight hours, and be shot down if he leaves it.

J. T. BOYLE, Brigadier-General Commanding.

The citizens of Lexington and vicinity are ordered to comply strictly with the foregoing order, which will be rigidly enforced. Persons uniting with us will repair to the Court-house, where officers will be stationed to assign them positions in companies.

Those not so uniting will confine themselves to their houses from half-past two o'clock p.m.

F. P. BRASHER, Mayor and Provost Marshal.

Lexington, July 13, 1862.

The Governor has convened the Legislature to consider the military situation of Kentucky, and the late action with regard to slavery, for the purpose of providing for the safety of Kentucky institutions.

The Confederates are still pressing on the Federal army in the West. They have occupied Grand Junction evacuated by the Federals, and are in possession of the larger portion of the railroad between Memphis and Corinth. Our readers will remember the glowing terms in which General Halleck announced the opening of the railroad between these places, and what a lasting triumph it was considered by the Northern press. The evacuation of Corinth has certainly not strengthened the Federal position.

It is reported that "the Federals have routed two large bands of guerillas in Missouri." It is worthy of notice that the Federals never defeat small guerilla bands.

A Federal waggon train was attacked near Pittsburg Landing, and sixty waggons were captured containing commissary and quartermaster's stores.

A body of Confederates have entered Florence, Alabama, "burned all the warehouses used for the commissary and quartermaster's stores, and all the cotton in the vicinity. They also seized the United States Steamer Colonna, used for conveying army supplies over the shoals. They took all the money belonging to the boat, and then burned her. A small detachment of General Mitchell's army was captured, and the Confederates then proceeded down the Tennessee River to Chickasaw, Waterloo, and the vicinity of Eastfort, and burned all the warehouses which contained cotton." From this account we must conclude that the Federals are not by any means strong in that State; and that the Alabamians are determined that the invader shall not get any spoil.

General Buell's advance is reported within thirty-five miles of Chattanooga, and an engagement is expected.

The call of the Governor of Missouri for the enrolment of the whole militia of his State has caused great excitement. It is further stated that an order for drafting has been made in St. Louis, in which city the plot was discovered to hand it over to the Confederates. The Northern press says the city is full of "Secession vaga bonds," who, be it remembered, are, according to the Federal accounts of the plot, "the powerful inhabitants of the place." Large numbers of Irish have refused to be enlisted, and have appealed to the British Consul for protection. The unwillingness of the Irish to enter the Federal army is a heavy blow for the North. When the news is received further disinclination will manifest itself, for the Irish strongly sympathize with each other's views. Compelling the Irish of St. Louis to enlist, or punishing them for not doing so, is a dangerous experiment, and may breed considerable dissatisfaction on the part of the whole population. Indeed, the disinclination has already extended, for in New York two Irishmen were arrested for dissuading their countrymen from enlisting.

The recruiting goes on slowly, very slowly. Not more than 10,000 men have responded to Mr. Lincoln's call for 300,000.

The clamour for a conscription continues, and with seems impossible to carry out resort to this means it on the war. Can the Washington Government safely order a conscription? For there is a rumour that in the State of New York Philadelphia to aid the recruiting, and thirty-eight gentlemen present at once subscribed sums varying from $3000 to $100. A correspondent of the Times gives the list as follows:—

*C. Gilpin	$1,000	*W. B. Mann	$1,000
W. Welsh	1,000	Bailey and Co.	1,000
A. Friend, per do. ..	1,000	Taylor, Gillespie, and Co. ..	1,000
H. Robinson	1,000	*Whitney and Son	3,000
*H. Windsor	1,000	*Sellers and Co.	2,000
*J. T. Lewis	1,000	De Coursey and Co.	1,000
D. Haddock	1,000	J. B. Aylers	1,000
J. Ashurst	1,000	*C. Sherman and Son	1,000
*J. B. Myers	1,000	Alex. Henry	500
S. S. White	1,000	J. Graham and Co.	300
J. E. Caldwell	1,000	Dr. M'Clintock	100
*Stuart Brothers	1,000	*C. A. Walborn	300
*J. Haseltine	1,000	*T. W. Price	300
M'Kean Borie	3,000	*G. R. Smith	100
*W. H. Kern	1,000	*G. D. Vesperhill	300
*E. C. Knight and Co. ..	1,000	*H. D. Moore	200
*S. and J. M. Flanagan ..	1,000	Dr. D. James	300
N. M. Watts	1,000	*W. B. Haseltine	200
*Wellins, Coffin, and Co. ..	1,000	*Frank Haseltine	100

I have prefixed an asterisk to the names of twenty-two of the subscribers who are contractors, as well as patriots—all wealthy, most of them having acquired fortunes by this war.

Great complaints are made at Washington at the number of men absent on furlough; it is computed that these deserters number from 20,000 to 30,000. It appears that many of them enlist in new regiments for the sake of getting the bounty. These furloughs have been granted on the application of Members of Congress, who cannot refuse to grant their constituents such a trifling favour.

Having abolished the liberty of the press, the Washington Government now seeks to restrain the expression of opinion in conversation. "Several persons have been arrested in the streets of New York for speaking unfavourably of war and declaring that they could not suffer drafting."

The Nashville and Kate have arrived at a Southern port and sailed again. The former brought some pieces of artillery presented by British merchants to the Southern Confederacy.

Immediately before the prorogation of Parliament attention was called by Mr. S. Fitzgerald to the blockade of Nassau:—

Mr. S. FITZGERALD wished to direct the attention of the noble lord at the head of the Government to the proceedings of the United States' cruisers in the immediate neighbourhood of Nassau. On a former occasion it had been stated in that House that the United States' squadron were actively engaged in enforcing the blockade on the coast of the United States; but it appeared their cruisers had since been withdrawn; and they were now employed in blockading British ports. There could be no doubt, indeed, that the United States' authorities had pressed, and were pressing to the utmost, without moderation or discretion, the rights which they might possess as belligerents, and he hoped the noble lord would give the House an assurance that this matter would not escape the notice of the Government; but that, on the contrary, the most vigorous and earnest remonstrances would be made to the United States' Government on the subject. He might also take that opportunity of referring to certain proceedings adopted by the United States' authorities with respect to British goods at New York. Hitherto it had been the practice to send British goods to New York in steamers, and afterwards to forward them in American bottoms to Nassau. It now appeared that the United States' Government would not permit these goods to be exported from New York unless the owners entered into a bond that the future owners of the goods at Nassau should not ship them either to the Confederate States or to any port in communication with them. He hoped the noble lord would also give the House an assurance that this matter would be made the subject of a vigorous remonstrance to the United States' Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—The House must be aware that there is no nation more interested than the British nation in maintaining to the utmost extent belligerent rights at sea. It is an undoubted right of a belligerent to search vessels met with at sea, and if there is a reasonable ground to suppose that they are carrying contraband of war to take them into court for adjudication. When a ship is so brought for adjudication before a competent tribunal it is the right of the owners to urge in defence such circumstances as may show that the capture was illegal. Her Majesty's Government are, of course, not disposed to interfere with the proper exercise of their belligerent rights on the part of the United States. The remedy in the first instance is to be sought in the Court of Admiralty; but, at the same time, if any abusive exercise of those rights can be shown to have taken place Her Majesty's Government will take steps to make a proper representation on the subject. As to the second question, it is quite true that bonds have been required from the owners of British property at New York; but we are advised that the United States' Government have no right to exact them. It is an abusive power, and Her Majesty's Government have already made representations to the Government of the United States on the subject.

The Richmond Inquirer says:—

We are glad to hear that the statement, heretofore published in relation to the death of Lieutenant H. Sidney Wallace, of Company I, 17th Virginia Regiment, is not correct. We have since ascertained that Lieutenant Wallace was taken prisoner, in the severe engagement that took place on the Chickahominy.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 13, 1862.

Our last report closed upon a quiet steady market, with middling Orleans at 9d., and fair Dhollerah at 13½d to 13½c.

During the past week no new feature has transpired to influence the public mind, regarding the future course of our market; the demand has been languid from day to day. Spinners have bought only for their immediate wants. Exporters have operated sparingly, while speculators have acted with great caution. Our stocks of American and long-stapled cotton, however, are now in such small compass, that the action of demand upon our reduced supply has served farther to considerably enhance prices.

On Thursday the market was very quiet, with sales of 4000 bales. On Friday, the business reached a similar amount, without change. On Saturday a rather stronger feeling was perceptible, but it only resulted in the sale of 5000. The Persia's news were to hand in the morning, but her dates were only one day later than those previously received, and contained no items of general interest. On Monday the market again opened quietly, but still with a hardening tendency in the better grades of American, the sales reaching 4000. Yesterday the Manchester market was firm, at a slight advance in yarns; for goods, however, there was very little demand, the extreme firmness of holders, and their indifference to sell, alone maintained prices.

Foreign Markets, in general, respond but feebly to any symptoms of improvement in Manchester, and remain surfeited with the enormous shipments of goods, forced upon them previous to this year. Nine months now of half-time, in Lancashire, has failed to produce a healthy tone in Manchester, and create a wholesome consumptive demand either at home or abroad. From this it is apparent that the manufacturers' position at the beginning of the year was essentially false; they had been enormously overproducing, and the re-adjustment which is now taking place between supply and demand, through curtailment of consumption, must have resulted apart from the American war—the process might have been less violent and more protracted, but none the less sure. It now seems probable that a healthy demand will, before long, spring up in Manchester, and a much higher range of prices be established. The India Markets appear at last to have taken a decided turn; speculators had been operating more freely, a considerable advance had been established; and much higher prices were looked for before long.

To-day the North America's accounts are to hand, reporting little change in the attitude of the combatants on the James River. McClellan's position is becoming daily more critical, and fears are still entertained for his safety. A rumour, which is not, however, credited, speaks of the Mobile blockade being broken by ten Confederate gunboats, arrived from Europe. Cotton had recovered, in New York, from the depressed sales of the previous week, and was again quoted 49 to 50 cents. for Middling Uplands. Exchange has declined to 125 to 126, and gold to 15 per cent. premium.

It was also generally supposed that drafting would commence about the middle of August. The tenor of the news is considered in favour of our market; the advance in cotton dissipates the idea of large quantities arriving at New York. The guerilla bands had succeeded in intercepting supplies in Tennessee, and had burned what was likely to fall into enemies' hands. There are still no signs of a peaceful or conciliatory spirit amongst the Northern people; on the contrary, they appear bent on resorting to conscription to supply the material, wherewith to carry on this unnatural war to the bitter end.

Our market, under these accounts, was stronger in tone, and was further improved by receipt of a private telegram from India, reporting an enormous advance in cotton, variously stated from 3d. to 4d. per pound, and 3s. per piece on goods; this, thought not wholly credited, brought in speculators this afternoon, and prices of long-stapled cotton are 1s. 4d. dearer, with sales of 6000 bales, leaving our quotations 19½d. for Middling Orleans, 19½d. for Mobile's, 19½d. for Bowed, 13½d. to 3d. for fair Dhollerah and Omrawuttee, 14½d. for Broach, and 16½d. to 17 for Sawginned Dharwar.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, Aug. 12.

Since our last report our market has been very quiet; very little business having been done in either cloth or yarn, nevertheless, where actual business was effected rather higher prices were obtained. Yarns spun from American cotton, and suitable for continental shipment, are becoming extremely scarce, so much so that the few holders of this class of material are careless about selling at the present quotations, as they feel themselves safe in holding for much higher figures. Some of the clients of our German houses, who have not hitherto bought any yarns spun from Surat cotton, are now sending orders for an assortment of about twenty to thirty bundles of a number, just to try this class of yarn; but as there is very little yarn in stock which is not spun from Surats, and the little that is being spun at present being made from Surats almost entirely, our German friends will be compelled to take what they can get very shortly, if they intend to keep their looms at work. Twist and pin-cops for the home trade are very firm in price, the Bolton spinnings being rather higher than last week, as the demand for these finer numbers continues good.

Cloth of all kinds continues to be held for extreme rates, although very little business has been done during the week. To-day our market has been again very dull, in both cloth and yarn, notwithstanding which prices are exceedingly firm, in most instances at last Tuesday's quotations.

In yarns, the principal demand has been for mule and water twist in bundles, spun from American cotton; in response to which very little, if any, has been offered by spinners.

Home trade manufacturers have bought scarcely anything in the shape of yarns to-day, as, in most cases, they are working up the material which has not already been put into the hands of their agents for resale.

Cloth keeps very firm at last week's quotations, with the exception of Madapollams, and 9-8, 16 by 16, and 17 by 17, printers, which may be quoted 3d. per piece higher.

(From the St. Louis Republican.)

We could hardly give credence to the above story, but are told that it is even worse than this correspondent relates. The conduct of some of these men was the worst a licentious and brutal soldiery could inflict upon defenceless women; so vile, indeed, that an officer of the army, who regards the honour of his cloth, has determined to lay the matter before the Government. We do not doubt that the men who have committed the horrible crimes alleged, as well as those who winked at it, will meet with swift and retributive justice. The honour of the army calls for it and humanity demands it.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

Extract from a Letter from New Orleans, of July 15, containing Butler's last order:—

You would be sorry for us, at the same time aimed at the orders issued; our last was, "that not more than three persons must be seen together in the streets."

In answer to a question as to the lawfulness of the Guerilla Service, the Confederate Secretary of War has made the following reply:—

Partisan Rangers are a part of the provisional army of the Confederate States, subject to all the regulations adopted for its government, and entitled to the same protection as prisoners of war. Partisan Rangers are in no respect different from troops of the line, except that they are not brigaded, and are employed oftener on detached service. They require stricter discipline than other troops to make them efficient; and without discipline they become a terror to their friends, and are contemptible in the eyes of the enemy. With reference to your inquiry as to the protection which the Government will extend to private citizens taken in hostile acts against the enemy, it is not easy to lay down a general rule. War, as conducted by civilized nations, is usually a contest between the respective Governments of the belligerents, and private individuals remaining quietly at home are respected in their rights of person and property. In return for this privilege they are expected to take no part in hostilities, unless called on by their Government. If, however, in violation of this usage, private citizens of Missouri should be oppressed and maltreated by the public enemy, they have unquestionably a right to take up arms in their own defence; and if captured and confined by the enemy, under such circumstances they are entitled, as citizens of the Confederate States, to all the protection which that Government can afford, and among the measures to which it may be useful to resort is that of the lex talionis."

The Confederate Secretary of War has issued the following General Order in reference to the exploit of the ram Arkansas:

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 51.

War Department,
Adjutant and Inspector General's Office,
Richmond, July 22, 1862.

The successful defence of Vicksburg against the mortar fleet of the enemy by Major-General Van Dorn and the officers and men under his command entitles them to the gratitude of the country, the thanks of the Government, and the admiration of the army. By their gallantry and good conduct they have not only saved the city entrusted to them, but they have shown that bombardments of cities, if bravely resisted, achieve nothing for the enemy, and only serve to unveil his malice and the hypocrisy of his pretended wish to restore the Union. The world now sees that his mission is one of destruction, not restoration.

Lieutenant Brown and the officers and crew of the Confederate steamer Arkansas, by their heroic attack upon the Federal fleet before Vicksburg, equalled the highest recorded examples of courage and skill. They prove that the navy, when it regains its proper element will be one of the chief bulwarks of national defence, and that it is entitled to a high place in the confidence and affection of the country.

By command of the Secretary of War,
S. COOPER,
Adjutant and Inspector General.

BATTLE OF GAINES'S MILLS.

COLLATED FROM RICHMOND PAPERS.

A line due north from Richmond would strike the Chickahominy near the Meadow Bridges, about six miles distant, whilst another line due east would intersect the same stream about eight miles from the city. This line is nearly represented by the York River Railroad. Between Meadow Bridges and the latter railroad, the distance, we believe, along the Chickahominy on the north side, is about ten miles. Two miles east of Meadow Bridges is the Mechanicsville turnpike, further on Beaver Dam Creek, emptying into the Chickahominy, then the New Bridge road, on which Coal Harbour is located, and then Powhite Creek, the latter being two or three miles above the railroad crossing. The lines of the Yankee army extended across the Chickahominy near this point. South of the railroad is the Williamsburg stage road, and connecting the latter with the New Bridge road is the Nine Mile road. South of Williamsburg road is the Charles City road.

When, on Thursday, General A. P. Hill had steadily driven the enemy from Meadow Bridge, and had taken up the line of march towards Mechanicsville and the road, evening had far advanced, and it was supposed that a halt would take place. General Kipley, however, with the 44th and 48th Georgia, and 2nd and 3rd North Carolina, made an attack upon the Yankee fortifications at Ellyson's Mills, in which the 44th Georgia and 3rd North Carolina suffered extremely, and did not succeed in taking them, owing to the impracticable nature of the ground. Operations were then suspended on our side, but the enemy kept up a deafening roar of artillery till late in the night.

Longstreet's forces had meanwhile crossed and marched parallel with the Chickahominy. The brigades of Generals Featherstone and Pryor were in advance, and proceeding some distance, halted for the night. About midnight, Featherstone received orders to change his position, and to occupy a skirt of wood near Beaver Dam Creek, and facing the Federal batteries. He did so, and the men were seated only asleep, when, twilight approaching, the enemy discovered the bivouac, and immediately commenced to shell it vigorously. The men, thus unceremoniously aroused, seized their muskets and fell in, and General Featherstone, just arrived from headquarters, led them to storm the position—mounting ten guns, and supported by two or three brigades. Sharp fighting now commenced on all sides, when General Pryor sent for assistance, and Wilcox soon came upon the ground. To cover the infantry attack, and draw off the artillery fire, the 3rd Richmond Howitzers, some pieces of the Donaldsonville and Thomas Artillery, moved up and played upon the enemy's position magnificently. Having engaged the enemy for a long time, and finding it impossible to cross the creek without a bridge, one was constructed by some of the 19th Mississippi and 14th Louisiana, under fire, when the whole force advanced and closed with the enemy, driving them in great confusion from the field. The difficulties of attack at this position were such that it is impossible to give a correct idea without maps, the battery being on a high hill, flanked by rifle pits, a deep creek at the foot of the hill, and covered with a thick hedge.

The attack of our men on this position was impetuous and daring, but the loss was great, for the foe were so screened by their position it was impossible to get at them properly. Their loss was severe. General Featherstone's Adjutant-General, George P. Foote, was shot while riding far in advance of the 12th Mississippi, and although he failed to return, he did not, and was quickly singled out and mortally wounded. His body was shortly afterwards found despoiled—watch, money, and sword gone. The 12th Mississippi went out in the morning with 397 men; lost in this engagement twelve killed, sixty-eight wounded, and nine missing; the regiment was commanded by Major W. H. Lilly, who was wounded leading a charge—the colonel being absent and sick, and the Lieutenant-Colonel wounded. The 19th Mississippi went into action with 521 men—had thirty-one killed, and 150 wounded. The 2nd Mississippi Battalion, Colonel Taylor, went into action with 234 men, and had thirty killed and wounded. The loss of Pryor's Brigade we have not learned; but hear that the 14th Louisiana, and the remnant of St. Paul's Battalion suffered severely—Wilcox, being in support, did not lose many. The Generals speak in high terms of the execution of our field pieces in this attack, the 3rd Richmond Howitzers, some of the Donaldsonville and Thomas Artillery, having caused great destruction among the enemy, and with slight loss to themselves. The rapidity of their fire quite astonished the Yankees, and could be distinctly heard over all our city, long before the dawn had fairly broken.

While Featherstone, Pryor, and Wilcox were thus successfully engaging the enemy on the right of our advance, General Maxey Gregg and his brigade were also hard at work, and successfully stormed the strong position of Ellyson's Mills, and took up the line of march on the left. They did not advance on the mills by the road, as had been done on Friday evening by Ripley, but simply made a feint in that direction, crossed the main body higher up the creek, took the redoubts and rifle pits in flank, carried them with the bayonet, pushed through the camps, and followed the road towards Gaines's Mills, whither the enemy were retreating.

From prisoners captured at both positions—who proved to be of the Valley army—it was ascertained that we might expect stout resistance at Gaines's Mills, since three or four whole divisions were strongly encamped there, McClellan commanding in person, with Major-Generals McCall, Porter, Sedgewick, and others—their estimated force being not less than thirty odd thousand men. As our three columns moved by parallel lines, we followed and conversed with prisoners, who informed us that their loss on Friday at Meadow Bridge, Mechanicsville, and Ellyson's Mills had been fearful, and that the whole night had been occupied in burial. The Federals carry off all their killed and wounded as fast as shot, and we only discover those who fall and are left at the actual moment of retreat. This information we believe to be correct.

The heads of our three columns having reached Walker Hogan's farm, north bank of the Chickahominy, about nine miles north-east of Richmond, all came to a halt, and Generals Lee and Longstreet took up quarters in the house and made dispositions for a further advance towards Gaines's Mills, distant about one mile through the woods. Featherstone's brigade having suffered much in the morning, Wilcox led, being followed by Pryor and Featherstone's reserve. The composition of Wilcox's command is mostly Alabamians; Pryor has the 14th Louisiana, St. Paul's Battalion, 3rd Virginia, and one other regiment; Featherstone has the 19th and 12th Mississippi Battalion.

Emerging from the woods, the road leads to the left and then to the right round Gaines's house, when the whole country, for the area of some two miles, is an open, unbroken succession of undulating hills. Standing at the north door of Gaines's house the whole country to the right, for the distance of one mile, is a gradual slope towards a creek, through which the main road runs up an open hill and then winds to the right. In front, to the left are orchards and gullies, running gradually to a deep creek. Directly in front, for the distance of a mile, the ground is almost table land, suddenly dipping to the deep creek mentioned above, being faced by a timbered covered hill fronting all the table land. Beyond this timber covered hill the country is again open, and a perfect plateau, a farm-house and out-houses occupying the centre, the main road mentioned winding to the right and through all the Federal camps. To the left and rear of the second mentioned farm a road comes in upon the flat lands adjoining the main road mentioned. Thus, to recapitulate, except the deep creek and timber-covered hill beyond it, the whole country, as seen from the north door of Gaines's house, is unbroken, open, undulating, and table land, the right forming a descent to the wood-covered creek, the left being dips and gullies, with dense timber still farther to the left; the front being for the most part table land. These particulars of the position are as correct, perhaps, as can be mentioned; but without a map it will always be difficult to understand the topography of this hard fought and victorious field of Gaines's Mills.

But to the south-east of Gaines's house is a large tract of timber, commanding all advances upon the main road, and in this McClellan and McCall had posted a large body of skirmishers, with artillery, to annoy our flank and rear when advancing on their camp on the high grounds, if we did so by the main road or over the table lands to the north.

It now being three p.m., and the head of our column in view of the Federal camps, General Pryor was sent forward with his brigade, to drive away the heavy mass of skirmishers posted to our rear to annoy the advance. This being accomplished with great success, and with little loss to us, Pryor returned and awaited orders. Meanwhile the Federals, from their camps and several positions on the high grounds, swept the whole face of the country with their numerous artillery, which would have annihilated our entire force if not screened in the dips of the land and in gullies to our left. Advancing cautiously but rapidly in the skirt of the woods and in the dips to the left, Wilcox and Pryor deployed their men into line of battle—Featherstone being in the rear—and suddenly appearing on the plateau facing the timber-covered hill, rushed down into the wide gully, crested it, clambered over all the felled timber, stormed the timber breastworks beyond it, and began the ascent of the hill, under a terrific fire of sharpshooters and an incessant discharge of grape and canister from pieces posted on the brow of the hill, and from batteries in their camps to the right on the high flat lands. Such a position was never stormed before.

In descending into the deep creek, the infantry and artillery fire that assailed the three brigades was the most terrific on record. Twenty-six pieces were thundering at them, and a per-first hail storm of lead fell thick and fast around them. One of Wilcox's regiments wavered; down the General rushed, furiously, sword in hand, and threatened to behead the first man that hesitated; Pryor steadily advanced, but slowly; and by the time that the three brigades had stormed the position, passed up the hill through timber, and over felled trees, Featherstone was far in advance. Quickly the Federals withdrew their pieces, and took up a fresh position to assail the three brigades advancing in perfect line of battle from the woods and upon the plateau. Officers had no horses, all were shot; brigadiers marched on foot, sword in hand; regiments were commanded by captains, and companies by sergeants, yet onward they rushed, with yells and colours flying, and backward, still backward, fell the Federals, their men tumbling every moment in scores. But what a sight met the eyes of these three gallant brigades! In front stood Federal camps, stretching to the north-east for miles! Drawn up in line of battle were more than three full divisions, commanded by McCall, Porter, Sedgewick, &c.; banners darkened the air; artillery vomited forth incessant volleys of grape, canister and shell; heavy masses were moving on our left through the woods to flank us! Yet onward came Wilcox to the right, Pryor to the left, and Featherstone in the centre—one grand, matchless line of battle, almost consumed by exploits of the day, yet onward they advanced to the heart of the Federal position, and when the enemy had fairly succeeded in almost flanking us on the left, great commotion is heard in the woods! Volleys upon volleys are heard in rapid succession, which are recognized and cheered by our men. "It is Jackson!" they shout, "on their right and rear!"

Yes, two or three brigades of Jackson's army have flanked the enemy, and are getting in the rear! Now, the fighting was bitter and terrific. Worked up to madness, Wilcox, Featherstone and Pryor dash forward at a run, and drive the enemy with irresistible fury—to our left emerge Hood's Texan Brigade, Whiting's comes after, and Pender follows! The line is now complete, and "forward" rings from one end of the line to the other, and the Yankees, over 30,000 strong, begin to retreat! Wheeling their artillery from the front, the Federals turn part of it to break our left, and save their retreat. The very earth shakes at the roar! Not one piece of ours has yet opened! all has been done with bullet and bayonet, and onward press our troops through camps upon camps, capturing guns, stores, arms, clothing, &c. Yet, like bloodhounds on the trail, the six brigades sweep everything before them, presenting an unbroken, solid front, and closing in upon the enemy, keep up an incessant succession of volleys upon their confused masses, and unerringly slaughtering them by hundreds and thousands!

But "where is Jackson?" asks all. He has travelled fast and is heading the retreating foe, and as night closes in, all is anxiety for intelligence from him. 'Tis now about seven p.m., and just as the rout of the enemy is complete—just as the last volleys are sounding in the enemy's rear, the distant and rapid discharges of cannon tell that Jackson has fallen upon the retreating column, broken it, and captured 3,000 prisoners! Far in the night, his insatiable troops hang upon the enemy, and for miles upon miles are dead, wounded, prisoners, waggon, cannon, &c., scattered in inextricable confusion upon the road. Thus, for four hours, did our inferior force, unaided by a single piece of artillery, withstand over 30,000 of the enemy, assisted by twenty-six pieces of artillery!

In total, we captured many prisoners and thirty pieces of artillery, up to five p.m. Friday, and in the Battle of Gaines's Mills, captured twenty-six field pieces, 15,000 stand of arms, six stand of colours, three Generals—Reynolds, Sanders, and Rankin—and over 4,000 prisoners including dozens of officers of every grade—from colonel to lieutenants of the line.

Money was found quite abundantly about the slain. Some men, in interring the dead, often searched the pockets, &c., one man finding not less than $150 in gold; another fished out of some old clothes not less than $500; another $1000 in Federal notes. Watches, both gold and silver, were found among the spoils, one lucky individual having not less than six chronometers ticking in his pocket at one time. As a general thing, more money was found upon the dead on the field than on any other of which we have heard.

Clothing in abundance was scattered about, and immense piles of new uniforms were found untouched. Our men seemed to take great delight in assuming Federal officers' uniforms, and strutted about serio-comically, much to the amusement of dusty, powder-begrimed youths, who sat idling and smoking in the shade. Every conceivable article of clothing was found in these division camps, and came quite apropos to our needy soldiers, scores of whom took a cold bath and changed old for new underclothing, many articles being of costly material and quite unique.

The amount of ammunition found was considerable, and proved of very superior quality and manufacture. The exact amount captured we have not yet ascertained, but from the immense piles of boxes scattered through the camps, we conjecture that the enemy had laid in quite an unusual supply, expecting to use it, doubtless, upon our devoted men, and so they would, did our troops stand, as they do, at "long taw," and not come to "close quarters."

The cannon and arms captured in this battle were numerous and of very superior workmanship. The twenty-six pieces were the most beautiful we have ever seen, while immense piles of guns could be seen on every hand—many scarcely having the manufacturer's "finish" even tarnished. The enemy seemed quite willing to throw them away on the slightest pretext, dozens being found with loads still undischarged. The number of small arms captured, we understand, was not less than 15,000, of every calibre and every make.

Among the many heroic spirits who sacrificed their lives on the altar of our country in the dreadful, but glorious struggle of "Gaines's Mills," on Friday, June 27, we would particularly mention the name of the immortal Wheat, of Wheat's Battalion—the master spirit of the heroic band, who, from the dawn of our struggle until the present, has always been found in the vanguard battling manfully for our lives, liberties, and homes. At Manassas, the name of Wheat became historical in our annals, for as long as that victory shall remain known to fame, so long will the name of Robert Wheat be coupled with it. Despising petty intrigue, Colonel Wheat desired nothing more than to secure his own beloved South, and to be in active service was his chief delight. Joining Jackson in the Valley, and winning imperishable fame, this gallant man fought all through that arduous but all glorious campaign, and while leading the small remnant of his once numerous battalion to the charge, at Gaines's Mills, was mortally shot in the head. "Bury me on the field, boys," said he, and placidly expired. May he rest in peace.

It is impossible to get correct returns of the killed and wounded. Our loss is probably not over 2000 at the highest calculation. The Federal loss is estimated at 20,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners, if not more. The following items we have from Featherstone's Brigade:—

The casualties in the 12th Regiment, Mississippi Volunteers, Featherstone's Brigade, Longstreet's Division, commanded by Major W. H. Lilly, are as follows:—Major W. H. Lilly, wounded early in the morning's action, while leading the regiment in the first charge. In the morning engagement this regiment lost 12 killed, 368 wounded, and 9 missing. The number taken into the field, officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, 397. In the evening engagement (Captain S. B. Thomas commanding regiment) the loss was 6 killed, 38 wounded, and 18 missing. Number of officers and privates taken into battle, 308. The regiment thus lost 153 killed, wounded, and missing, during the day, out of 397 men.

The above is as near correct as it is possible to ascertain, as several reported missing have been found killed, and others wounded.

The 19th Mississippi Volunteers lost 31 killed and 150 wounded, out of 521 that went into action in the morning.

A Federal lieutenant, who was captured yesterday morning and brought to the head-quarters of General Lee, reports that two entire regiments had deserted during the morning.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, July 29.

There is very little change in Wall-street; the utmost uneasiness prevails, and before another month passes the elements now at work will produce some troublesome times. A Federal success could not galvanize old-fashioned life into operations, while a reverse would be a death-blow to all transactions.

In the non-seceding States, in ordinary times, the amount of specie and bank-notes used as currency is estimated at $350,000,000. Mr. Chase has supplied already $150,000,000 of irredeemable notes, and is about issuing $150,000,000 additional, and $60,000,000 Treasury "skin-plasters," warranted not to stick or stop the circulation. Commercial matters are also in a very awkward position, and we are tumbling back to rudeness and barbarism; credit is fast disappearing, or rather, the Government is monopolizing it, for the contractors do not get loans on their own names, but on the Stock Board quotations of the Federal scrip, which they give as collateral security. Even this cannot last much longer.

There is not a single statesman in power in the North; it is therefore believed that there will be no settlement of the difficulties with the South, but that the war will come to a ragged termination by the falling to pieces of the Washington Government. Lincoln is both dishonest and brainless, and his Cabinet is a scene of discord. Cameron was shrewd in getting out of the way; he will be followed by others in a non-official capacity. The Democrats in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Western States are in favour of peace, and are now making gigantic strides towards resuming power. The principal elections do not take place until October, yet there is considerable animation thus early.

The exports of gold since January 1, have been $40,000,000, a sum just equal to the importations of the precious metals from Europe last year. If this has caused an advance of 20 per cent., what may be expected when the reserve is touched? The sales of bonds and stocks on account of foreign holders are estimated at $40,000,000, only a small portion of which amount has yet been remitted for.

PARIS, August 13.

Our political world is in a rather excited state just now. It was asserted some time ago that the Emperor would deliver a speech on August 15, which would throw great light on many questions, at present so obscure. But from more recent indications, it appears that the report was unfounded. We have still to look upon La Constitutionnel, La Patrie, and more especially La France, to endeavour to guide ourselves, and form an opinion in the midst of the official complete darkness.

The creation of the new daily journal, La France, has caused some comment and excited great attention. Under the present French law, it is not an easy matter to get up a new political paper. It requires a considerable capital, and the editor must besides, especially the chief editor, be personally approved of by the Minister. M. le Comte A. de la Guéronnière, senator, has been the Director of the Press, and, of course, had no difficulty in getting permission to start his journal. He has been called, with justice, the political Lamartine—about the greatest praise that can be bestowed on a gentleman—uniting as he does the grandest talent, the most admirable honesty, to what was M. de Lamartine's one deficiency—statesmanship. He not only is a man of remarkable talent, but enjoys the friendship and high confidence of the Chief of the nation. In fact, everybody knows that in some of his most remarkable pamphlets he has been but the exponent of Napoleon the Third's political views. I gave you in one of my last letters the names of some of the members of the Directing Board of La France, and M. de la Guéronnière has secured the aid of several of the best Paris periodical writers. The first number contained an exposé of the Imperial policy at home and abroad. "L'Empire conservateur et libéral" is the definition given of the present French policy. About England, it is remarked that "the less England and France shall be allies, the more they will be friends." "England's sympathy was Austrian before Magenta, and has been Garibaldian ever since Solferino." Speaking of the Italian question, "The reconciliation of Victor Emmanuel's Government with Europe strengthens it at Milan, and brings him nearer to Venice, but keeps him further from Rome." And again: "As the French army went to Rome from a sense of duty, so it will remain there from a sense of honour." I think M. de la Guéronnière quite right on this point. The idea of such a bombastic fellow as Garibaldi scattering away an Imperial corps d'occupation from Rome would provoke merriment, if it were not such a sad reflection on human absurdity.

The paragraph on the Eastern question concludes thus:—

The massacres in Syria, the risings in Servia against provoking tyranny, the conflict raging in Montenegro, the no longer to be restrained impatience of all the populations under the Mussulman yoke, are a warning to Europe that the time has come when her legitimate intervention has to bring forward the indispensable settlement of one of the greatest interests of the whole world.

It is a necessity to France, we repeat, not to confine her action in that great movement to one exclusively in common with England. And it is for that reason that the policy of France has to bring out such a situation as would make the great Continental Powers willing to act in concert with her, and would enable her to find allies among the very ones whom some might have supposed likely to oppose her.

Your readers have already been able to read from other sources the confirmation of the intelligence I transmitted to you, that Earl Russell's assertions of a most perfect accord between France and England on American affairs, do not appear to be sustained by facts. It is well known here now that the hesitating policy of the British Cabinet is the only reason which prevents, (and has been preventing for a long time) France from immediately acceding to the demand of recognition from the Southern Confederacy; and the only construction to be put on your Foreign Secretary's equivocal words that may reconcile them with history, is that the French Government agrees with that of England just thus far, that it will not act in contradiction with your own Government. But as regards their respective feelings on the subject, the one's opinion is immediate recognition, whilst the other's is, at least, postponement.

With numerous causes of political anxiety, Paris is rather bare of news. The Emperor has arrived, and will pass a grand review of the army and the National Guard to-morrow. The Bourse is to be closed up to-morrow and on Friday. The French Funds do not seem to have been depressed on account of the Italian imbroglio. Some favourable reports have arrived from Mexico, and it appears that the Mexicans have been worsted again in one or two skirmishes. The reinforcements sent are on a more and more important scale. It will be interesting to hear of the voyage of the iron-plated frigate La Normandie across the Atlantic. She is the first cuirassé man-of-war performing such a voyage. She carries the flag of Vice-Admiral Jurieu de la Gravière, and is reported to have arrived, after a very successful passage, at Funchal (Madeira.)

The following has some interest, as it shows the tone of one of the highest dignitaries of the French Church addressing his clergy. The Archbishop of Paris, in sending to the curates of his diocese the circular of the Minister of Public Worship, on the subject of the Emperor's fete, wrote to them thus:—

Monsieur le Curé.—The following is the letter which the Minister of Public Worship has sent to me on the subject of the grand solemnity of the 15th. The same religious ideas and sentiments which on former occasions inspired the hon. minister, possessing the confidence of His Majesty, and speaking in the name of the august Sovereign of France, are to be again found in the present communication. On our side, Monsieur le Curé, the eagerness to respond to it will be the same. In addressing our homage to the Queen of Heaven, patroness of France, and more particularly of this diocese, we will confide to her our most ardent prayers that France may never cease to be the object of her powerful protection. We will pray for the Emperor, who constantly watches over our destinies; for the Empress, associated in the constant solicitudes of the government of the Empire; and for the Prince Imperial, who grows up near that glorious throne, which he is one day to ascend. She whom the Church teaches us to call the Mother of Mercy, our life and our hope, will be propitious to our supplications, and will abundantly obtain for us, with the heavenly blessing, the grace to make the best and most holy use of it. For the Te Deum, which is to be sung with Domine Salvemur after the grand mass, nothing will be changed in the arrangement followed in preceding years.—Accept, &c., F.N., Cardinal Archbishop of Paris.

Again, I do not think that the Emperor is going to abandon the defence of the Head of the Catholic Church, and give up Rome to Garibaldi, Mazzini, and the like.

Next week there probably will be some interesting facts to transmit to you from the South of Italy; but we are most anxious to hear from America. We can expect, in the present condition of affairs, nothing but news favourable to the Confederates. McClellan's and Halleck's united wisdom cannot help the Federal army out of a ridiculous position but by a dishonourable evacuation. Pope barks too much—he can't bite. I expect that Tennessee is now clear of the Federals, and Kentucky will be so before long, if the "old Kentucks" are the same fighting fellows as I knew them some years ago. The Northern Government is falling to pieces. In fact, I do not see any use for it. If I am not very much mistaken, there will be no more Washington Governments after a little while, and no more New York commerce. "Serve them right."

MR. SEWARD AND EARL RUSSELL.

The following correspondence has just been issued. We shall comment on it in our next number.

No. 1.

MR. ADAMS TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received June 21.)
Legation of the United States, London, June 20, 1862.
My Lord,—I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a copy of the despatch from the Secretary of State to me of the 28th ult., which I desired to read to you in my interview of yesterday, but which I found I had accidentally left at home.
Renewing, &c., CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

Enclosure in No. 1.

MR. SEWARD TO MR. ADAMS.

Washington, May 28, 1862.

Sir,—Your despatch of the 8th of May has been received. There is a statement in the public journals that thirty vessels which had left British ports with a common design to run our blockade, have gathered at Nassau, and that they are now remaining there awaiting the relaxation of the blockade at some of the Southern ports which the President has permitted to take place on the 1st of June, preferring to avail themselves of that lawful privilege rather than persevere in their prohibited operations. I think, therefore, that we may congratulate ourselves upon having advanced to a new stage in our intercourse with maritime Powers affecting the present troubles in the United States, a stage at which motives of sympathy in foreign countries with the insurgents, derived from the pressure of the blockade, will disappear.

This stage is also marked by another improvement of the case—namely, the withdrawal from the ocean of the pirates who have occasionally sought shelter and protection in friendly ports while committing depredations on American commerce.

Under the President's instructions I desire to improve the position thus obtained, to confer, if our representatives abroad shall think it discreet, with the friendly nations upon the prospects of the war and their future course in regard to it.

By way of introduction, I beg to recall to your recollection the facts that at the earliest proper moment I set forth most distinctly the opinions of this Government that the mutual interest, present and permanent, of all maritime nations, including this country, require the preservation of harmonious relations between them, and that the same interests demand that, so far as possible, peace shall prevail throughout the world, and especially in the United States, and upon the American continent.

In explanation of these views, I set forth the opinion that the industrial systems of Western Europe and the United States, including their agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, are, in some respects, to be regarded less as distinct national systems than as one general combination of agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial agencies, in which a jar in one country necessarily produces disturbance in all others, so that a serious disorganization of the machinery employed in production here cannot fail to result in derangement, probably in disaster, everywhere abroad.

There are now some painful evidences that these speculations were not unsound. There is distress among the peasantry of Ireland, in the manufacturing towns of Belgium, and the vine-presses and silk-looms in some parts of France seem to be coming to a dead stand. All the sufferers—I will not stop to inquire how justly—trace their misfortunes to the civil war of the United States. It is manifest that what the European nations want is an end of that war as speedily, and leaving the industrial system of this country as little disorganized as possible. It would seem impossible for any considerate person to doubt that this is the very consummation which the Government of the United States must want even more than it can be desired by the European States. This Government has expressed that want earnestly, decidedly, sometimes, perhaps, even impatiently. Nevertheless, the war has continued a whole year, against the wishes of Europe as well as of America. A new campaign is even beginning. In order to determine whether it is likely to reach the desired end, it will not be unprofitable to consider the causes of its prolongation to the present period. This Government at the beginning assumed, and it has constantly insisted, that the Union could, must, and should be preserved. On the other hand, the European nations, when they saw the storm burst upon the country, either doubted, or actually disbelieved the possibility of that great salvation. Europe had but a subordinate and indirect interest in the great problem, and it supposed that if the United States could be only convinced that the Union could not in the end be preserved, they would at once forego the contest, and consent to a national dissolution, which it was erroneously thought would be followed by peace, while we knew that it would only be the beginning of endless war. Thus European opinion has practically favoured the insurgents, and encouraged them with ephemeral sympathies and unreal expectations of foreign intervention, and has thus protracted the war to the present time.

Certainly this Government and the American people are even more confident of the preservation of the Union now than they were a year ago, and are, therefore, even less likely now than they were then to accept peace, with the inconceivable pains and perils of dissolution. Can it be presumptuous, then, for us to ask European statesmen to review, in the light of the events of the war, the opinion which they formed at so early a stage of it, that the opinion itself might, perhaps, properly be deemed a prejudice?

Of course, in such a review, the observer would not overlook the contrast between the position which the Federal Government held a year ago and its present situation. Then it had been practically expelled, with all its authorities, civil, military, and naval, from every State south of the Potomac, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, while it was held in close siege in this capital, cut off from communication with even the States which had remained loyal. Now, it has virtually retaken all the positions it so early lost on the seaboard; it possesses the Mississippi and all the other great natural highways, and has forced the insurgents to battle in the most inaccessible part of the insurrectionary district. The forces and the resources of the Government are unexhausted and increasing. Those of the insurgents are diminished and becoming nearly exhausted.

No one, either here or in Europe, now contests these simple facts. The only argument opposed to them is, that the insurgents have determined not to acknowledge the authority of the Union. The evidence of this is a certain resolute and defiant tone maintained by their organ.

Certainly, so long as the insurgents have any hope of ultimate success they could not be expected to discontinue otherwise than in just such a tone, nor will they fail to cherish such a hope so long as they find a willingness to meet it with sympathy in Europe. The very last advices which came from that quarter previous to the arrival there of the news of the fall of New Orleans and Norfolk were full of speculations about some newly-conceived form of intervention.

But it must be remembered that the insurgents are men, and that they may reasonably be expected to speak and to act like other belligerent factions under similar conditions. So, also, being men, and subject to the laws which determine the economy of society, they must in all cases conform themselves, however unwillingly, to the circumstances by which they are surrounded. They cannot, more than other masses of men, determine for themselves, under one state of circumstances what they will do under a different one. A writer upon war advises brave men never to nail their colours to the staff, remarking that if they shall be able, and find it desirable, they can maintain it there without nailing, while it will be more convenient to lower it if they shall find themselves unable or no longer desirous to keep it flying. But, speaking practically what has been the result thus far in the present case? Has disloyalty been found an indomitable sentiment in this war? It pervaded even this capital and this district at the beginning of the strife. It no longer exists here. It divided Maryland, and provoked conflict there. The Union is now as strong in that State as in any one of the always loyal States. It committed Missouri to the pretended new Confederacy. Missouri is now active and earnest amongst the loyal States. It placed Kentucky in an attitude of neutrality; but Kentucky is to-day firm, resolute, and even self-devoted to the Union. In other regions where disloyalty was more general, such as Eastern Virginia, Tennessee, and Louisiana, and North Carolina, acquiescence under the Federal authorities has promptly followed their appearance there, and the preliminary steps are taken for the restoration of the laws of the Union. It is a simple fact that loyalty reappears everywhere just so fast as the successes of the Government are deemed sufficient to afford a guaranty for reliance upon its protection. The dis-Unionists, even in their strongest holds are not a people, but only a faction, surpassing the loyal in numbers, and silencing them by terrors and severities in many places; but nevertheless too few and feeble to prevent the return of any district or any State to the Union, in the presence and under the protection of the Federal authorities.

The President asks foreign nations to consider that we are only at the end of one year now, and yet the whole effective mass of the insurrectionary region has been brought into the field by conscription. The credit of the revolution is dead before the first dollar has been raised by taxation to support it, and the territory which must bear taxation is at once reduced to the narrowest limits, and is exhausted of its wealth and supplies.

The power of a losing faction under any circumstances must continually grow less. But that of the dis-Unionists is abating under the operation of a cause peculiar to themselves, which it is now my duty to bring forward—I mean the practice of African slavery.

I am aware that in regard to this point I am opening a subject which was early interdicted in this correspondence. The reason for the interdiction, and the reason for the departure from it are, however, equally obvious. It was properly left out of view so long as might be reasonably hoped that by the practice of magnanimity this Government might cover the weakness of the insurgents without encouraging them to persevere in their treasonable conspiracy against the Union. They have protracted the war a year, notwithstanding this forbearance of the Government, and yet they persist in invoking foreign arms to end a domestic strife, while they have forced slavery into such prominence that it cannot be overlooked.

The region where the insurrection still remains flagrant embraces all or parts of several States, with a white population of 4,500,000, and a negro population of 2,500,000, chiefly slaves. It is thus seen to be a war between two parties of the white race, not only in the presence, but in the very midst, of the enslaved negro race.

It is notorious—we could not conceal the fact if we would—that the dispute between them arose out of questions in which the negro race have a deep and lasting interest, and that their sympathies, wishes, and interests naturally, necessarily, inevitably fall on the side of the Union. Such a civil war between two parties of the white race, in such a place, and under such circumstances, could not be expected to continue long before the negro race would begin to manifest some sensibility, and some excitement. We have arrived at that stage already. Everywhere the American General receives his most useful and reliable information from the negro, who hails his coming as a harbinger of freedom. Wherever the national army advances into the insurrectionary region, African bondsmen, escaping from their insurrectionary masters, come out to meet it, and offer their service and labour in whatever capacity they may be desired. So many of these bondsmen have, even without the invitation, and often against the opposition of the Federal military and naval authorities, made their way from bondage among the insurgents, to freedom among the loyalists, that the Government finds itself occupied with the consideration of measures to provide them with domiciles at home or abroad. Not less than 100 such escape every day; and as the army advances the number increases. If the war should continue indefinitely, every slave will become, not only a free man, but an absentee. If the insurgents shall resist their escape, how could they hope to prevent the civil war they have inaugurated from degenerating into a servile war? True, a servile population, especially one so long enslaved as the Africans in the insurrectionary States, require time and trial before they can organize a servile war; but if the war continues indefinitely, a servile war is only a question of time. The problem, then, is whether the strife shall be left to go on to that point. The Government, animated by a just regard for the general welfare, including that of the insurrectionary States, adopts a policy designed at once to save the Union and rescue society from that fearful catastrophe, while it consults the ultimate peaceful relief of the nation from slavery. It cannot be necessary to prove to any enlightened statesman that the labour of the African in the insurrectionary region is at present indispensable as a resource of the insurgents for continuing the war; nor is it now necessary to show that this same labour is the basis of the whole industrial system existing in that region. The war is thus seen to be producing already a disorganization of the industrial system of the insurrectionary States, and tending to a subversion of even their social system. Let it next be considered that the European systems of industry are largely based upon the African slave labour of the insurrectionary States employed in the production of cotton, tobacco, and rice, and on the free labour of the other States employed in producing cereals, out of which combined productions arises the demand for European productions, materials, and fabrics. The disorganization of industry, which is already revealing itself in the insurrectionary States, cannot but impair their ability to prosecute the war, and at the same time result indirectly in greater distress in Europe.

On the other hand, this disorganization operates far less injuriously at present to the Federal Government and to the loyal States. Every African labourer who escapes from his service is not only lost to the support of the insurrection, but he brings an accession to the productive labour of the loyal States, and to that extent increases their ability to continue the contest in which they are reluctantly engaged. The failure of foreign importation as heretofore in return for the exportation of Southern staples stimulates the manufacturing industry of the loyal States. Immigration is accelerated by an activity in these States resulting from extended manufacture and the prosecution of the war. Thus has the phenomenon appeared, disappointing so many prophecies in Europe, that the war impoverishes and exhausts only the insurrection, and not the Union. I shall not contend that these effects would be perpetual. I know there is a reckoning for every nation that has the misfortune to be involved in a war, and I do not expect for the United States any exemption from that inexorable law; but it is enough for my present purpose that the penalties are neither more severe nor more imminent than the loyal States can endure, while bringing this unhappy contest to its desired conclusion. Let us now suppose that any one or more European States should think it right or expedient to intervene by force to oblige the United States to accept a compromise of their sovereignty. What other effect could it produce than to render inevitable, and even hurry on, that servile war, so completely destructive of all European interests in this country, which this Government so studiously strives to avoid? I know that the danger of any foreign nation attempting such a policy, if it has ever existed, has passed, as I am happy in knowing that no foreign Government has ever threatened such intervention, while several magnanimous Governments have repudiated all unfriendly designs. I have put forward that hypothesis only by way of preface to a question not less significant—namely, what must be the effect of such a policy abroad as will encourage the insurgents with hopes of an intervention which is never to occur? Is not that effect visible in the obstinacy of the insurgents, in their destruction of the cotton and tobacco already cultivated, and liable to be brought into commerce by the return of peace, and in their studied neglect of the planting the seed of their staples, and turning so much of the African labour as they are able to save into the production of supplies of provisions and forage, to enable them to continue the war?

The effect will be further developed as time goes on, in opening a way for that servile war, which, if it shall be permitted to come, will produce infinite suffering throughout the world, and can only at last result in an entirely new system of trade and commerce between the United States and all foreign nations.

I need not say that these views are not grounded on any proceedings or expressions of the British Government and are to be submitted to them only, as they will be to other States, from a strong desire on the part of the President that the true condition of the present strife may be everywhere fully understood.

I am, &c., WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

No. 2.—EARL RUSSELL TO MR. STUART.

Foreign-office, July 28, 1862.

Sir,—I have left hitherto unanswered and unnoticed a despatch of Mr. Seward's, which Mr. Adams delivered to me more than a month ago.

I have done so partly because the military events referred to in it were, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, far from being decisive, and partly because there was no proposal in it upon which Her Majesty's Government were called upon to come to any conclusion.

Events subsequent to the date of Mr. Seward's letter have shown that Her Majesty's Government in their opinion upon the first of these points were not mistaken. Victories have been gained, reverses have followed; positions have been reached in the near neighbourhood of the capital of the Confederates, and these positions have been again abandoned. These events have been accompanied by great loss of life in battle and in hospital, while such measures as the Confiscation Bill, passed through both Houses of Congress, and the proclamations of General Butler at New Orleans, bear evidence of the increasing bitterness of the strife. The approach of a servile war, so much insisted upon by Mr. Seward in his despatch, only forewarns us that another element of destruction may be added to the slaughter, loss of property, and waste of industry which already afflict a country so lately prosperous and tranquil.

Nor on the other point to which I have adverted have I anything new to say.

From the moment when the intelligence first reached this country that nine States and several millions of inhabitants of the great American Union had seceded and had made war on the Government of the President down to the present time, Her Majesty's Government have pursued a friendly, an open, and a consistent course. They have been neutral between the two parties to a civil war. Neither the loss of the raw material of manufacture, so necessary to a great portion of our people, nor the insults constantly heaped upon the British name in speeches and newspapers, nor the rigour, beyond the usual practice of nations, with which the Queen's subjects attempting to break the loose blockade of the Southern ports have been treated, have induced Her Majesty's Government to swerve an inch from an impartial neutrality.

At this moment they have nothing more at heart than to see that consummation of which the President speaks in his answer to the Governors of eighteen States—namely, the bringing of this unnecessary and injurious civil war to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion.

As to the course of opinion in this country, the President is aware that perfect freedom of comment upon all public events is in this country the invariable practice, sanctioned by law, and approved by the universal sense of the nation.

I am, &c., RUSSELL.

MR. ROEBUCK, M.P., ON THE AMERICAN WAR.

At the Sheffield annual banquet held on Friday last, and at which Lord Palmerston was present, Mr. Roebuck, in acknowledging the toast of the Borough Members, spoke as follows in reference to American affairs:—

There are things which I would wish to say on the present occasion and which I don't think you will be unwilling to hear. I am the more desirous of saying them considering the great presence in which I speak. You may ask why I have not said these things before? I will tell you why. I did not want anybody to be responsible for what I uttered; and anybody speaking in the House of Commons ought to feel that he speaks under great responsibility, and that that which he says in that House will be, in spite of all he can say, reflected upon the House. But here I can say what I think ("Hear, hear," and laughter), and what I will say will only be reflected upon myself. (Cheers and laughter.) I have one or two things to say, which I shall be very glad for the noble lord to hear, but which I did not desire to say in that honourable Assembly. When I look at our manufactures, I cannot help regarding the persons who produce the things which have made England wonderful over the world; and when I look at the state of a large portion of our manufacturing population at the present time, I am filled with wonderment at their great resistance of all the pressure and difficulties by which they are surrounded, the great intelligence and the great probity they have evinced. Sir, an uneducated people wrecks its anger on the immediate instrument of its misery. If a child runs its head against a table, it beats the table. An uneducated people who suffer from the dearth of wheat, hang the baker (a laugh); and I must say it is greatly to the honour and credit of the people of this country that, during all the sufferings which they have undergone, we have not seen one hand raised against authority, nor heard one word expressed in condemnation of anybody. Sir, in times past I have seen the working man turn against the employer, but we have not seen that now; and why? Because of the effects of education. (Cheers.) One of the most exhilarating things that have happened in my time is, that I have seen this great pressure upon the working classes of this country without one single hand or voice of those working classes having been raised up against any one of the community to which they belong. I wish I could say so of all others, but I do say that it behoves us all to be wonderfully careful how we endeavour to make the working people of this country consider that their misfortunes are in any way attributable to any one of the classes above them. They themselves have looked upon their employers, and seen that they have not made the dearth of cotton, and therefore upon them no anger ought to be visited. And those who govern this country—those who wield the destinies—those who set example and create opinion among us, ought at least to take care that they give no voice to any expressions of blame upon any class in this country for the misfortune and misery which those people are now suffering. Well, sir, I think I am bound, while thus paying my tribute of praise and admiration to the working classes, to express my highest admiration of the conduct of their employers. Nobody less than I is inclined to flatter the rich. I expect nothing from them, but I am bound in justice to express my admiration of their conduct. I now come to that which I wish to utter here, but which I did not dare to utter in the House of Commons. How is it that these people suffer; why do they suffer, and through and by whom do they suffer? The people to whom I allude are the working men of Manchester. The fact of which I speak is the dearth of cotton—the cause of that dearth is the terrible conflict in America. When the dispute between what are called the Seceding States and the North arose, my first feeling was that of great depression and sorrow. And I must at once acknowledge that my feelings were on the side of the North. I have in my early life visited that country, and with all the ardour and enthusiasm of youth I looked upon the wondrous fabric which had been raised by the great heroes of the Revolution. I looked upon the Constitution of that country as a wondrous effort of human skill. Sir, there is now living amongst us a noble Lord who was born before the Declaration of American Independence. He lives now to see that combination broken up. I am speaking of Lord Lyndhurst. He may say very much in the language of Gratian, when speaking of the Irish Constitution—"I sat by her cradle—I followed her hearse." Lord Lyndhurst saw the rise of the American Republic. He has lived to see it shattered to pieces. Well, sir, when I looked, as I did with all the ardour of a young man, upon that wondrous combination, I thought something great and wonderful had arisen for mankind. I saw them with a continent before them wondrous in its fertility, great in its resources, with free navigation, in its capacities unsurpassed, in its extent marvellous. I saw a people of one language, possessed of free institutions from England, working them out for themselves. I said, here is the millennium of mankind—here is, if there be upon the earth, the opportunity for men to govern themselves with wisdom, for their own happiness. I have lived to see that all shattered—split asunder.—Eleven States separated from the remainder of the thirty-four States.—America divided into two, and I think likely to be divided into five, and for ever ceasing to be the United States of America. Well, sir, am I now to grieve at this? My first feeling was grief. My present feeling is one of rejoicing. (Hear, hear.) I say an irresponsible people, possessed of irresponsible and almost omnipotent power, is a people that cannot be trusted. (Applause.) I say that the conduct of the North in its endeavour to cement the union, and reunite the States of America, is an immoral proceeding, totally incapable of success. (Cheers and cries of "No, no!") You may say "No, no," but I have prophesied before, and now I tell you that they can never be united (applause); and that the fight they are now maintaining is a mere shedding of blood and wasting of treasure for no earthly purpose whatever. (Cheers.) I say, moreover, they put forward a pretence; and that they are not fighting against slavery. I know the United States well, and I say that in the North the feeling against the black man is stronger than in the South (hear); that tomorrow, if the States were reunited, slavery would be fixed more firmly than ever. (Applause.) Now, sir, I come to the last reason that makes me feel glad of the result, and that is, the insolent and unbearing conduct of the people of America. (Loud and protracted cheers.) Throughout our intercourse with America, we have been wondrously careful of their sensitive feelings. (Hear, hear.) On almost every occasion we have yielded. We may have thought them petulant, but pretty nearly on every occasion we have given up to them. What has been the consequence? [A Voice.—"They have been very saucy."] The consequence was their conduct towards the Trent; and if there be one bright spot upon the noble lord's escutcheon (protracted and enthusiastic applause), if there be a brilliant feather in the plume which now crowns his forehead, it is the grand stand that he took in the name of the people of England in the case of the Trent. (Renewed cheering.) And I beg, before this great assemblage, and before the whole world—for there are those here who will send it to the world—to return my most grateful thanks for the great part that he performed on that occasion. (Loud cheers.) Well, sir, a divided America will be a benefit to England. [The Mayor of Manchester.—"No doubt of it."] And it will not be a misery to any portion of their own country; it will be a good. They will be all the better governed, and they will be all the more capable of bullying the whole world. (Cheers.) We, sir, are not a people who like to be bullied. (A laugh.) They have tried it pretty often. The noble lord has shown them the result on one occasion. Now comes the moral of this. I look to Lancashire, I look to her suffering people, and I entreat the noble lord to weigh well the consequence of what he calls "perfect neutrality." There has not been yet perfect neutrality. (Cheers.) England has shipped to the shores of America every possible store, every possible means of aggression, and in consequence of the fact of our merely acknowledging as a belligerent Power the Southern States of America, we could not prevent our people doing that. The noble lord knows as well as I do that all his labours have been totally inefficient, and that at this present moment we are supplying North America with every possible means of offence and injury to the South. (Hear, hear.) I would ask the noble lord deeply to consider—and I am not now speaking lightly; I am not saying that which an after-dinner speech may be supposed to convey; but I am telling my careful thoughts of many months' consideration, which I have reserved for the present occasion, because, as I have stated to you, I wanted no man to be responsible for what I uttered but myself. I ask the noble lord, and glad I am that he is here, to consider deeply whether the time has not come for him to be the first in Europe to ask the great Powers of Europe to recognize the Southern Confederacy. ("No, no," and cheers.) As a politician I say that I know what will be the result. Six months will not pass over before it is done. Then let me tell you why I ask the noble lord so deeply to consider this. The North will never be our friends. (Cheers.) Of the South you can make friends. They are Englishmen; they are not the sum and refuse of Europe. [The Mayor of Manchester.—"Don't say that; don't say that."] (Cheers and disapprobation.) I know what I am saying. They are Englishmen, and we must make them our friends. A hand held out from Europe would stay the great effusion of blood. It would stop to a great extent the exhaustion of their resources; more than all, it would make happy the homes of many of our working men here. Sir, I think of those homes, I think of those people, and I entreat the noble lord to think of them. These things I have said not in a hurry, not in haste, not inconsiderately. I throw them upon the world. I submit them to my fellow-countrymen. I believe they are true, and I think they will redound to our prosperity and honour. (Loud cheers.)

EXPLOITS OF THE CONFEDERATE RAM ARKANSAS.

(From the Chicago Tribune.)

United States' Gunboat Flotilla, Wednesday, July 15.

About 3.50 a.m. the gunboats Carondelet and Tyler and the ram Queen of the West got under way, steamed up the river a short distance, turned, and headed up the Yazoo. Rumours had been rife for several days that the Arkansas was preparing to come out, but a large majority hooted it down and scoffed at the bare idea. It seems, however, that those in authority placed some credence in the report, and consequently the two gunboats and ram were sent to look up matters. Upon entering the river the Queen shot up ahead of the rest, the Carondelet following, while the Tyler brought up the rear.

They had proceeded about five miles only when those in the gunboats were startled by the appearance of the Queen coming full speed down the river, with evidently every pound of steam she could make at work on her shaft. She flew by the Carondelet with the words, "The Arkansas is coming," and shortly after a long, low, mud-coloured craft, with a short, thick, black smoke-stack in her middle, puffing out huge volumes of black smoke, came swiftly around the point, and made for the Carondelet. The river was too narrow to turn back, even if Captain Walker had so wished; but the captain is one who knows no such words as "back out," and, swinging around broadside, to avoid raking shots, the Carondelet belched forth a whole broadside on to the rapidly advancing craft. Imagine the consternation produced when the balls were seen to strike and fall harmlessly in the water! "At him again," was the cry, and another broadside was poured into the monster at fifty yards' range, but with no more effect than if so many peas had been discharged. The Arkansas now ran into the Carondelet's starboard quarter with a fearful crash, pouring broadside after broadside into the gunboat, which, passing through the wooden casemate, raked the vessel from stem to stern. The Arkansas showed no intention of leaving her victim, but, remaining along her starboard quarter, raked her fore and aft with pointed shot. The Carondelet's stern and after division of starboard batteries kept up an incessant fire, but the huge solid shot flew off like indiarubber balls. There was no tangible shot to be seen; a very small round hole, just large enough to admit the gun, constituted her ports, and on elevating or depressing the porthole moved with the gun. Finding his guns were doing no service, Captain Walker had his boarders called away, and into the rebel craft they poured; but not a man or a passage could be found. The boarders now returned and the guns set to work, but it was so much powder wasted. The Carondelet's stern was now perfectly riddled, all the officers' quarters shot away, and everything literally torn to pieces. At length a shot cut away the steam pipe, and the scalding vapour spread to every part of the boat. Many of the men jumped overboard. At this juncture of affairs Captain Walker led a boarding party on the rebel's deck, but could find no possible way of getting below. The hatches were all secured underneath, and the smallest kind of aperture or hole was nowhere to be found. This discovered, the party returned to give up their boat only when the bottom of the river called for her. The flag which still floated from her stern was never to be struck to the rebels as long as one board floated to hold it up. What men were left stood by what guns could be brought to bear, and worked them until the Arkansas, thinking she had about finished her victim, pushed along past her and stood for the Tyler, which had stood by the Carondelet through the whole fight. The Tyler discovered her motive, and, knowing her thin frame would stand no chance when brought in contact with the enemy's invulnerable sides, headed down the stream, keeping just clear of the Arkansas and firing her stern battery. This chase was kept up until the mouth of the river was reached, when the Tyler, her boats shot away and badly cut up otherwise, came into view of the whole fleet. Not a vessel in the whole fleet, from some strange fatality, had steam enough to move. The Louisiana shore was lined with our transports, ordnance boats, &c., while directly opposite them, three or four abreast, lay Farragut's and Davis's fleet, scarcely two of which could fire without pouring their broadsides into some of their own vessels. All eyes were strained to see the cause of the Tyler's commotion. The ram fleet, which lay near the mouth of the Yazoo, are scattering in every direction. A moment more and the long-dreaded Arkansas steamed into full view, and heads right for the centre of our fleet. Bang! goes a gun at the ordnance boat Great Western, while one from her port battery at the rams, who are leaving in every direction. She now passes the Richmond, whose splendid battery of 9-inch Dahlgrens is held quiet by the J. H. Dickey, who lies just opposite. Bang! bang! go two more guns at the ordnance boat. Passing down, she puts two balls into the Champion, while in the meantime her port battery is busy with Farragut's fleet. Steadily she pursues her way, nothing daunted, nothing checked. She is now more than half-way down. She passes the Hartford; but the noble old flagship is situated like the Richmond, for the same broadside which would have bailed on the Arkansas would have annihilated the splendid hospital boat Red Rover, with her cargo of human freight. The Oneida hits her with her 11-inch, but the ponderous missile produces no effect. The Weonona and Wissahicon engage her, but she passes their fire unscathed, unharmed. Can nothing burst the rebel monster? A dubious shake of the head is the only response, as ball after ball drops from her sides into the water. Steadily but surely she keeps on her way, firing one broadside at the transports, and the other at some vessel on the other side. She has nearly run the gamut. One more boat only to disperse her progress, and that the Cincinnati, which, far below the rest of the fleet is doing picket duty near the point. All eyes are upon her, and a repetition of her experience seems inevitable. On comes the Arkansas, seemingly like Anteus of old, picking up new strength at every step. She is sure of her prey, and is making right for it. The Cincinnati had not steam sufficient to tack on her or even hardly enough to hold her head up stream. She slipped her cable, however, and headed for the Mississippi shore, drifting down stream all the time, her own motive power being insufficient to stem the current. The Arkansas, discovering her intention, heads for her, when the gunboat opened a brisk and galling fire on the advancing rebel at short range, the rified Parrots apparently piercing her, the other shots dropping harmlessly off. The ram fires heavily as she advances, and is rapidly gaining on her opponent. When just as all were expecting a collision the Arkansas suddenly checks up, heads the other way, fires a parting broadside, and rapidly leaves the Cincinnati behind her. The gunboat had drawn her into too shallow water, which she had no intention of being caught in. The Cincinnati, assisted by the Weonona, kept up an incessant fire until she had rounded the point and was in the arms of her friends. This unparalleled audacity and boldness elicited unqualified admiration of all. Such a thing never took place before, and will probably never take place again. In broad daylight, in the very teeth of 200 guns, this craft slowly and deliberately made her way, selecting her own victims, and hurling the glove of defiance at the combined fleet. It is an example of cool, daring courage unexampled, and the name of "Caresby Jones," her commander, will be awarded by all men as deserving a place among the list of those "who know no fear." The fact of her success is undoubtedly owing to the circumstances under which she caught us. Our position and everything worked against us. The Essex had discovered a burnt boiler the night before, and a new one was being inserted at the time. The Louisville was lying at the blacksmith boat repairing. The Sumter had her waste pipe out and a new one being inserted. Everything worked in her favor. Those boats that were all ready could not use their guns for fear of doing more damage to their friends than their foes.

I will leave comments on this singular transaction for other pens than mine. Different persons will, of course, have different opinions. All that is left us is to say what might have been, and resolutions what we will do. The Arkansas is safe for a time. I won't answer for her being so long.

	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.
Tyler.....	40	33	10
Carondelet	5	20	13
Lancaster	18	10	—
Benton	1	3	—
	34	66	23

Lancaster shot in her boilers; Dickey struck three times; Champion struck three times; Great Western struck once.

THE CRUEL MURDER OF MR. LASLEY AND OTHERS.

The St. Louis Republican publishes the following outrage committed by the Federal troops:—"In Monroe county, Missouri, near the Salt River Railroad bridge, on Sunday last, as Mr. James M. Lasley and his family were returning home from church, together with a party of young ladies and gentlemen who were visiting them at their country home, they found their dwelling and grounds occupied by Federal troops, who had been stationed at the bridge. Suspecting no harm, though finding the grounds guarded, they advanced towards their residence, when Mr. Lasley was ordered to get down and go to Palmyra. He replied that they must permit him to enter the house and get a thicker coat, as he would be absent all night. This they positively denied, telling him the coat he had on would do for him. They then placed him and James Price (a young son of a widow lady) and young Ridgeway (an only son of aged parents, in front of the Federal lines. The young ladies, and Mrs. Lasley, with her two children, yet remained on the ground. Having separated these three gentlemen from the ladies, whom they had escorted from church, the officer in command addressed some very insulting words to them. The dreadful truth that they were to be shot at once flashed across Mrs. Lasley's mind, and she darted to join her husband and share his fate, but was caught and held by one of the young ladies present, just as Mr. Lasley and young Price fell, having been shot dead. Young Ridgeway rushed into the woods which were near, but delayed his death only a few seconds, for he was pursued and instantly killed. It is proper, further, to say that Mr. Lasley had taken the oath of allegiance, and was under a heavy bond; that young Ridgeway was also under oath and bond, and that Price was only fifteen years of age. Before this crime was committed, it is alleged that the soldiers had taken possession of Mr. Lasley's house—had helped themselves to everything they wanted—had partaken of a good dinner which the cook was ordered to prepare for them, and had destroyed many household articles."

EARL RUSSELL AND THE LIVERPOOL SHIP-OWNERS.

(From the Morning Herald.)

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—A few weeks ago certain Liverpool shipowners presented, through Mr. Horsfall, a memorial to Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs, setting forth, "that Federal cruisers were blockading the British port of Nassau, as if it were a Confederate port, and making prize of British vessels sailing from one British port to another with British goods, though such vessels were perfectly innocent of any attempt to run the blockade; that the confidence of mercantile men in the sanctity of the British flag was already so much shaken that underwriters were demanding 10 per cent. for insuring from risk of capture British goods in British bottoms sailing from one British port to another, and praying that steps might be taken by Her Majesty's Government to protect British shipping in the Bahama waters, and to put a check on the unwarrantable seizures so repeatedly perpetrated by the Federal cruisers."

Earl Russell, in his reply, affects to believe that these merchants are asking to be protected from the capture of their property in entering a Confederate port. He says "that it is alleged by Mr. Seward and Mr. Adams that ships have been sent from this country to America with a fixed purpose to run the blockade; that high premiums have been paid with this view." Really this is no answer to the petition of these gentlemen, who do not ask for redress from losses sustained by attempting to run the blockade of any of the Southern ports, but as British merchants they claim the right of carrying on a lawful trade between two British ports. Yet the Foreign Minister says that "he cannot be surprised that the cruisers of the United States should watch with vigilance a port which is said to be the great entrepôt of this commerce." On the same principle Yankee war vessels would have a right to annoy British ships off the port of Liverpool. He further states "that he is aware that many vessels are subject to harsh treatment, and that if captured the loss to the merchant is far from being compensated even by a favourable decision in a prize-court," and suggests that "the true remedy would be that the merchants and shipowners of Liverpool should refrain from this species of trade." What species of trade? The Liverpool merchants do not say that they were carrying material of war; but even if they were, have they not as much right to engage in that business as in any other between an English home and colonial port? As well might the Birmingham manufacturers be prevented by Yankee police-officers from sending their products to Liverpool. Earl Russell again dodges the point by saying "if the Confederates had command of the sea they would no doubt watch as vigilantly and capture as readily British vessels going to New York as the Federals now watch Charleston, and capture vessels seeking to break the blockade." But no complaint is made about the blockade of Charleston; it is with regard to the British port of Nassau that he has been addressed. Earl Russell concludes his reply by giving the following gratuitous advice, which is quite irrelevant to the case presented to him:—"That it is the duty of Her Majesty's subjects to conform to Her Majesty's proclamation, and abstain from furnishing to either of the belligerent parties any of the means of war which are forbidden to be furnished by that proclamation." It is only necessary to add, that Her Majesty's proclamation in no manner prohibits any trade between one British port and another, but according to Earl Russell's interpretation it renders unlawful the commerce that is daily carried on between Liverpool and New York, to which, if he had seen fit, he could have long since put a stop to.

London, Aug. 9.

Yours, &c.,

COMMERCE.

GENERAL HALLECK, AND THE EVACUATION OF CORINTH.

The appointment of General Halleck as Commander-in-Chief of the United States' armies, and the proclamation of General Pope to his soldiers in Virginia, warrants our republishing the following extracts from the correspondence of the New York World, of June 1, as an apt comment on the ability of one General and the veracity of the other.

CORINTH, MISSISSIPPI, June 1.

The fortifications about Corinth are plain, ordinary entrenchments, constructed of earth and logs, not elaborate or expensive, hardly first-rate, about six miles in length.

They are not superior to any of ours two miles from them, and thrown up in a couple of days, and not equal in strength and science to those of our right wing. To speak the truth, they are precisely such as a great army, advancing, retreating, or remaining in the face of an equal foe, would throw up in a night. I was immensely disappointed in them. I have really got up in the morning, ate my three meals, and went to bed again for the last month, in nauterable awe of these Gibraltar-Sebastopolian fortifications of the enemy at Corinth. I walked round about them to-day, marking well their bulwarks, telling the towers thereof till my sides were sore with merriment and my lips sore with chagrin. With the single exception of the abatis of fallen trees, 500 yards wide in front of them, there is nothing under heaven about the fortifications at Corinth—their situation, style, or strength—more than the most ordinary and temporary fortifications possess. They protect the north and east of the town, and lie about half a mile from its outskirts. My word for all this, of course, the military lightning to the contrary notwithstanding.

After describing the town, the fortifications and his conversation with several of the few remaining inhabitants, the writer proceeds:—

So I went all over the late tested field of the vast enemy—all over the fortifications—all over that town—talked with the frank druggist and the sturdy Irishman that had worked upon the railroad. And so I write what I saw in grief, mortification, chagrin, and shame. I said yesterday, "I'll write no more; others may; I can't. Patriotism will not let me write what I have seen and can swear to. I will not stir, nor wince, nor speak a word." To-day, gradually, almost imperceptibly, my pen has gone after the theme that frets and stings me—the evacuation. Let "hot irons burn out both my eyes" if I do not love my land, my nation, my Government better than I love anything below the heaven where God is. And when I write such words as I am sometimes compelled to, if I write at all, I am afraid lest in exposing military ineptitude I shall wound and damage the beautiful commonwealth that struggles so tremendously for existence and perpetuity.

But I do religiously believe that it is best now for the commonwealth to hear and heed what is bitter, undisputed fact—the Confederate strategy since the Battle of Shiloh has been as successful as it has been superior. Taking the enemy's stand-point, and writing when and where I do, I cannot possibly imagine how it could have been more eminent for perfection or success. Taking our stand-point, the stand-point of the Union's hopes and Halleck's fame, I cannot possibly imagine how it could have been more mortifyingly disastrous. If the attack at Shiloh was a surprise to General Grant, the evacuation of Corinth was no less a surprise to General Halleck. If the one ruined Grant, the other has laid out in pallid death the military name and fame of Major-General Halleck. That order, "Don't bring on a general engagement,"—now a household word that makes this army wince,—lasted, I am reliably informed, down to an hour when there was no enemy with whom it was possible to bring on a general engagement.

The druggists says he was two weeks getting away. But aside from such testimony, could the army of Beauregard be removed so cleanly and completely and noiselessly during a night, or a day and night, or two days and two nights? Could it? Did it require the tremendous concussion of the magazine explosion to get into our ears what we would not get into our eyes—the evacuation? Why, that was the final act of the mortifying drama. On Friday morning we went in. The prisoners that we captured amounted to about 400. Four hundred! Even the heggarly account of picket regiments and light artillery that fought us so boldly got away. Those that we caught declare that they were kept in ignorance of the movements at Corinth, and were as much surprised at the evacuation as ourselves. Corinth has been searched in vain for a spiked or disabled gun. Shame on us, what a clean piece of evacuation it was!

Never shall I forget the pertinacity with which that long, lean line of Confederate pickets, backed, perchance, by some 5000 muskets and a few six-pounders, disputed every inch of our advance, while the vast, imposing host behind them—leaders, stores, cannon, commissaries, knapsacks, shoe-strings, tooth-picks, and all—quietly and leisurely flowed away from its entrenchments. I haven't seen the telegram that the censor sent you. Surely it concluded with the stereotyped encouragement, "Our cavalry in hot pursuit of the flying enemy." At this writing there are no results from the "pursuit." I prophesied a fight at Corinth, and believed there would be down to the moment that I heard the magazines explode. Beauregard fooled me. I am not much ashamed of that. I am no strategist. I am no scout or spy, and employ none. It is my business to record the doings of the National rather than the Confederate army. General Beauregard fooled, hoodwinked, outwitted General Halleck. I am ashamed of that. I winced under it as much as if General Beauregard had spit in General Halleck's face—Oh, more, of course! I did not see how an illustration could be equal to the case. I am speaking the unvarnished, the unpalatable truth. My eyes are writing what they saw, my ears what they have heard, my conscience what it believes. And to say the galling fact, there is nothing here but chagrin and shame, disappointment and disapprobation over these empty entrenchments, this bootless, bloodless, occupation of Corinth.

Better for General Halleck that he had remained in St. Louis, or had never been born, than to have taken the field. Shiloh only killed a chief that was half dead before. Grant never had universal confidence. Corinth has killed a chief that took the field, everybody his friend. He had no field fame, however. It was fame as executive head of a department. He did ably and well at St. Louis. We reasoned from St. Louis to Corinth. General Halleck had the popular vote on his side. His army hoped mightily in him; it was such a change from Surprise Grant, they say. The press was his friend; the most powerful friend he had. A score of gifted and able pens within his lines wrote for him. Every letter had his name in it in a proud way. Not for his sake especially, but for the blessed Union's sake, we help him. The press can help the sword, or hinder it, or render it as harmless as a tea-spoon. Look what aids he had. Not beardless blackheads with an inch of yellow on the shoulder, but giants in influence, scattering his name with high praise from the rivers unto the ends of the earth—men at the pen in the great city and the tented field.

Who spoke against General Halleck? Whom would the omnipotent newspaper permit to speak against him? His field fame, negative as it was, was fair and promising, and everything that he could desire. He had never fought a battle or led an army. "But he can do it and will—as no other man can or will." That was what we all said and insisted on. Certainly I said it. In almost every letter I had something flattering for the chief. I have no more modesty than to say that I wrote for him as if I had been bribed to write for him. I started the story of "Old Brains." Every little helps, I thought. I gave it to another correspondent. He published it, and I had the satisfaction of seeing it printed far and near. "Good!" cried the newspapers in chorus, "He is familiarly known as Old Brains." He wasn't.

I had an appetite for everything in the way of incident, or what not, that should create enthusiastic confidence in him. I know how much depends upon it.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE STATES.—Upon this subject the New York Caucasian, of July 26th, has the following editorial:—"The supporters of Mr. Lincoln's Administration are constantly declaring that the doctrine of State sovereignty, as taught by Jefferson and Jackson, and all the great leaders of the American Democracy, is the cause, the very original sin that has brought all the existing troubles on the country, and that there will be no peace, or safety, or order in the future, unless this doctrine is exploded, and the Federal Government consolidated into irresistible and unquestioned supremacy over the States. Indeed, Mr. Lincoln himself declared, that State boundaries and State authority are much the same as county regulations, and if a State may resist the rule of the Federal Government, why, forsooth, a county may, with equal propriety, resist the rule of a State! Furthermore, it is constantly assumed that Mr. Lincoln was not only fairly elected, but elected by the majority, of course, and the South, out-voted and beaten at the polls, turned about and resisted the will of the majority, duly and legally expressed through the ballot box. Indeed, this falsehood is so constantly repeated, and so unquestioned by the Democratic press, that almost every one has the impression that Mr. Lincoln is the far exponent of the majority of American votes, and that the doctrine of "State sovereignty" has been perverted by bad men in the South, to nullify the popular majority and defeat the will of the American people. But the facts are just the reverse of all this. Mr. Lincoln did not receive one-third of the popular vote, and holds power alone through the organism of State sovereignty. If, therefore, the doctrine of State sovereignty be unsound, Mr. Lincoln is a gross imposter, and has no right to hold office an hour, for he holds it alone through the sovereign will of a majority of the States, and against the will of two-thirds of the American people.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN A DEAD WEIGHT FROM HIS BIRTH.

The Washington Sunday Morning Chronicle of June 22, published the following interesting and authentic anecdote of "the Infant M'Clellan." The late defeat and retreat of the young Napoleon is a strange comment on the wonderful incident and the justifiable conclusion deduced from it by the authentic narrator:—

"Thou art weighed in the balances, and art 'not' found wanting."—Daniel, v. 27.

An incident, which occurred in the city of Philadelphia, in the winter of 1826-27, is particularly worthy of record in our present crisis, inasmuch as it relates to the early history of one who fills a position commanding the attention and admiration of the world, and particularly of our own country.—In order to better authenticate the statement, as well as to refer to certain antecedents, I will premise that I visited Philadelphia that winter for the purpose of attending a course of medical lectures, and became the private pupil of a distinguished surgeon, then a professor in one of the medical institutions in the city.

Now for the incident. In the winter above referred to, a son was born to this distinguished surgeon. The event had scarcely transpired before the father announced it to his delighted pupils. In a few moments more, scales were brought from a neighbouring grocer. Into one dish he placed the babe—into the other all the weights. The beam was raised, but the child moved not! The father, emptying his pockets, threw in his watch, coin, keys, knives, and lancets, but to no purpose—the little hero could not be moved! He conquered everything! And, at last, while adding more and more weight, the cord supporting the beam gave way, and broke, rather than the giant infant would yield!

That father was George M'Clellan, M.D., late of Philadelphia, and that son is George B. M'Clellan, our young commander of the Potomac.

The country will perceive a prophetic charm in this incident. Truly he was weighed in the balance and not found wanting. May his present and future life stand the test as well. Surrounded as he is by traitors at home, while rampant rebellion is before him, I hear him, amidst the jealousy and envy of cavaliers, quietly praying with Job, "Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity!"

Philadelphia, June 17, 1862.

THE OUTRAGE IN ALABAMA.

The correspondent of the Louisville Democrat writes as follows in reference to the conduct of General Turchin's soldiers in Athens, Alabama:—

General Turchin said to his soldiers that he would shut his eyes for two hours, and let them loose upon the town and citizens of Athens—the very same citizens who, when all the rest of their State was disloyal, sailed the national colours to the highest pinnacle of their Court House cupola—these citizens, yet to a wonderful degree true to their allegiance, had their houses and stores broken open and robbed of everything valuable, and what was too unwieldy to be transported easily, broken or otherwise ruined; safes were forced open and rifled of thousands of dollars—wives and mothers insulted, and husbands and fathers arrested if they dared to murmur—horses and negroes taken in large numbers—ladies were robbed of all their wearing apparel, except what they had on—in a word, every outrage committed and every excess indulged in that ever was heard of by a most savage and brutal soldiery towards a defenceless and alarmed population. All, too, by those who pretend to represent the United States' Government. This is an everlasting disgrace, that can never be wiped from the page of history, but which demands immediate and prompt action, and the execration of all lovers of law and good government.

I am responsible for these statements. I have no more doubt that they occurred just as stated than I have of my own existence. I know similar acts disgraced the same brigade of our army when we occupied Bowling Green, Kentucky, and the matter was hushed up to save the credit of our army, hoping it would occur no more; but this leniency failed to have its proper effect, and it is no longer endurable. The good of the service, and the character of every Union soldier, cries for the punishment without mercy of such disgraceful conduct.

I am yours, &c.

THE TEXT OF MR. LINCOLN'S CONFEDERATE PROCLAMATION.

In pursuance of the sixth section of the Act of Congress, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, and which Act, and the joint resolution explanatory thereof, are herewith published, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim to and warn all persons within the contemplation of said sixth section to cease participating in, aiding, countenancing, or abetting the existing rebellion, or any rebellion against the Government of the United States, and to return to their proper allegiance to the United States, on pain of the forfeitures and seizures as within and by said sixth section provided.

CONFEDERATE CURRENCY.—The following letter has appeared in the Times:—"In the New York letter of the 25th July, published in your impression of this morning, I find the following remarks:—"New York made itself merry a month ago at sight of a few Confederate notes for ten cents that had been rifled from the pockets of the slain, and brought North to be exhibited as curiosities of the war. But the Confederates, in all their distress, never issued notes of a less denomination than ten cents." Your correspondent refers to Southern bank notes, the Confederate Government never having made any issues below the value of $5. All their notes are made payable six months after the treaty of peace with the United States, and are convertible at any time into coupon or inscribed bonds having twenty years to run, bearing 8 per cent. interest, but redeemable in ten years, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. The bonds and notes are secured by a direct tax of a-half per cent. on all real estates, slaves, merchandise, bank notes, railroad, and other corporation stocks, money at interest in the purchase of bills, notes, and other securities, except bonds of the Confederate States, and cash in hand or on deposit. Colleges, schools, charitable and religious corporations are exempted. The Treasury notes of the Confederate States are not a legal tender, except in payment of dues to the Government, but the patriotism of the people is such that they pass from hand to hand as currency for all transactions."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no rumour or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 14, 1862.

The Latest Intelligence.

THE news per City of Washington affords the most complete evidence of the perilous position of General McClellan's army. His troops are suffering severely from scurvy, the inevitable consequence of being cut off from supplies of fresh provisions. But this is not the only cause for great anxiety, or that induces the open discussion of the prospect of the evacuation of the Peninsula. The Confederate batteries on the south bank of the James River have become harassing and dangerous. On August 1, the "Federal shipping was damaged," a significant admission; and further, the head-quarters of Colonel Ingall were effectually shelled. The position of McClellan is untenable. He receives "but few reinforcements," and since his troops are suffering from disease occasioned by want of fresh supplies, the fewer reinforcements he has the better for him. The reported reconnaissance to within fourteen miles of Petersburg is a very palpable blunder, for Petersburg is on the south side of the James River, where the Confederates are in great force; and we need hardly add that under the circumstances it is utterly impossible for the Federals to have crossed the river.

From General Pope's antecedents, it was to be expected that he would write some sensational despatches, and therefore we are not in the least surprised to hear that he has announced the evacuation of Richmond. Possibly a contraband, having seen large bodies of troops moving to the south of the James River, informed the Federal commander that the Confederates were evacuating the city, and the Federal commander believed the information, and transmitted it to the Government. At Washington it was thought so incredible that the Confederate capital, though not threatened with attack, should be evacuated, that pestilence was suggested as the only possible solution of the enigma.

General Pope is said to have driven two regiments of cavalry from Orange Court House, which is an outpost of the Confederate army at Gordonsville. We are not told that General Pope kept possession of Orange Court House.

The recruiting makes "little or no progress," and Mr. Lincoln has ordered 300,000 men to be drafted from the militia, and further notified that if the 300,000 who are already called for are not forthcoming by August 15, the deficiency will be made up by a special draft from the militia. In five weeks, notwithstanding the offer of liberal bounties, not more than 10,000 men have volunteered, and therefore the Government decides to press 600,000 men into the service. This enormous addition to the army is no doubt necessary for the prosecution of the war, but the wholesale conscription will be eminently unpopular and may probably be resisted.

The proclamation of the Federal Governor of Kentucky is considered treasonable. Where can Mr. Lincoln expect to find loyalty, if an officer elected under the pressure of a Federal army, is guilty of treason?

The intelligence from Vicksburg is important. An unsuccessful attempt has been made to capture the rain Arkansas, which resulted in severe damage to the Federal gunboats Queen and Essex.

Position of the Federal Armies.

THE new aspect of the war has brought about a marked change in the conduct of the Washington Government. Until lately every defeat was called a victory, and the Northern armies were represented as unconquered and unconquerable. Even after the seven days' battle the disaster of General McClellan was designated as a "brilliant strategic movement," and there were abundant assurances that his army was perfectly secure and would shortly advance on Richmond. Since then the Government has been dead-locked for recruits; and as soldiers have not been obtained by means of these glorious reports an opposite course is being tried. Confederate triumphs are not altogether ignored; the danger of General McClellan is paraded; General "Stonewall" Jackson is reported to be in half-a-dozen places at the head of large bodies of troops; and though the conquest of the South, if need be by the extermination of the Southerners, is still treated as an inevitable consummation, it is declared that more men are immediately required to accomplish the "manifest destiny." The appeal is in vain, and more than in vain. The Irish, Germans, and the scourgings of the Atlantic cities, which are the staple of the Federal army, did not enlist from any feeling of patriotism, but for pay, the prospect of plunder, the expectation of getting a share of the rich and fertile South, and from the promises held out that the war would be neither long nor bloody. But instead of booty they have ghastly wounds; instead of victory, death and disaster; instead of the subjugation of the Confederates being effected in a single campaign, at the end of the second campaign the North, after making tremendous sacrifices in men and money, is as far as ever from the attainment of its ambitious object. So the Irish, Germans, and scourgings of the Atlantic cities, refuse to recruit the army, not esteeming the large bounty as sufficient recompense for the dangers of battle and pestilence; and so far from this repugnance having changed by the avowal of danger, it is thereby intensified. They were ready to enlist for a triumphant march through the South, but if the Union is in danger she must look to herself. And, indeed, it is but fair that the native-born Americans of the North should take their turn. But will they? Only under compulsion; only if King Mob, tired of recruiting the army, insists upon their so doing. We do not mean that the best classes of the North lack courage, and that they would not defend their country and homes if invaded; but to risk their lives in an invasion of the South is another matter. They are patriotic enough to attend recruiting meetings; they do not mind expending a goodly sum in bounties; for the conquered South would be an inestimable treasure, and would save the North from ruin; but they are not patriotic enough to enlist at the bidding of Mr. Lincoln to help him in the war of aggression. The imminence of the crisis is admitted, yet after five weeks of ceaseless effort not more than 10,000 men respond to an urgent call for 300,000; and at Washington, as well as at St. Louis, the Irish are manifesting their unwillingness for fighting. It is not unusual for a country depending upon mercenary troops to be thus deserted in the hour of need.

The Washington Government proclaims the danger of General McClellan; and truly, they cannot easily conceal or exaggerate it. We are told, "the present position of General McClellan's army is said to be good for defence, but neither favourable for offensive purposes, nor for a retreat." Can we conceive a worse position for an invading army than being placed unfavourably for offensive purposes or retreat? Suppose its position for defence to be so good as to be impregnable, what then? Is it not a useless charge to the country? But General McClellan is not unassailable; and he must move, be the movement ever so disastrous and costly, or he must surrender. The remnant of the once great army of the Potomac is resting on the North bank of the James River, and from Richmond to the Federal camp the Confederates are masters of both sides of the river, and further up the river, on the other side of Richmond, they have massed an army of reserve, readily available for active operations. Such are the obstacles that make a Federal advance "unfavourable," not to say impossible. On one flank General McClellan is threatened by the Confederates on the south bank of the Chickahominy; a little to his rear and on his other flank, by the Confederates on the south bank of the James River. The latter position is particularly menacing. The stream that divides the armies is at that point narrow. McClellan occupies ground ten feet above the level bank of the river, but the Confederates, nearly opposite to him, occupy ground nearly 350 feet above the level bank of the river. With light artillery they have been able to shell a part of the Federal camp, and when their heavy guns are in position they will be able to shell a much larger portion, if not the whole, of the camp. Thus, on either flank he is harassed and menaced by the enemy, as well as in his front, and further, the enemy is in his rear threatening to cut off his supplies. These are the circumstances which render his position untenable, although it may be good for defence against an attack. We do not say that McClellan could resist a combined Confederate assault; on this point it is unnecessary we should offer any opinion; but we do say that McClellan cannot endure the state of siege. Well, since it is unfavourable to advance, and impossible for the army of the Potomac to remain where it is, what are its prospects of retreat? At a considerable distance in the rear of McClellan, on the south bank of the James River, the Confederates occupy some more elevated ground, which, being planted with heavy artillery, will give them the command of the James River, so far as the passage of transports is concerned. Let it be remembered that the Confederates on the Chickahominy, though nearer, are also in the Federal rear, and that on both rivers they can be easily reinforced from Richmond or from the army of reserve to which we have already referred. Thus McClellan is completely surrounded, and to add to his anxieties "a new Merrimac and another ram" have come from Richmond and put in an appearance at Turkey Bend. We will not speculate on the possibility or probability of these Confederate vessels emulating the exploit of the Arkansas, and defying and even repulsing the whole Federal fleet of gunboats; but their presence cannot fail to dispirit the army, and in the event of an attack from the land forces, preventing the Federal fleet assisting McClellan in his defence. Assuming, however, that the appearance of the "new Merrimac and another ram" is only a demonstration, and that the passage of the river is not rendered impassable by them, it is evident that McClellan's evacuation of his present position must be made under particularly unpromising circumstances. We will not paraphrase Northern arrogance, and say his escape is impossible, but we submit that an army was never more critically situated.

The other movements in Virginia, reviewed through Northern reports, are simply unintelligible. General Pope has taken the field, and, it is said, with 60,000 men, and that he has advanced beyond Warrenton. As usual, General Jackson is ubiquitous, though now it is confessed that nothing definite can be ascertained about him, and that it is uncertain whether he is going to attack McClellan or Pope. General Ewell is reported to be at Gordonsville, in command of a corps 30,000 strong—a position, be it remembered, which a few weeks ago was said to have been occupied by General Pope. The conclusion from these contradictory rumours is, that the Federals are quite in the dark as to Confederate movements, and that General Pope is not able to make a diversion to relieve McClellan from his perilous position.

In the West Federal affairs are not one whit more hopeful. Grand Junction has been occupied by the Confederates, who have also taken possession of the greater portion of the railroad between Memphis and Corinth. What now have the Federals gained from General Beauregard's withdrawal from the last named place? We have no news respecting Confederate movements in the neighbourhood of Nashville, and we may be sure that if the Federals had had any good news from that quarter it would not have been concealed. Kentucky, as well as Missouri, is again reported to be swarming with guerilla bands, and the Governor of Kentucky—the Federal Governor, be it observed—thinks the juncture so critical that he has convened the Legislature to consider the military condition of the State, the late action in reference to slavery, and for the purpose of devising measures for the protection of Kentucky institutions. The sole glimmering of Federal success in the West is a report that two guerilla bands have been repulsed—not a very unlikely or a very important triumph, when the whole country is swarming with such bands. These guerilla bands, we learn from the Confederate Secretary of War, are under the direct control of the Government, and so can be amalgamated into armies with facility; and these armies, if necessary, can be poured into Tennessee. The army in the West appears to us to be in as bad a plight as the army of the Potomac.

A body of Confederate troops have entered Florence, Alabama, destroyed the Federal stores, advanced along the line of railroad, and burnt large quantities of cotton to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy; they have also succeeded in capturing a part of General Mitchell's army. These successes are not only considerable in themselves, but they make it improbable that General Mitchell will be able to advance into Tennessee to assist the Federal army in that State.

The situation of Vicksburg is remarkable. Commodore Farragut has not taken his fleet to New Orleans, as was reported a short time since; but he no longer threatens Vicksburg, and his remaining near to that city, is in all probability, compulsory. Whether the report of his sending a flag of truce to General Van Dorn is true or false, thus much is certain, that the ram Arkansas did him considerable damage; that the sickness in his fleet is so great that half his crews are disabled; and that not only has the river receded so much as to prevent him operating against Vicksburg, if there were no other obstacle, but on the 25th of July it was estimated that there was only eighteen feet of water between Vicksburg and New Orleans; the draught of his larger vessels is sixteen feet, and the waters of the Mississippi were still steadily falling. In some respects the positions of Commodore Farragut's fleet and General McClellan's army are analogous. The fleet may be in a "good position for defence, but neither favourable for offensive purposes, nor for a retreat."

There is a startling rumour that the port of Mobile has been opened by ten Confederate gunboats, purchased in England. This, of course, is a fabrication, but it is not impossible that the port may have been opened by gunboats fitted out at Mobile. The Federals have no longer an undisputed naval supremacy. A few months ago Lieutenant Maury announced the formation of a Confederate fleet, and the announcement was received with a shout of derision in the North; and certainly to people who could not thoroughly appreciate the unswerving energy of the South, excited to the utmost by the presence of the hated invader, and the conviction that a fleet was indispensable to prevent the complete blockade of their rivers, it was not altogether unreasonable. But the Confederates have triumphed over the apparently insurmountable difficulties, and they have not only been enabled to equip formidable vessels of war, but they have found commanders whose skill and deeds of naval daring have covered the nascent Confederate fleet with glory.

The Cotton Manufacture and the Cotton Famine.

POLITICIANS, and especially official politicians, appear to take a very loose and inadequate view of the actual state of things in the manufacturing districts. The Ministerial measure of relief, the Ministerial speeches in its defence, the language held on all sides by, men not connected with the suffering counties, all indicate a general misapprehension of the nature and extent of the prevalent distress. Our leading statesmen do not love the Cotton interest; they will never forgive the triumph of the Anti-corn-law League, or forget the mortification with which some of them submitted to follow its guidance, and others opposed it in vain. Nor do they understand the condition and circumstances of this great industry; they have never been forced to study them; and we know that in these busy days a statesman has little leisure for political investigations which are not forced on his attention. Generally prosperous, Lancashire has in the worst times contrived to take care of itself. Even at the commencement of the present crisis, it was long before any serious cry of alarm from the threatened trade reached the ears of Cabinet or Parliament; it was long before any serious alarm was generally felt by the manufacturers themselves. The Session of 1861 closed before the pressure had reached the operatives, or affected wages. Throughout the autumn and winter the case became gradually worse; the majority of the manufacturers had been losing steadily since April, if not since January; their losses became more and more severe, until many of them found it necessary first to work half-time, and then to close their mills entirely. In the meantime the more fortunate few, who had hitherto contrived to make a small profit, began to lose. Gradually the price of cotton rose, and the amount of employment fell; and when Parliament met at the beginning of this year, it was notorious that the distress in Lancashire was great, general, and increasing both in extent and in severity. Still the Ministers remained incredulous, and their incredulity naturally influenced Parliament, conscious of their access to better and fuller information than private members enjoyed. The truth seems to be that from the first the Cabinet had treated the question as one for the management of a single Department; had conceived that the case was quite within the reach of the regular system of legal relief, and might be safely left in the hands of the Poor Law Board. Now, the Poor Law Board is likely to be more widely, elaborately, and obstinately mistaken on this subject than any other observer, official or private, because it has immediate access to a great store of information, and all that information is of a kind likely to mislead it entirely. It trusted to the returns from the Unions of the number of persons in receipt of parish relief. In agricultural districts, where the labourers are poorly paid and have no resources to fall back upon, the increase of pauperism may very fairly measure the diminution of demand for labour, and the consequent distress. Not so during the first six or nine months of distress in Lancashire. First, the people are accustomed to regular work at ample wages; and before they are really in a condition to come to the parish for aid, they may have been subsisting for a very considerable time upon half or less than half their usual wages. If, in any district, there are mills stopped which employ 2000 hands, and mills employing 8000 are running short time, it is clear that the amount of loss of wages, and consequent distress are not to be measured simply by the first number. Yet even of the 2000 a very small proportion will immediately find their way into the parish books. The Lancashire operatives have resources; they have savings; they have furniture; they have credit; they receive in many cases liberal and long-continued aid from their employers. When all these are exhausted, it is with extreme shame and passionate repugnance that they are forced to accept parish aid. In their eyes, the distinction between a duke and a day-labourer is trifling as compared with the distinction between a labourer and a pauper. Therefore, until a point has been reached which even yet is very far off; until half-time has entirely given place to closure, until all the resources of the people themselves and of private charity are exhausted, until the self-respect of the artisan yields to his own hunger and the hunger of his children, the increase of pauperism is no measure of the suffering endured. The disposition to rely on the evidence of the Poor

Law Returns has contributed to maintain the political world in ignorance of the amount, the generality, and the depth of that suffering; ignorance which time and information are gradually dissipating.

We believe the truth to be this. About 500,000 operatives are immediately engaged in the cotton mills, and these represent a population of about 2,000,000. Probably as many more are indirectly dependent on the same trade. A very small number, of the first class, employed in special branches of the trade, are still and may possibly remain in full work. Of the rest, some are employed for two or three days a week, under which circumstances the more fortunate of them—those whose families do not number many young children, and who have not many more mouths to feed than hands to earn—may contrive to live from day to day on their wages; having nothing wherewith to buy clothes, and no reserve for the increased expenses of winter. The majority are wholly unemployed; the half-employed will soon be in the same case. This state of things has endured for six months; for six months previously it had been gradually approached. The longer it lasts the more intolerable is the suffering it produces. At first, the more industrious or more thrifty contrived to meet the pressure by withdrawing from savings banks, or co-operative stores, the accumulations of better seasons. Then they had recourse to the credit always to be obtained—at whatever indirect expense—from the small shopkeepers, until the capital of the latter was exhausted, and they could give credit no longer. Finally, they must pawn or part with their furniture—break up the neat and comfortable homes which they had pinched and toiled to adorn, and in which they take an honourable and manly pride. They do this, and they do it without a murmur. Without one angry expression towards their masters, without a resentful feeling against the rich, without discontent or disloyalty towards the Government, they submit to ruin. They see their wives part with their humble finery, go shabbily dressed to Church, or walk out on Sundays in patched cotton garments—things which they feel as keenly as a poor curate or broken-down gentleman. They see their children insufficiently clad and scantily fed; see them grow pale with unaccustomed and unexpected want; and yet they are patient. It is only of degradation that they are impatient, only against pauperism that they murmur. And yet into that dreaded gulf must sink ere long nearly all the direct dependents of the cotton trade, and a large number of those connected with it in a secondary sense; for cotton is scarcely to be had, and, at present prices, that which can be had can hardly be worked.

Not only do people unacquainted with Lancashire generally underrate the extent and depth of the present wretchedness, they still more greatly underrate its permanent effects. There has been not merely a cessation of profits, but a very large waste of capital. First, the manufacturers have been, on the whole, working at a loss for eighteen months—at an enormous loss for the last nine or ten months. They are losing at least 5 per cent. when they resort to short time; at least 10 per cent. when they close their mills. In many cases the loss has been very much greater than this. In the hope of relief, manufacturers have kept their mills open when losing the whole amount paid in wages, or even more, partly out of kindness towards the workpeople; partly in order to keep their hands together until better times. While the mills stand, this consumption of capital is going on; and if the present state of things should last much longer, Lancashire must by this process of waste be permanently and severely impoverished. Next, the working classes of Lancashire had, at the beginning of the pressure, a great deal to lose. They had amassed very considerable sums, which were invested, and very well invested, in those "joint-stock companies" of the workman, the co-operative societies. Other large sums were in the hands of various friendly and benefit societies; a good deal of money was laid up in savings banks. The homes of the people were generally comfortable—much money had been invested there. The working classes, in fact, were capitalists on a small scale; and capital was raising them in character, in self-respect, and in social position. Now a great part of that capital is gone, and another year of the Cotton Famine will see it all swept away. It had seemed not improbable that the co-operative movement would introduce improvements of incalculable value into the relations between Capital and Labour; but the Cotton Famine threatens to swallow up the co-operative societies, and destroy in two years the laborious work of twenty. The operatives were learning thrift; they had become a saving class. but the Cotton Famine has untaught the lesson so hardly instilled. The savings of many a life-time of self-denial are now swept away at once; years of thrift fail to do more than delay the hour of inevitable pauperism. Who, with this text before him, will ever again preach thrift to the existing generation? Who, on such a theme, will find willing and believing hearers? It will be well if the experiences of this terrible season have not demoralized, as well as pauperized, the most intelligent, best, and most self-reliant class of English working men. Be that as it may, twenty-years will not repair the ruin which this distress, if prolonged for another year, will have wrought.

There is no possibility of remedy or relief but in a speedy, ample, and cheap supply of the indispensable staple. It must be speedy, or our manufacturing industry will be ruined, masters bankrupt, and operatives dispersed, before it comes; it must be ample, to give full work to mills which can use 50,000 bales a week; it must be cheap, for otherwise its quantity will be of little service. At present prices we cannot consume the cotton we have, for manufacturers cannot work it at a profit; and, therefore, the hope of some Job's Comforters, that present prices must bring a supply, is as unsatisfactory as experience has proved it erroneous. Whence is it possible, then, that a supply, cheap and abundant, may be obtained, and obtained in time to save the manufacture from perishing? It must be remembered that we have to take into account not merely our own demand, but that of the world at large; for foreigners have equal access with ourselves to the cotton fields and to the cotton market, whether on British soil or elsewhere; even if Liverpool take the place of New York and New Orleans, and become the sole cotton emporium, the foreign demand, as well our own, must be met in Liverpool. We have, then, to provide not 2,500,000, but about 5,000,000 bales a year. From whence?

First. There might be such encouragement given by the present prospects of the trade to cotton cultivation in Africa, Egypt, Brazil, and the West Indies, and perhaps in Australia, as might in time supply the required amount.

Secondly. The development of internal communications in India might open to us a cotton field of indefinite extent, supplying an inferior but abundant article.

Thirdly. It is possible that the American supply may yet be set free, in which case our need would be immediately and fully met.

We will pass over the innumerable doubts and difficulties which beset the question of increased cultivation in the minor cotton-fields. We will not even stop to point out that so long as the American stock exists, and the possibility of its release, and the resumption of cultivation, is not too remote to influence calculations, no prudent man will enter on so extensive a speculation as that of cotton-growing, liable to irremediable ruin if that possibility should be realized. We will simply remind our readers that both the former sources of supply—extended communication in India, and extended cultivation elsewhere—fail in the essential requisite of immediate availability. The creation of a new cultivation, or the large development of one already existing, requires not months, but years. The development of internal communication in India, however energetically carried out, must also be a matter of time—must occupy a very considerable period. As yet little or nothing has been done in either direction; it is not likely that much will be done during the next three or four years. Meantime, by depreciation, by wear and tear, by actual expenditure, the fixed and floating capital of Lancashire, engaged in the cotton manufacture, is wasting at the rate (at least) of 15 or 20 per cent. per annum. Before, from India or elsewhere, an adequate supply can be obtained, the manufacture will have perished from inanition, the capitalists will be without capital, the workpeople pauperized, starved, scattered, or driven to emigration.

Unless, then, the third resource can be rendered available—unless by some means our trade with the South shall be restored in time to encourage the planting of a sufficient crop in the spring of 1863, and to save the existing stock—it is not easy to escape the terrible conclusion, that the cotton manufacture of Lancashire must share the doom of the silk trade in Spitalfields and in Coventry; that it must be extirpated as it has extirpated the handloom trade, and die out amid the ruins of the wealth which it has created, and amid the agonies of a starving population whom it has called into being—to whom cotton is bread, and whom the Cotton Famine has already reduced to penury, to hunger, and almost to despair. Thankful that no part of a responsibility so awful rests upon us, we would earnestly entreat those who have the power, and have assumed the responsibility to consider well, before it be too late, the vastness of the ruin which a continuance of the present condition of affairs must spread over the most flourishing districts of England, and the impossibility of restoring an industry which it may even now be possible to save.

The Sheffield Manifesto.

THE press has been designated "the Fourth Estate;" and we would suggest that there is in this realm of England a very powerful institution which might appropriately be named "the Fifth Estate." We mean the political, we may almost say the parliamentary, campaign in the provinces, that lasts from the end of one session until the commencement of the next. The speeches delivered at corporation dinners, at county meetings, at agricultural shows, at institutes, everywhere, and on all possible occasions, by peers, ministers of the crown, and members of the House of Commons, exercise a vast influence on public opinion. English legislators are always held responsible for their words whether spoken in St. Stephen's, or out of doors—excepting, perhaps, the hustings' speech on the day of nomination—and therefore, after the session, when the restraining etiquette of the House, but not the individual responsibility, is removed, we can more readily ascertain the views of members. And be it observed, that views enunciated during the recess are avowed and repeated in Parliament. Mr. Roebuck's speech at Sheffield was not a mere after-dinner effusion, but a solemn declaration and manifesto of an influential member of the House of Commons—of a politician whose fame is European—of a gentleman whose inflexible integrity of purpose has made him respected by his political enemies, and loved by his political friends. The gravity of the occasion was increased by Mr. Roebuck's introductory remarks. He expressed his anxiety to speak in the presence of the Prime Minister, and said he had not spoken in the House of Commons that the House might not be held responsible for his utterances. The same feeling has restrained many members from fully expressing their sentiments on the American crisis; but now the ice is broken, and there will be no more such hesitation. Mr. Roebuck informed his auditors that he was "telling his careful thoughts of many months' consideration, which he had reserved for that occasion." Listening to the brilliant language of the Member for Sheffield was the First Minister of the Crown, who had received a gratifying ovation, because of his high office and his personal popularity. If Lord Palmerston thought the cheers that greeted his cautious remarks about American affairs were a sign that the people of this country are indifferent to the gallant efforts made by the South to secure independence—or to the injustice, brutality, and barbarism of the North—he must have been undeceived by the tumultuous applause that endorsed Mr. Roebuck's stern denunciations.

The hon. member confessed his former admiration for the United States, that in the ardour of youth he had looked upon it as the millennium of mankind, and that when he first heard of separation he deeply lamented the event. Yet he no longer regrets the separation, but, on the contrary, his present feeling is "one of rejoicing." He has found that an irresponsible people possessed of irresponsible power is not to be trusted; and with honourable frankness he declared, "a divided America will be a benefit to England; and it will not be a misery to any portion of their own country; it will be a good." Having commented on the uselessness of the Northern aggression, and disposed of the sham plea of slavery, Mr. Roebuck spoke of the violent and overbearing conduct of the North. And the actions of the Federal officers, especially such men as Butler, Mitchell, Turbin, and the ruffian who decreed and enacted the massacre of Mr. Lasley and his friends, proves that when the opportunity serves this bullying is supplemented by actual and savage brutality. The insolence of the North, not only in the press and Congress, not only in the insane hostility of the people, but in official acts, in insults to the British flag, in blockading a British port, in threatening an attack on Canada, has disgusted the people of this country, and made them agree with Mr. Roebuck's emphatic declaration, "The North will never be our friends." On the contrary, the hon. member truly remarked that "we can make friends of the South." "They are Englishmen; they are not the scum and refuse of Europe. I know what I am saying. They are Englishmen, and we must make them our friends." Of course, when Mr. Roebuck spoke of the "scum and refuse of Europe," he did not include the whole people of the North, but the dominant mob and the unscrupulous leaders thereof. How are we acting towards the kindred South? Lord Palmerston says we are maintaining a perfect neutrality; Mr. Roebuck recites the notorious fact that we are "supplying North America with every possible means of offence and injury to the South."

Mr. Roebuck, therefore, urged upon Lord Palmerston the duty of recognizing the South. He told him a hand held from Europe would stay the effusion of blood and waste of treasure, and that it would make happy the homes of many of our working men. All honour to those who thus care for the welfare of a class who, under the most trying circumstances, have exhibited heroic patriotism. Famine-stricken Lancashire artisans have not turned against their employers, because they know their employers are not responsible for the dearth of cotton. Let them not feel that any class is responsible for the prolongation of their sufferings for a single hour. Mr. Roebuck asks the noble lord to think of these suffering people and of their no longer happy homes. Surely not an unreasonable request. Surely the affliction of our artisans and their wives and children is as worthy of the consideration of the Prime Minister of England as is the sensitiveness of the New York mob.

The Two Campaigns.

WE do not purpose in this article to give a history of the war from its commencement until the end of the second campaign, for such a survey could not be compressed into our available space, and, moreover, the events are too fresh to be treated historically. Our desire is to point out a few prominent features, so that we may be able better to appreciate the present position and future prospects of the belligerents, by glancing at the past and its manifest results and lessons.

On April 15, 1861, Mr. Lincoln made a call for 75,000 men; but that he determined on hostilities before that date is unquestionable. Mr. Seward, on May 1, thus wrote to the Union Defence Committee: "There is not a word of truth in any of the newspaper reports of the armistice, made or proposed; that sort of business ended on the 4th March." That is, Mr. Lincoln's inauguration did away with any chance of a pacific solution, and from then until April 23, when the Confederate Commissioners received their answer, the Washington Government was, with unsurpassed duplicity, dallying with peaceful envoys when war had been fully determined on. The call of the Federal President was immediately responded to, and, further, the New York and other Northern Legislatures voted additional supplies of men and money. President Davis replied to this menacing attitude by calling for 32,000 men—2000 from Florida, and 5000 from each of the other States then comprising the Confederacy. This moderation is a remarkable proof that the South, even at that crisis, did not contemplate any aggressive movements; and so far from assuming a threatening position, the demonstration was purely defensive. With this fact before them, we do not wonder at the holiday alacrity with which the 7th New York Regiment of Militia marched down Broadway en route for Washington. On April 20, Northern excitement was increased by the burning of the Gosport navy-yard by the Federals, and Mr. Lincoln was enabled to get the additional troops he called for at the beginning of May. Notwithstanding these preparations, and the blockade of the James River and Hampton Roads, there was so little appearance of determined hostilities that it is not surprising the idea, that after all there would be no war, should have been entertained in Europe; but on May 24 the Rubicon was passed by the invasion of Virginia, the Mother of Presidents and the generous donor of Sovereign States, by Federal forces under General Mansfield; and that may be considered the opening act of the first campaign, though Mr. Lincoln's call for 175,000 men was the first act of the war. As soon as the Confederates became aware of the strength of the invading force, they withdrew from Harper's Ferry, and other frontier places, and massed their forces at and near Manassas Junction, so as to offer an effectual resistance to the contemplated Federal advance on Richmond. These movements were hailed by the North as joyful omens of the coming victory that was to crush out the "rebellion;" and the enthusiasm of the populace was further increased by the surrender of General Pegram, with 600 men, to Generals Rosencranz and McClellan. On the whole, the Confederates had the best of the preliminary skirmishing in Virginia; but, nothing damped the confidence of the Federals, and consequently, the complete defeat at the Battle of Manassas, commonly known as the Battle of Bull Run, was a terrible surprise. Bull Run was not merely a panic, and a rout, but it was a battle resulting in the defeat and ruin of an army. In its consequences it was an important, because a decisive battle. It proved the futility of the Federal policy of making a little war to conquer the rights and will of millions of a superior race, and it determined the North to go to war in earnest. In the South the victorious issue of the first great battle induced a feeling of confidence in the ultimate issue of this great struggle not to be shaken by reverses incidental to the war. On Europe the effect of Bull Run was tremendous, for it proved conclusively that the South had been grossly misrepresented by the North as to her spirit and physique. From that moment the dissolution of the Union was regarded as un fait accompli.

The Northerners were disappointed, not disheartened. They could afford to confess, and even exaggerate, their defeat, for their resources were unimpaired, we might almost say, untried. The miserable fiction of Union sentiment in the South was still credited by those who honestly wished the restoration of the Union. Resolute efforts were made to retrieve the disaster. The Irish, the Germans, and the scourings of the Atlantic cities, stimulated by the hope of plunder, readily enlisted, and a large army was collected. General McClellan was placed at the head of the Army of the Potomac, and in October displaced General Scott as Commander-in-Chief.

Whilst gigantic preparations were being made for the renewal of the attempt to advance to Richmond, there were not only numerous skirmishes in Virginia, but other important operations were in progress. On July 5, there was a battle between Governor Jackson of Missouri and Colonel Siegel, in which the Federals were compelled to retreat, but notwithstanding the loss of men, baggage, and position, they claimed the victory. On August 20, General Butler bombarded the fort at Hatteras Inlet, which was, after a sharp contest, evacuated by the Confederates. On September 10, the Confederates were defeated at Summerville. There was skirmishing in many places, but no decided engagements. The Federal Government, not being able to cope with their adversary on land, wisely determined to make an effort with their gunboats. On the 12th of that month, a naval expedition left Hampton Roads for Port Royal. This incident marks the termination of the first campaign. What had been the gains of the invaders, or the losses of the invaded? There is, we conceive, a large balance against the North. The South had been surprised, but not defeated. On the contrary, the army that was to overcome the rebellion had been subjected to a mortifying defeat. In other places Federal advantages had been fully compensated by Confederate advantages. It is an axiom of war that an invader who does not conquer is virtually conquered. Tried by this test, the North had failed in the first campaign; but, further, the North had really been beaten in the only great battle fought, and so beaten that the army was destroyed, for the participants in such a fight as that of Bull Run must be greatly demoralized. If the issue of the campaign did not warrant despondency, it certainly did not justify arrogant triumph and overweening confidence; yet, in November, General McClellan made a speech in Washington, in which he remarked, "the war cannot be long, but it might be desperate;" and about the same time Mr. Cameron, the then Secretary of War, made a speech at Astor House, in which, according to the summary telegraphed to Europe, he said "the day of reverses for the Federal army had passed. He urged the people to wait patiently till General McClellan's preparations were completed, and said that General would pledge his life on victory." We do not find fault with General McClellan for not redeeming his pledge.

The next campaign may be divided into three principal series of movements—the operations of the gunboats on the Mississippi, the proceedings of the army of the West, and the contest in Virginia. The achievements of the Virginia (Merrimac), the blockade of Southern ports, and the doings of the Sumter and Nashville, had an indirect, though important, bearing on the war; but with regard to naval matters, it will suffice to observe, that when we consider the smallness of the Confederate means for constructing a fleet to compete with the enemy, that to cover the celebrated Virginia they were obliged to use railroad iron, that in the whole of the Confederate States there is not a rolling mill, we may wonder that the South has been able to do so well as she has done. The Southerners have an hereditary fondness for the sea, whilst the Northerners do not take kindly to it, and even the mercantile marine of the United States, which is, or ought to be, the nursery of the navy, is largely recruited by foreign sailors.

The great success of the Federals on the Mississippi was the capture of New Orleans. It is true that this was due to natural causes beyond calculation and resistance, but it was not the less painful to the South. It has, however, turned out a worse than barren victory to the North. It made Charleston, Mobile, Savannah, and Vicksburg urgent in defence, and so far successful. It has demonstrated to the North and to Europe that there is no Union sentiment in the South, but that, on the contrary, the mere mention of a renewed connection with the North induces an expression of bitter loathing. The heroic bearing of the people under the infamous rule of General Butler is a Confederate triumph. The cotton burning that preceded the Federal occupation of New Orleans and Memphis was a terrible blow to the invading hordes, whose hopes of plunder were thus frustrated. To complete the list of Federal gunboat successes, we must record the taking of Port Royal, of Fort Henry, of Roanoke Island, of Fort Donnelson, and of Island No. 10. It has been said, and we think rightly, that the North has gained the most in the Mississippi; yet how valueless those gains have turned out. The attempts on Vicksburg, Charleston, and Savannah have been abandoned, and the fleet under Commander Porter has returned to the Hampton Roads, and Commander Farragut is reduced to a state of inactivity, and will, if he can, go to Memphis.

The campaign in the West may be very summarily described. On April 8 the Federals were defeated at Pittsburg Landing, and from then General Beauregard kept the army of General Halleck in inactivity until it was decimated by sickness, and surrounded and hemmed in by the enemy. Beyond the writing of despatches giving accounts of victories never gained and of captures never effected, General Halleck has done nothing, except to place his army in an unenviable position. The result of the Western campaign is a general uprising, and the paralysis of the Federal army. Kentucky is manifesting its detestation of Northern rule; in Missouri the Confederates are stronger than ever; and the Federal General has been driven out of Arkansas.

The war in Virginia has been exciting and brilliant. In that State the greatest efforts of both sides were made. The Confederate victories in the Shenandoah Valley, under General Jackson, were glorious, and all-important from their bearing on the fate of the army of the Potomac, for they deprived McClellan of reinforcements, and disconcerted the Federal plans. General McClellan has exactly followed the lead of his enemy, and has been most completely out-generaled. He remained before Manassas until the Confederates found it convenient to evacuate that place, and then the Young Napoleon discovered he had been kept at bay by wooden guns. He remained before Yorktown, making careful approaches, until it suited the Confederates to evacuate that position. In this case he followed the enemy with more daring, and was rewarded by some severe repulses. Lastly, he has been beaten at Seven Pines, or Fair Oaks; although his weakness was exposed by the celebrated cavalry exploit of Colonel Stewart, he remained before Richmond till the Confederates were ready to give him battle, and to drive him back for six days until the bleeding remnant of his army found rest under the shelter of the gunboats on the James River.

At the end of the second campaign we see the North despondent. The revenue has been taxed and strained to the utmost. Their great army is annihilated. The general who pledged his life on victory has been completely beaten. Instead of Richmond falling, Washington is supposed to be in danger; but the cry of "Wolf" has been raised once too often, and the President calls in vain for another army. The whole South has become a hostile camp. Not only is there a total absence of Union sentiment, but an unmistakable resolve on the part of the South to achieve independence at any sacrifice of property or life. Both campaigns have resulted triumphantly to the South, but the latter is by far the most significant, because it shows that, after unparalleled sacrifices in men and money, the North has not made any step towards the conquest of the South. At the end of the first campaign gold and recruits were abundant; at the end of the second campaign there is no likelihood of recruiting the army, except by a conscription; and gold is at 17 per cent. premium, silver at 15 per cent. premium; even the copper currency has failed, and the Government have issued notes for half a cent.

We have continually to record heart-sickening instances of Federal atrocity. We confine ourselves to those cases that are authenticated by Northern witnesses and reports, and they are sufficiently numerous and savage to make the name of the United States execrable. We were mistaken in supposing that General Butler's infantry would be without parallel.

Last week we noticed the outrage sanctioned by General Mitchell, perpetrated under the orders and personal direction of a Federal colonel, and as yet not condemned by the Federal Government. We could not dwell upon the diabolical scene enacted at the girls' school; such a deed cannot be described in print, and can only be spoken of amongst men with bated breath. The massacre at Monroe, Missouri, though peculiarly horrible, demands no such reticence.

The tragedy, even when told in the limits of a newspaper paragraph, is terribly graphic. Mr. James M. Lasley was returning from church, with his wife and children, and accompanied by some young ladies and gentlemen, who were visiting at his country house. When Mr. Lasley reached his home he found it in possession of Federal soldiers, but he advanced without fear. What should he fear, seeing that he had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, and was under a heavy bond? Suddenly he was stopped, and ordered to go to Palmyra. Still the unfortunate gentleman had no thought of danger to his life, and asked for permission to go into the house to get a thicker coat. He was told the coat he had on would do. He was then seized, together with Mr. Ridgeway, the only son of aged parents, and a poor boy fifteen years old, the young son of a widow lady; and the three victims were placed in front of the Federal lines. Mark the infernal barbarity of every detail of the proceeding; till the last the pretence of a journey to Palmyra was kept up, so that the murdered men and boy might not have an instant to prepare for death. As soon as Mrs. Lasley saw the position in which her husband was placed, a horrible presentiment of the awful tragedy that was to ensue flashed across her mind, and she rushed forward, but was kept from her husband by the soldiers. The officer in command for a few minutes amused himself with grossly insulting Mr. Lasley and his friends; then he gave the order to fire, and Mr. Lasley, in the presence of his wife and children, fell dead, as did the boy Price, the young son of the widow. Mr. Ridgeway, the only son of his aged parents, was wounded, and rushed into the adjoining woods, whither he was instantly pursued and butchered.

Any comment on this narrative would be worse than superfluous.

"BREVITY is the soul of wit." The truth of this well-worn adage was never better illustrated than it is by a letter written by the eminent Lieutenant Maury to a friend in France, and which we reproduce in another page. This letter, which opens with a dignified and touching avowal of patriotic devotion, cannot fail to produce a deep impression upon Europe. With wonderful conciseness and admirable clearness, it eloquently reviews the position of the belligerents at the commencement of the struggle; the conduct of the Federals, the sham plea of humanitarianism, the resources of the South, the large benefits derived by the North from the late connection, the defensive attitude of the Confederacy, and the much-vexed question of intervention. The condition of the Southern army just before and even at the Battle of Manassas completely answers the malicious and vindictive charge of Southern conspiracy and preparation; and shows the indomitable energy and determination of the people in facing and overcoming such difficulties. The exposure of the Northern trick of forging Southern newspapers will account for many seeming inconsistencies, and be a caution not to believe any Southern extracts that appear in the Federal press, nor, indeed, any Southern newspapers that are not received direct from the South, and not through the agency of the United States' Post-office. This newspaper juggle is surely the coup de grace of Northern deception. The account of the "cute dodge" will be found in Lieutenant Maury's letter elsewhere given; it is however, sufficiently significant and important as a warning to be here repeated.

Happily, for the cause of truth, you, in Europe, are beginning to find the Yankees out, and to understand their mendacious proclivities. They know it, and have recently resorted to a "new dodge." You have ceased to believe their newspapers, and have begun to find out that their representations of the Southern cause, of Southern prowess, sentiments, and feelings are not to be depended on; so they now send you what purport to be Southern papers; but they are counterfeits printed in the North.

They will take one of our Richmond papers, for instance, duplicate its form and type, copy its advertisements, fill its reading columns with their own inventions, give it the Richmond imprint, and send it abroad as a bona fide Southern paper which you will be sure to believe. From this counterfeit their own papers are filled with extracts credited to the Richmond papers. Thus the designing men there still seek to deceive their own people and the world.

They boast of this as one of their "cute Yankee tricks." They are a curious set.

The Yankees, in this war, have equalled the Chinese in falsehoods. Their generals lie to their soldiers, to one another, and to their Government, and their Government to the world.

THE exploit of the ram Arkansas is one of the most curious and startling incidents of the war. When the Virginia (Merrimac) made her memorable debut in the Hampton Roads, and achieved a success which set the Governments of Europe thinking about the immediate reconstruction of their navies, it was supposed, the affair having settled the question of the superiority of iron to wood, that there would not be another such surprise unless another iron-clad vessel encountered a wooden fleet. But here we have the ram Arkansas damaging a fleet of iron-clad gunboats, and gaining a victory against overwhelming odds, from which we may learn that since a single ram may pass through an iron-clad fleet, we cannot dispense with the protection of iron-clad batteries. In another part of our impression will be found an account derived from Federal sources, and we direct attention to the skill, coolness, and courage displayed in the execution as well as in the plan of the exploit. The gallant commander of the Arkansas richly merits the praise bestowed upon him by the Confederate Government. The substitution of iron for wood in naval warfare does not render daring and ability less conspicuous and effective.

Reviews.

A NORTHERN VIEW OF THE AMERICAN WAR.*

"In the name of the Prophet—nothing!" The mountain has been in labour and has not brought forth so much as a mouse. All the ideas in the Count de Gasparin's book are plagiarized from the orations of Wendell Phillips and from such authors as Mr. Olmsted; all his prophecies have been falsified by the events of the last four months; and as for the principles promised in the title page, we have not been able to find a vestige of them, unless the author refers to the practice of naming black white and white black, as a principle. We cannot call the volume before us a hash of stale Northern advocacy, because a literary hash implies some skill in cooking up old materials; and the Count de Gasparin may, for ought we know, be very skilful as an agriculturist; but in "America before Europe" he does not manifest the slightest aptitude for authorship. Nor should we be justified in designating this work a compilation, because the word "compilation" conveys some idea of arrangement; and the only approach to order we can perceive is in the table of contents. However, this book has the merit of being harmless, excepting that it is rather profane in frequently quoting the name of God and the principles of Christianity in support of suggestions palpably false. Moreover, "America before Europe" is extremely funny, but the humour is a lucky accident, and not due to the ability of the author, for it consists in its being read when its dull oracles have been falsified by events. There are one or two references to a book published last year, the "Uprising of a Great People." We confess we have not read Count de Gasparin's first deliverance on the American war, but we have read the present volume from the beginning to the end, and any one of our readers who may in this respect follow our example will be convinced that the virtue for which Job is celebrated flourishes in the nineteenth century of the Christian era. The author's style is beyond criticism; but the pungency and dignity of his sarcasm may be inferred from the instance of his always speaking of the President of the Confederate States as Jefferson Davis, and of the President of the United States as Mr. Lincoln.

According to his own admeasurement, Count de Gasparin is a very great man, a huge Colossus; yet he professes to be modest, peculiarly modest, and to have no desire to boast of his second sight. In page 3 he proclaims to the pigmies of the earth, how in 1860 he said there would be an uprising of a great people, and that the American people have arisen. It is not the Count's fault that some millions of persons prophesied the same thing at the same time; it was exceedingly naughty of the dogs to bark when Sir Oracle was about to hold forth. Now and then our author throws off his modest mask, and grandiloquently parades the immensity of his powers. Here is a specimen:—

Do not fear. I shall cite neither Grotius, nor Puffendorf, nor Vattel, nor Burlamaqui. I am not a juriconsult, although I have studied legal points like others, and the debates of the Council of State have familiarized me with that sort of discussion. Let us lay aside the rubbish of schools, and use the language of common sense.

Some men despise learning because they are ignorant. Not so the Count de Gasparin. He is well up in Puffendorf, Vattel, and the host of them; although not a vulgar juriconsult, he has studied the points, his senatorial wisdom has familiarized him with that sort of discussion. But, good people, all the learning of the world is rubbish compared to the common sense of our author. The Count de Gasparin "has laid aside the rubbish of the schools," but it happens, unfortunately, that "his language of common sense" is unintelligible.

Our author is inconsistent, and his opinions undergo a wonderful change in twelve pages. At page 7 we read:—

We would have said that Europe leaped with joy at the thought of reading the United States in twain. From the first moment, she seemed to cling to this idea, and to be unwilling to renounce it.

Turning to page 19 we find these words:—

The first impulse of Europe was warmly in favour of the North; its right, at least, was doubted by no one. * * * Our convictions have become modified by degrees, and we have repented of our first innocence.

The only way of reconciling the above passage is to assume that the author believes that "the first impulse of Europe was warmly in favour of the North," because "Europe leaped with joy at the thought of reading the United States in twain." If this is his meaning, the Count de Gasparin is the most candid Northern partizan we have encountered; if not, his meaning is involved in impenetrable obscurity.

In the preface we read:—

I owe thanks to those persons from whom I have been continually in the receipt of information of all kinds. I have been particularly gratified with the collection of official documents which the Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, has had the kindness to send me.

What the documents are is information not vouchsafed to us, but if "America before Europe" is in any degree a reflex of them, the European estimation of United States' official documents is fully confirmed. Still, we would not, if we could, shatter the faith of Count de Gasparin in the documents emanating from the Washington Government. Such simple faith must greatly comfort him, and it hurts no one. When he heard of his demi-god, General McClellan, being driven from before Richmond, losing his artillery and numbers of men, what a satisfaction he must have derived from hearing officially that it was "a brilliant strategic movement," and from Mr. Lincoln, that the army of the Potomac "had not been whipped, and never would be whipped."

The sum of Count de Gasparin's opinions is this:—Secession is a wicked rebellion to support slavery, and the North is a holy, virtuous, unselfish nation, making enormous sacrifices to benefit the negro whom it so fondly loves. Europe ought to have cursed the South, and not lost "the single occasion of seconding otherwise than by words the most glorious work of modern times." Europe has neglected her duty from envy of the beautiful system of Government of the United States, and its results. The war would not have gone on if Europe had refused to recognize the belligerent rights of the South, which recognition was extremely wicked. The conduct of England has been unexceptionably bad; "through misapprehension of America, England has ceased to be England;" but what England has become the Count de Gasparin does not inform us. In the Trent affair Captain Wilkes was a little out of order, but England was monstrously in the wrong, and the Governments "at Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Vienna, and Turin, as they were unanimous in deciding the technical question of right against America, so were they unanimous in deciding the moral question against England." The South Carolinians hate the people of New England because "freedom of speech, freedom of the press liberty of labour, everything that wounds the susceptibilities of slaveholders, is found in the frontier

* America before Europe: Principles and Interests. By COUNT ALEXANDRE DE GASPARIN. Translated from advance sheets by MARY L. BOOTH. London: Sampson Low, Son and Co.

States, peopled by Roundheads." The suspension of the habeas corpus Act and the censorship of the press in the United States must, of course, be myths. The South can be brought back into the Union. As for the burning of cotton and tobacco, "this doubtless will not be done." The currency of the South is "paper rags, and nothing else." The author omits to add that in the North such a thing as a paper currency is unknown. The general impression that the present is a war between the United States and the Confederate States is erroneous. "It is true that this is not a war of the North against the South, but of the United States against Europe." And many other equally astounding propositions may be found in the book before us; but possibly our readers have had enough of Count de Gasparin's opinions.

Our author speaks of the South finding the Northerners "brothers in country, religion, and blood." Certainly invasion, robbery, and confiscation are very brotherly acts. The Count de Gasparin applauds the way in which the war has been conducted. "Upon the whole there has been fighting [wonderful admission!]; but the horrors which have polluted civil wars have been avoided with care." There is nothing horrible in the conduct of General Butler. There is nothing horrible in an officer permitting his soldiers to treat schoolgirls in a way that cannot be written. There is nothing horrible in butchering a man before his wife and children without an hour's warning, or in shooting a boy fifteen years' old in cold blood.

The Count de Gasparin finished his work on March 4, and being fully assured the United States would prevail, he wrote as follows:—

It is for them to demonstrate by facts that these are so many calamities. Their armies are ready, their fleets are built. The season favourable to operations in the South has arrived, the question is to go forward with energy, and inaugurate an era of brilliant successes. At the price which their war is unfortunately costing them, it is necessary that it be short, under pain of its becoming impossible. Their paper currency disquiets their best friends. They have a few months of real security before them—a few months, and no more. Let there be no illusion on this point! If in a few months the superiority of the North be not established, if the issue of the conflict remain in the least doubtful, seditious interests will, perhaps, intervene in favour of the South.

To act to day, therefore, to act quickly, to act energetically—such is the first article of their programme.

And this is now their second—in case that, contrary to all appearances, the campaign which is about to open should not result in the brilliant triumph of the North; in case that, contrary once more to all appearances, the decisive successes of the North, and the measures taken by it for the progressive abolition of slavery in the conquered South, should not bring forth the manifestation of the Union sentiments now suppressed, it would then be necessary to take one of those difficult resolutions which a great people should know how to adopt at need. To take necessities into account, to see things as they are, to be resigned to what cannot be helped, is also to serve one's country.

He who is resigned too soon is cowardly: he who is resigned too late is in danger of entering into conflict with the very designs of God. Perhaps God has willed precisely the course that grieves us most; perhaps, according to His sovereign plans, emancipation must be wrought by separation; perhaps the South must be chastised by its victory; perhaps the uprising must be accomplished by great sorrows.

If this should be unhappily true, it would be wisdom to recognize and become resigned to it. After an unfortunate or inefficient campaign, when the mediation of Europe should be offered (and it would be in this case, without doubt), when the question would be to order new Treasury bonds, to brave ruin, to hasten to bankruptcy, to defy the great allied Powers, to undertake a new war, a colossal war, a hopeless war, good citizens would be those who should counsel peace.

Will Mr. Seward follow the advice of his friend? Will the North obey the counsel of one of its most unscrupulous partisans? What possessed Fortune to make the unpalatable advice so applicable. Even the Northern vindicator admits the time has come for mediation.

We will conclude by quoting "a Jubilee Song" which is sung secretly in the South, 1862 being the year of jubilee. The following is the chorus:

"In eighteen hundred and sixty two,
My people must be free;
It is the year of jubilee,
My people must be free."

The tune to which this doggerel is sung, in the Count de Gasparin's heated imagination, is not stated, but probably it is the popular melody of "Bow, wow, wow."

On the Recognition of the Southern Confederation. By JAMES SPENCE, Author of "The American Union," and the S. Letters to the Times. London: Richard Bentley.

MR. SPENCE'S pamphlet is marked by that logical acumen, and is written with the clearness and animation that together make his works both popular and convincing. In forty-eight pages we have a lucid résumé of the principal claims of the South to be recognized, and a refutation of the objections urged against recognition; an unanswerable historical argument to show that the United States cannot be the first nation to recognize the South; and it is shown that the policy as well as the duty of England is to recognize the Confederation without delay. A lengthened review of Mr. Spence's pamphlet in the columns of THE INDEX is needless; but we quote his concluding remarks, which are particularly pertinent at the present crisis.

Why should we procrastinate? Winter will not procrastinate, nor the hunger of hundreds of thousands. The last Poor Law Returns shows within certain districts 141,560 paupers, and these, as representing the usual average of three persons, give 424,680 souls now in beggary. That return, too, shows an increase of 1760 paupers, or 5280 souls, in the previous week, and this will now go on at an accelerating rate. Even this represents but a part of the misery; and those who doubt this may read the account of the poor widow who died last week in London of absolute starvation rather than beg. Are we to shrink from trouble or evade responsibility with this before us? the existence of the famishing, the welfare of commerce, the claims of humanity, the laws of nations, the interests of America—all demand our decision. Beyond all, it is our duty. We have no right to say to the people of the South, "We know you have an established Government, but we decline to own the knowledge; we see you are independent, but it is our policy to be blind; we witness your gallant effort for self-government, and are certain of your success; but waste another hundred thousand lives, impoverish yourselves still more, and at some quite convenient season we will acknowledge you." Instead of this, our duty is to say, "We have just acknowledged, and at once, the right of Tuscans and Neapolitans to change their Government when they deemed it essential to their happiness to do so. We cannot dispute the same right with those of our own kin. Justice requires us to take the same course in America as in Europe, holding in respect the wishes of a people in preference to the claims of discarded Governments, and it requires us without fear or favour to recognize as a fact what all the world knows to be a fact—that the Southern States are now a distinct community or nation, with an organized Government, in conformity with their will, and a power that entitles them to respect as well as recognition."

FRANCE AND THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

PARIS, August 12.

SIR,—You naturally desire to know how the American question progresses here, and as far as I can I will give you the information. Everybody in and out of official circles is satisfied that the Emperor and his Ministers are and have been most seriously considering the expediency and propriety of an immediate recognition of the Confederate States, and the very delay which has taken place in giving Mr. Slidell his answer, shows very strongly the delusion under which Lord Russell labours in supposing his policy identical with that of France.

Au contraire, all the official persons on this side most unreservedly say that the only stumbling block to that recognition, as far back as Bull Run, was, and continues to be, the adhesion of the British Cabinet to what, with a plagiarism from John C. Calhoun, "it terms" "masterly inaction." Mr. Calhoun's phrase was "masterly inactivity"—and he never had occasion to apply it to a civil war, where it tied the hands and closed the eyes and ears of a great and generous people to the sufferings of their own kindred abroad, and their own brethren at home.

There is also good reason to believe that the Ruler of France does not look with the same philosophic composure on the great drama which has both continents for its theatre, and has determined that the frenzy of the North shall have its limits. This is the more remarkable, inasmuch as France has no Nassau nor Bermudas in a state of blockade; nor has the Seine lately seen, like the Mersey and Southampton waters Northern cruisers watching to pick up British ships under British colours sailing from one British port to another. Both Frenchmen and Englishmen over here regard with intense astonishment the long-suffering and patience of Lord Russell under these circumstances.

It is believed here that the British Cabinet was divided in opinion equally on the question, Lord Palmerston standing neutral. People think it very strange that the answers of France and England should not have been conjoint, and after consultation; neither of which seems to have been the case: and as the entente cordiale was badly strained by the Mexican rupture, so it is thought the last strands may give way on the American imbroglio. Indecision is not a characteristic of Napoleon III., and his silence means more than much talking of smaller men.

It will require, however, all his confidence in the energies of France to intervene in the American question at this moment, for the Mexican war is to be actively prosecuted against a people and a country difficult to subjugate and flushed with success; and the Garibaldi insurrection looms like a thunder cloud over Italy and Europe.

The special interest which the Emperor has in Rome makes this a matter of vital importance to France, and it would require heroic courage to abdicate at this moment another difficulty to those already existing.

But of the sympathy of the Emperor's Government we are well assured; even should external causes prevent its actual demonstration for the moment, it will not be long delayed, and Lancashire may yet have cause to bless the foreigner it has so often banned under the teachings of Demagogues, who love their own political consistency more than the interests and lives of their people.

If I state clearly and broadly the reasons which may prevent immediate recognition, do not understand me to allege that any actual decision has been arrived at by the French Cabinet; for it is the universal belief that the matter is still under anxious deliberation, and the coup that may startle even "masterly inaction" in England may even now be planning in a brain fertile of surprises. But while every mail brings us tidings of new Confederate successes and new Federal reverses, we can afford to practise patience, even though the blood of our brothers calls from the ground against Europe for its inhuman delay. It will not, however, tend to inspire in the hearts of the citizens of either section of what were once "the United States" any sentiments of lively affection or gratitude towards the only nation which speaks the same language and boasts itself progenitor of the Young Giant.

Of other matters now transpiring I have little to tell you.

The Emperor and all his Ministers are now in Paris, and on the 17th or 18th he will again leave for Châlons. Before that time, his programme for the American question will be known. The new journal, La France, under the direction of La Guéronnière, and (as is supposed) under the indirect inspection of the Emperor, is making quite a sensation. In yesterday's issue appeared an editorial on the South and Slavery, which you shall have translated for your next paper. There are also publications on the same subject, of which you shall have a review. The name of the new journal has been made a subject of dispute by another journal here, the Union, which claims to have incorporated a forgotten journal of that title years ago.

Apropos of the same subject, the troubles of the new mammoth hotel have been really farcical. Firstly, it had to drop the name of Paris, after a law-suit, for which it substituted "Paris." Being threatened with three law-suits by three establishments so styled, it has at last despaired of finding any name unappropriated, and, by circular from its proprietor, is henceforth to be called "Grand" only.

Yours, &c.,

A

FEDERAL OUTRAGES.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—The events of the week past have been extremely encouraging. The notion of Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, whose sound and temperate views always entitle his remarks to the highest consideration, elicited from Lord Palmerston a view of the right of the Federal cruisers to interfere with legitimate trade, which it required more than even the unscrupulous advocacy of the great Government supporters to stomach; while his allowance of the monstrous proceedings at New York with regard to the destination of merchandise imported in American bottoms, shows how much reliance is to be placed in the only remedy Her Majesty's Ministers propose to apply, viz., remonstrance to such men as now rule despotically in that happy country which we call, diplomatically, the United States. Again, it hardly required Mr. Roebuck's energetic denunciation at Sheffield of the disgraceful force which Lord Palmerston calls "neutrality," to express the feeling among men of sense and propriety, that our present neutral position most cruelly weighs in favour of the side which all honest and honourable men and women of England abhor, and against the cause the success of which they all earnestly pray for. But what are we to say of the news which last week brought us of the proceedings in what is supposed to be a State remarkable for Union feeling? Can any language be strong enough to denounce such a warfare? And English readers must be well aware that these events, which from time to time eke out, are by no means isolated instances of brutality. What do Englishmen think of the agony of poor Mrs. Lasley, who saw her husband slaughtered; and of the cause which has fostered the officers who permit such murders, if they do not expressly authorize them? And yet we are ordered by Her Gracious Majesty the Queen and Mother of England to hold our hands. How long? Is not the Government responsible which endorses such proclamations as General Pope's? As the Times leader of Aug. 11 puts it, "the tone of recent public documents do give too much probability to the occurrence of such murders as Mr. Lasley's. Mr. Lincoln himself has, in a solemn proclamation, declared war against private property, and has instructed his invading soldiery to take what they require from their vanquished enemies. How largely this license will be interpreted we need not suggest;" and adds most significantly, "there is a step lower to which even this war may degenerate; and that is, to wholesale butcheries in cold blood under the name of reprisals." Look, again, at Mr. Roebuck's words:—"I say that the conduct of the North in its endeavour to cement the union, and reunite the States of America, is an immoral proceeding, totally incapable of success. You may say 'No, no,' but I have prophesied before, and now I tell you that they can never be united; and that the light they are now maintaining is a mere shedding of blood and wasting of treasure for no earthly purpose whatever." Shedding of blood and wasting of treasure!—the blood shed is that of boys of fifteen, and peaceable men of family in the very presence of their wives and children returning from worshipping God in their parish church; and the treasure is the bread of honest and hardworking men who have no more to do with this wicked war than the poor operatives of Lancashire. The history of Spain and Prussia can tell us the certain Nemesis that follows the vile maxim of making war support itself. And if it failed there, if it recoiled with tenfold violence upon the heads of those who tried it with overwhelming powers on a beaten and hostile country, how can it fail to exact a more bitter, a more dire retribution, in a defiant and victorious country of men speaking the same language, and knowing all the thousand means whereby to wound and destroy those whom their quondam relationship invests with the bitterest hate—that of brothers. And yet Lord Palmerston cannot find stronger anticipations than these:—"We may hope, as all evils must have an end, that better feelings and more charitable sentiments may make way on the other side of the Atlantic. And, although hitherto there has appeared no relenting of the animosities between the contending parties, we may devoutly pray that peace may at length arise out of this afflicting contest, and that another year may not see the continuance of that effusion of blood which now deluges the American continent." And we may pray—many a poor wife and mother in that wretched country hopes and prays till her heart aches with apprehension. But men with arms in their hands do more than hope—they dare; and long before Peace has any chance of spreading her golden wings, the red dogs of war will lap up the blood of tens of thousands who are following the dishonoured standard which has finished its career of insult to Europe by waving over the destruction of its own noblest and most honoured dominion. The sympathy with the South, which has increased from the very first day of the contest, till it now undeniably embraces all England, is fast changing into bitter disgust and indignation at the butchery perpetrated in the name of liberty and law. The Parliamentary Session has closed with the urbanity which was forced upon both parties by the desire of the nation to avoid disturbing the Queen's private sorrow. But this indignation will find a louder vent than the polite phrases of St. Stephen's, and the Washington Cabinet will do well to look to it. They have sown the wind, and most assuredly will they reap the whirlwind.

AN ENGLISH SYMPATHIZER.

LIEUTENANT MAURY ON THE AMERICAN STRUGGLE.

A recent number of the Richmond Daily Enquirer contains the following letter from the pen of the above distinguished man:—

My Good Friend,—Your excellent letter of August last has reached me only now. Notwithstanding its long tarrying by the way, I hasten to thank you for it with all my heart, and to assure you that its kind words and generous sentiments have lost none of their force by the lapse of time.

I hope you will not think me insensible to the honours with which you tell me I would be welcomed in Europe, if, at present, I appear deaf to your assurance of their high import.

It is true that the role which, up to this time, I have been permitted to play in the great drama which my country is enacting before the world, is humble; still our cause is just; to me the blood of my children has consecrated it, it is precious to my heart. All I have and all I own are in it; therefore, I prefer to tarry here—a refugee from my home and my little ones—watching and waiting.

That we have no navy is also true. Nevertheless, something may turn up. Chance may throw opportunity in my way. If so, here I am in place, and here I prefer to tarry, content to wait upon events, and patiently to bide my time.

It has now been but little more than a year since this war was forced upon us. We, on our part, had to commence it without an army, without a navy, and even without a governmental organization.

On the other hand, the enemy, surrounded with all the appliances of war, and complete in his organization, arranged his legions for battle and rejoiced in his strength.

We found ourselves, purely an agricultural people, cut off from the world and suddenly thrown upon our own resources, while he was backed by all the appliances that the workshops of Europe could supply or that commerce could furnish. Notwithstanding this, our people bravely and deliberately resolved to withdraw from all political association with the North, and to accept the consequences, be they what they may.

There was no haste, coercion, or intimidation about this move. Never was the popular will more fairly expressed than when the Southern people uttered their voice for secession.

Our enemies have sought to make the impression abroad that the reverse was the case; that this so-called "Rebellion was hatched by a faction, and is led by a few fire-eaters." No such thing. We were pushed into it, all unprepared as we were, by the tyranny and the usurpations and the factions of the North.

In every Southern State the people were regularly consulted on the question of separation from the North. They expressed their opinions freely, and after full deliberation; and never were people more unanimous at any ballot box than were ours for instant, complete, and eternal separation from the North; and that, too, at the instant, all unprepared as they were. There is now no Union feeling in the South, but the Yankees would fain have you believe that there is.

It is a fact not generally known abroad, but I may state it now, that when this war commenced, and even after we had assembled an army in the field, such was the want of preparation, and such the lack of munitions of war on our part, that there was not only not a percussion-cap machine in the Confederacy, but when the army of Manassas took up its position it had but four rounds to the man. Had the enemy joined battle with us there a few weeks sooner than he did, we should, for the want of percussion caps, have had to quit the field or fight him entirely with the bayonet.

But see what we have accomplished in the way of preparation. At this moment the great army of the North, said to be the most superb with equipments that the world ever saw—an army which we have stood still and permitted the enemy to raise, and discipline, and to bring against us at leisure—that grand army, before which our capital was to fall and our people succumb, is now driven from its trenches, routed and flying before our braves—armed, some with flint locks, some with fowling-pieces, some with percussion, and all of divers patterns, just as we could fabricate or rake and scrape them together. This fighting and fleeing has been going on since yesterday week.

In all probability you and the whole of Europe will first hear of it as a great Yankee victory, for your first intelligence of it will be from the North.

Happily, for the cause of truth, you, in Europe, are beginning to find the Yankees out, and to understand their mendacious proclivities. They know it, and have recently resorted to a "new dodge." You have ceased to believe their newspapers, and have begun to find out that their representations of the Southern cause, of Southern prowess, sentiments and feelings are not to be depended on, so they now send you what purport to be Southern newspapers; but they are counterfeits printed in the North.

They will take one of our Richmond papers, for instance, duplicate its form and type, copy its advertisements, fill its reading columns with their own inventions, give it the Richmond imprint, and sent it abroad as a bona fide Southern paper, which you will be sure to believe. From this counterfeit their own papers are filled with extracts credited to the Richmond papers. Thus the designing men there still seek to deceive their own people and the world.

They boast of this as one of their "cute Yankee tricks." They are a curious set.

The Yankees, in this war, have equalled the Chinese in falsehoods. Their generals lie to their soldiers, to one another, and to their Government, and their Government to the world.

About a month ago the heart of all Yankeeedom was made by General Halleck to rejoice over the reported capture by Pope of 10,000 men and 15,000 stand of arms, from Beauregard's rear; when these 10,000 prisoners, with the 15,000 stand of arms, had no more existence in reality than Falstaff's men in buckram. A friend of mine brought up Beauregard's rear. He waited and offered Pope battle, but Pope made no attack except upon a train of cars with a few sick.

You recollect that Mr. Lincoln reported to his Congress last December that he had an army of 667,000 men already raised to "crush out the rebellion"; and that France and England were asked to wait ninety days, when they should have plenty of cotton.

Now let us inquire where that army is, for I have never been able to make it out. You know that we have never pretended to have on our side more than 400,000 men in the field at any one time, and that in every advance that Lincoln has attempted to make upon us he has been brought to a stand-still, or driven back as soon as he parted from his ships and gunboats. Neither Hunter in Georgia, nor Benham in South Carolina, nor Burnside in North Carolina, have found themselves in sufficient force to advance against us. Halleck had to be called with his army from Missouri to reinforce Buell, so as to enable him to advance upon Beauregard at Corinth, where we have held the two armies in check for months. Butler has not been enough to venture out of New Orleans—and our Jackson, with an army all told of not over 21,000, drove the Yankee Banks out of the Valley of the Shenandoah two or three weeks ago. With this small force he created such a panic in Washington that Lincoln called out the militia by telegraph to defend his capital. He also called General Fremont with his "division," from the mountain, and McDowell with his from the Rappahannock, to reinforce Banks, and hold in check this handful of Confederates, while McClellan, with his "grand army," has been chased from Richmond.

Either we are superior to the Yankees in prowess as two to one, or they have lost in this war since December last, not less than a quarter of a million of men; or the "universal Yankee nation" has attempted a fraud upon the Governments of Europe, by misleading them as to the extent of the preparations to "crush out" the so-called rebellion in ninety days. Moreover, in all of our engagements with the enemy, he claims that we outnumbered him. How could this be with his 667,000 against our 400,000?

Where are these 667,000 men? I cannot account for more than about 400,000. It is true we have inflicted many and heavy losses upon the enemy in what he has proclaimed to you as victories. But great as these losses have been, they do not account for the difference between 667,000 and 400,000.

Actum est de Republica. The Union is gone; and the sooner the world addresses itself to that fact the better will it be for humanity and commerce.

Most that Europe knows of us has been learned through Yankee sources, and I have taken up your precious time with this disgusting recital merely to disabuse your mind of any Yankee falsehoods that may have found a lodgment there, and to give you practical illustration of the despicable character of the people with whom, unfortunately we find ourselves enbroiled, and from whose association we wish to withdraw.

I pass by Butler's infamous proclamation at New Orleans, and the arming our slaves against our wives and children, to tell you of a Yankee refinement upon savage barbarity which we have to contend with.

To shoot with poisoned arrows is universally admitted to be both savage and barbarous, but our men have been shot with explosive bullets. Imagine a Minié bullet to be cut in two transversely, and a wire to be inserted axially through the front half or cone: the other part is then hollowed out into a cup, filled with fulminate or some other explosive preparation, and then securely fitted into the front part, and in such a manner that when the ball strikes the wire is driven back, and so by percussion explodes the ball inside the wounded man. Is not that, think you, equal to the poisoned arrow? There can be no mistake about it, for I have seen the missile itself, and would send you one if I could find a safe conveyance for the dangerous thing. The true aim of savage warfare is to kill and murder—of civilized to wound and disable. Which is it that the Yankees are waging?

The negro is not, as the Yankee would have the world believe, the cause or the object of the war. The tariff and hatred of the Yankee character—these are the true causes. They are a nation of shopkeepers and pedlars; and under pretext of raising revenue to maintain the Government, Southern industry was taxed to support Yankee workshops. With this they waxed fat and grew insolent until their insolence became unbearable.

We chose no longer to submit to their rule, and so sought simply to withdraw from all political association with them. We ask nothing of them. All we want is simply to be left and let alone; and the simple fact that they should attempt to force us to remain in political association with them, is proof enough as to the inequality of benefit which the old Union conferred upon the two sections.

The fuss and turmoil about slavery is merely incidental in this unhappy state of affairs. In most of the Northern States it is against the law for a freed negro to come there. They will not allow a negro from the South to dwell among them.

After supplying the North with whatever they required of our produce, and buying of the North, upon their own terms, whatever we required of their manufacture, there remained annually to the South a quantity of surplus produce which requires 20,000 ships and more than 200,000 seamen to carry abroad and distribute among the markets of the world.

In the handling of this produce, Northern factors and Northern shipping did the principal part. Besides this, the laws of the Union gave the North the preference over all the world in the markets of the South. These were great advantages, and the North waxed fat and strong upon them. Their correlatives were waiting to the South—for the South could sell dearer and buy cheaper in other countries.

Twelve millions of such customers as inhabit the South are enough to make any people rich, and they are such as no nation can afford to lose. But let Secession be acknowledged as an accomplished fact, and the North will lose this preference, this trade, and these customers, with all the benefits derived from their political association with us. It is, therefore, not for the negro, but solely on account of pecuniary and selfish considerations, that the North is waging this war. She is vainly seeking to compel us to renew an association that we abhor.

Hitherto we have acted purely on the defensive. We have not sought to invade the North, but, panopied in the triple armour of a just cause, we have stood still, and ever since the battle of Manassas—now a year ago—quietly looked on while the enemy raised his armies and completed his preparations for the war in his own way. Having destroyed his "grand army," we shall now carry the war into Africa, I hope, compelling him to withdraw his forces from our borders and to sue for peace.

But peace is very difficult at present, I admit; in the North reason has lost its sway over the mind of the people, and the judgment of their rulers has been taken away. In the South passions run high. Therefore, in the present temper of the two peoples it would be impossible just now for them to agree upon the preliminary step to any lasting peace—viz., the adjustment of boundaries. We are, therefore, drifting into a war of exhaustion.

There are rumours of an armed intervention from your side; but upon what basis this intervention is to take place the many-tongued dame has not deigned to enlighten us. Any such intervention cannot but work mischievously if it fail to recognize the right of the people in the disputed States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, freely and fairly to decide for themselves whether they will cast their lot with the North or the South. Neither can it be supposed that intervention would recognize any dismemberment of present States.

With us this is not a war of conquest, but a war for a principle which is dear to every French heart—a principle by which your Emperor sits upon his great throne—the right of every people to be governed in their own way.

The strong arm of mighty nations may force a peace upon some other basis, but any such peace will prove a hollow truce.

There has, permit me to say, been already at least one error committed by France and England in this war. When these difficulties commenced all Europe viewed them through Northern media. This was natural enough, perhaps, for all Europe depended upon Northern statements for information concerning us. These have now been found to be erroneous; but not until France and England had committed themselves to a blockade that was against all rule. The effect of that blockade upon our industry is likely to prove lasting, and certain classes in France and England may yet find cause to rue it, even if Ministers do not.

You can well conceive that the blockade affords most effective encouragement to home manufactures in the South. The energies of the people have by it been diverted into new channels of industry, and manufacturing establishments are rapidly springing up on all hands.

So that, when France and England decided to respect Lincoln's paper blockade, they unwittingly, perhaps, called influences into play which are rapidly converting us into a manufacturing as well as an agricultural people. The operatives in your workshops may yet have cause to lament a policy which cannot fail to call into existence many rival establishments to your own, and which would not have found existence but for the course which the two Governments thought proper to pursue.

As for the preservation, restoration, or reconstruction of the Union, it is simply an impossibility. Laying aside all questions of military power and prowess between the contending parties, the mere hatred of one for the other, and which is obvious to every intelligent being who has attentively observed the events of the contest as they have developed themselves, is enough to destroy all hopes for any such union.

Harmony between the States, good will among the people, are essential to any such reconstruction or preservation, and you see enough, even from your distant stand-point, to satisfy you that we are two people, and that so long as our favourite doctrine holds good, viz., that every rightful Government rests on the consent of the governed, no power on earth can unite us again or make us one.

But enough of this.

Let me thank you for remembering me with your wind charts of the Eastern Coasts of South America. I had, as you know, watched their progress in your hands with a lively and active interest, and had waited the publication with anxious solicitude. Imagine my disappointment at their loss. Nothing from you, save the letter to which this is an answer, has reached me since I left Washington.

I am rather proud of the abusive attacks which you tell me have been heaped upon me in the North. You generously denounce them, but I draw consolation from them, for it shows that I am of some importance still in the eyes of the Yankees. They have offered a reward for my head, and classed me among the chief rebels in the cause of civil liberty; and so they have honoured me with a place among the great rebels of whom our Washington was first, foremost, the greatest, and the best. What he fought for, for that I contend.

Adieu, my friend, and let me hear from you, and believe me yours, most truly,

M. F. MAURY.

Viscomte de Chabanne,
Admiral French Navy, Paris.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN EUROPE.

(From the Mobile Register.)

It has been the misfortune of the South that it has not been fairly heard in the cause which it is defending with heroic valour and constancy before the tribunal of the civilized world. The South has, perhaps, suffered as much from this "intellectual blockade," as the London INDEX aptly calls it, as from the blockade which has deprived her of the material resources of war. Our friends in Europe cry loudly and earnestly for the light of facts from Confederate sources to counteract the falsehoods which are distilled through the alchemic of Northern official and newspaper reports. It is not known to the foreign world under what disadvantages we have fought—with what crippled means our brave troops, illy clad and provided, have rushed to encounter the disciplined battalions of their foes, supplied, not only with every necessary, but with luxuries before unheard of in the history of armies in the field. At Shiloh, when Halleck's men were driven from their camps, our soldiers were astonished at the wealth of preparation for the comfort and princely provision of the Federal armies. Not only an abundant commissariat, but liquors, wines, ice, and all the luxuries of the city were found in the vast stores in their camps. At the close of the first day, after our men had been fighting from early morning until late evening with empty haversacks, steadily driving the foe before them, they feasted upon the Yankee larder and slept in their splendid tents. While our soldiers were unprovided even with axes for cutting fuel and building roads and bridges, Confederate scouts, creeping up to the Federal lines, have been amazed to see a steam engine wheeled up to a mammoth tree, cut it down in a twinkling of time, and its great carcass rolled up to a portable saw-mill, and cut into timber and boards for building purposes. If Europe could see the two armies, mark the poverty and raggedness of the one and the complete equipment of the other—could hear McClellan exclaim to his Government, after everything that money could purchase had been lavished upon him, "I want nothing more," and then mark the hearing of the soldiers of the two armies when the hour of conflict arrived, it would say, at least, "These people are in earnest." The spirit of the army is the spirit of the people. They, too, have their privations and trials; not only are they cut off from the luxuries of foreign commerce, but its commonest commodities. But in whatever the war pinches, whether in the deprivation of the ice of the North—so essential in this tropical climate—and the wines of Europe, coffee and tea, or in the fabulous prices of salt, homespun and pins, needles and thread, there is but one sentiment—and that is, "We bear it all for the cause; we will bear even more, and will live on corn-bread, and, if necessary, acorns and roots, sooner than submit to the indignity and ruin of Black Republican subjugation."

The Battle of Shiloh marked a great era in the Southern war sentiment. The disasters on the Tennessee River, the defeats at Forts Henry and Donelson, and the capture of Nashville, awakened the South from the dream of invincibility and easy triumph induced by the Manassas route. Our people believed up to that time that to whip the Yankees two to one was but a pastime to Southern pluck. So it was with untrained Northern armies, like that which was scattered at Bull Run. But while we slept, the North worked. The result was the armies of Halleck and McClellan, trained and disciplined after the strictest rules of the organization of regular troops. The South was aroused from its dream to realize the presence of a great danger to be averted by a great effort. The army of Corinth was concentrated in an incredibly short time to stay the threatened invasion of the Cotton States. Our men fought with desperate bravery at Shiloh, and the first day drove unequal numbers back upon their gunboats, occupied their camps, captured their artillery, and put 20,000 Yankees hors de combat. The second day's fight was more extraordinary than the first, for in that conflict the Confederates had but 15,000 or 20,000 tired troops in the field, while the Federals came to the work reinforced by Buell's fresh army, which had crossed the river the night before; yet Beauregard held his ground until the Yankees gave over the attack, and the battle ended with Beauregard's men drawn up in line of battle; and after waiting an hour and a half without any signs of a renewed attack, he marched back slowly to his lines at Corinth. Nothing but the highest fighting qualities saved our troops from destruction. The enemy was checked, and for six weeks waited for reinforcements, to bring forward heavy siege guns and dig his way up to shelling distance of our entrenchments at Corinth. Having done so, at an expense of millions of money, and thousands of the lives of his troops, he woke up one morning to find the Confederates had vanished with all their stores and trains, and without the loss of a single man. The great Federal military effort came to nothing. Halleck attempted with one division to follow Beauregard, but his troops were driven back howling for water and cursing the inhospitable country into which they had been led. Since then Halleck's grand army has been looking in vain for new fields of subjugation, and so far has not found them. Meantime, General Bragg succeeded to the command of the "Army of the Mississippi," and he has been working with indefatigable zeal and all his well known ability, to organize for active operations in the great Western Valley.

The loss of New Orleans, at first regarded as a terrible blow to the Confederate cause, has proved fruitful of the greatest advantages, moral and material. Its first effect has been to arouse the Southern cities. The word has gone forth, no more surrenders of seaport towns except in ashes. Savannah and Charleston have proved the effect. The enemy has been forced to abandon the siege of both these cities—the latter very recently, after the bloody defeat he suffered on James Island, and the former after two months of most formidable demonstrations by sea and land. Mobile has put on its armour, encircled itself with entrenchments, and made its water approaches frown with batteries. Vicksburg, on the Mississippi River, has stood for five weeks a lion in the path of the enemy on that great highway, and has withstood, and still withstands the whole power of the combined Federal ships and gun and mortar boats, which have met there from above and below. Not a Confederate battery has been damaged by this prolonged and terrific bombardment, while one Yankee frigate has been sunk, and many of their squadron crippled in the contest. The possession of New Orleans is not the possession of the Mississippi. The Yankee calculations of a reopened trade with the Valley have all failed. Commerce is impossible on a river lined by a hostile population and armies. Yankee ships sail out of New Orleans without cotton, and Yankee speculators are still afraid to trust their ventures of Northern goods in so uncertain a market. New Orleans is more effectually blockaded than ever since General Butler commenced his beastly reign of tyranny. The price of flour is limited by military authority to $24 the barrel. As for cotton, it has been burned everywhere within the probable reach of the Yankee clutches. Butler's rule has intensified Southern hatred of Yankee rule, and our troops grasp their muskets and rush into the battle with the war-cry, "Remember New Orleans and Butler the Beast!"

The Mississippi is still defended by a powerful army. The gallant Van Dora and Breckinridge are at Vicksburg to meet the Yankees, if they attempt a land attack—their fleet attack has already failed. The Federal pickets in the suburbs of Memphis are nightly picked off, while the woods opposite to New Orleans are filled with Texas sharpshooters, who keep the enemy within their lines. As we have already said, General Bragg is ready with a powerful army to take his place in the picture of the coming Western campaign. The demonstrations of the enemy upon Eastern Tennessee have so far failed. General Kirby Smith is there to watch the Gaps of the Cumberland Mountains, and to guard Chattanooga and Knoxville.

It is well known that the two great expeditions of Burnside and Sherman, against the coasts of the two great Carolinas, have accomplished nothing but to enter poorly defended harbours to lie there and rot. These expeditions were only two "big jobs," gotten up for the benefit of Northern owners of old hulks laid up by the loss of Southern trade.

Last comes the most recent but grandest scene in the drama—that just enacted before Richmond. Before this capital the Lincoln Government had massed an army upon which the science, the genius, and treasure of the North, backed by the open armories of the world, had exhausted all their riches. That army had been incessantly drilled and disciplined under McClellan's own eye for a whole year. It was as perfect as money, talent, and the material of which it was composed could make a Yankee army. That army sat down before Richmond, and neither its officers, its men, nor its people at home had an earthly misgiving that Richmond would fall before its highly organized powers. Nay, the North would not wait for the bulletins that declared the victory. It held the rebel capital as conquered, the rebellion crushed, and boldly indulged its triumph and speculated upon the punishment to be meted to the rebel leaders. On the 26th June the Confederates commenced a series of assaults upon the invincible army. For ten successive days their blows were followed up; McClellan was driven from his chosen lines; his batteries were carried; his right wing doubled back on his rear; his centre pierced; his base of supplies lost and cut off, and his whole army beaten back towards the James River, thirty miles from Richmond, with a loss of his stores, tents, 140 pieces of artillery, innumerable small arms, and 30,000 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners, including two Major-Generals and four Brigadier-Generals.

Facts like these never get to Europe; or if they do, it is only months after they happen that they leak through the openings of Lincoln's blockade. If the Governments and the people of Europe know the truth of the temper and determination of our people—and if possible, the women are more brave and implacable than the men—and if they have any interest in a reciprocal trade with this rich agricultural region of the earth, which produces what they want, and consumes what they produce, they would certainly hesitate to continue to starve their own markets and operatives by waiting for peace through the conquest of the South, and the restoration of the Union. Neither of these is within the pale of possibilities. The South is sworn never to yield, and its men and women have deliberately made up their minds that death is sweet in comparison with a detested Yankee domination. But we have ceased to look for justice, much less mediation and active sympathy, from the Governments of the Old World. We mean to fight for our independence with such means as "God and Nature have put into our hands," just as if intervention was out of the question of hope. We have been deceived, and have suffered by the indulgence of false hopes from this quarter. Henceforth our trust is in God and in Southern steel. They will give us the victory, as God is just. Meantime, we are prepared to wait, to suffer, to endure, and to fight to the end, until in His good providence He shall pronounce that enough of the precious blood of our brothers and sons has been spilled to water the tree of a vigorous independence. In preparation for a long struggle, our farmers have planted less than a fourth of the ordinary cotton crop, the yield of which cannot exceed from a half to three quarters of a million of bales. The other three-fourths of cotton land have been sowed in grain. The whole Southern country now waves with a rich crop of corn. It is estimated that we shall make a surplus of 150,000,000 bushels of this prime staff of life.

GENERAL T. J. JACKSON.

The Richmond Dispatch publishes the following particulars of the early life of General Jackson:—

He was born in Clarksburg, in the county of Lewis, in the year 1825, of highly respectable parents, both of whom died during his infancy, leaving him without a cent in the world. During his early childhood he resided with an uncle, whose name we did not hear, and at the age of sixteen he had conducted himself so well, and produced such a favourable impression of his energy and integrity, that he was chosen Constable of the county. In the year 1842 a cadet had been appointed from his district to West Point, who declined to go. Jackson immediately conceived the idea of filling the place he had left vacant. Our informant says, that one day, while it was raining exceedingly hard, he suddenly burst into his office, the rain streaming from his clothes, and told him that he must give him a letter to Mr. Hayes, at that time representative in Congress from the Lewis District. Upon being asked what he wanted with such a letter, he replied he wished to go to West Point. His friend pointed out to him what he regarded as the absurdity of such a scheme, seeing that he was very deficient in education, and would, therefore, probably not be able to stand the preliminary examination. He acknowledged the alleged deficiency, but said he was sure he had the perseverance to make it up. He obtained the letter without further difficulty, and that very evening borrowed a horse, under promise to send him back by a boy, whom he carried with him, and rode to Clarksburg, to take the stage. It had been raining for weeks, as it can only rain in that country; the roads were muddy, as they are muddy nowhere else that ever we heard of. Jackson arrived in time, but on account of the muddy roads the postmaster had furnished the mail an hour before time, and the stage was already gone. With characteristic fidelity to his promise, Jackson sent the horse back, instead of riding him in pursuit of the stage, and took it on foot through the mud. After a run of thirteen miles, he overtook the stage, jumped in, went to Washington all muddy as he was, presented his letter to Mr. Hayes, and was by him, in turn, presented to the Secretary of War, who gave him the coveted warrant. At West Point he severely felt the want of early education; but his indomitable spirit overcame every obstacle. He was never marked for a demerit during the four years, and graduated with the class of 1846, the same in which McClellan graduated.

The young graduate was ordered off immediately, with the rank of Second Lieutenant, to join General Taylor's army in the Valley of the Rio Grande. He arrived after the battles of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, and Monterey, and before that of Buena Vista was ordered to join General Scott before Vera Cruz. At the siege of this latter place he commanded a battery, and attracted attention by his coolness and the judgment with which he worked his guns, and was promoted First Lieutenant. For his conduct at Cerro Gordo, he was brevetted Captain. He was in all Scott's battles to the city of Mexico, and behaved so well that he was brevetted Major for his services. On one occasion he commanded a battery upon which the fire of the enemy was so severe that more than half his troops, who were raw, incontinently ran; Jackson was advised to retreat; but he said if he could get a reinforcement of fifty regulars, he would take the enemy's battery opposed to him, instead of abandoning his own. He sent for the named reinforcement, but, before it came, he had already stormed the obnoxious battery.

Jackson's health was so much shattered by this campaign that he was compelled to resign. He accepted a professorship at the Military Institute, where he continued until the secession of Virginia. In height he is about six feet, with a weight of about 180. He is quite as remarkable for his moral as he has proved himself to be for his fighting qualities—being a perfectly conscientious man, just in all his ways, and irreproachable in his dealings with his fellow-men. It is said he is a fatalist, as Napoleon was, and has no fear that he can be killed before his time comes. He is as calm in the midst of a hurricane of bullets as he was in the pew of his church at Lexington, when he was Professor of the Institute. He appears to be a man of almost superhuman endurance. Neither heat nor cold makes the slightest impression upon him. He cares nothing for good quarters and dainty fare. Wrapped in his blanket, he throws himself down on the ground anywhere, and sleeps as soundly as though he were in a palace. He lives as the soldiers live, and endures all the fatigue and all the suffering that they endure. His vigilance is something marvellous. He never seems to sleep, and lets nothing pass without his personal scrutiny. He can neither be caught napping nor whipped when he is wide awake. The rapidity of his marches is something portentous. He is heard of by the enemy at one point, and before they can make up their minds to follow him he is off at another. His men have little baggage, and he moves, as nearly as he can, without encumbrance. He keeps so constantly in motion that he never has a sick list, and no need of hospitals. In these habits, and a will as determined as that of Julius Caesar, are read the secret of his great success. His men adore him, because he requires them to do nothing which he does not do himself, because he constantly leads them to victory, and because they see he is a great soldier.

Captain McMillan, of the Davis Rifles, 12th Regiment of Georgia Volunteers, fell a sacrifice to his country's cause in the battle of McDowell, on the 8th instant. All the sufferings of the 12th Georgia in the mountains of North-western Virginia have been shared by this unflinching chief. He was always at his post—always cognizant of the claims of his superiors in rank and his subordinates. His company are bereaved of a kind, firm, brave leader. Captain McMillan was a South Carolinian by birth, but was reared in Georgia. The son and adopted son of two glorious States, well has he sustained their honour, both as a warrior and a citizen.—The Mobile Register.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND
CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

RED AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rufford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHERIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
JOS. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLBO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer
of MANHATTAN, Thos and Sax Card Soap, Cottons, Coltona Balls, Knitting, and Embroidery
Garners. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Savannah, Va.; F. RIMALHO AND FLYREY,
New Orleans.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denies, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A.
Represented by R. G. BEESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY, Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hay, Liverpool.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDER-ICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published
the following Catalogues of their Stock:—

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books—Biblical, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP-CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History,
Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign
Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organized,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organized in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World; and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganized trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with her mother and her daughter in pleasant location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

GENTLEMEN requiring an excellent Tailor are recommended to the establishments of A. M. CAUTHER, 223, Regent-street, London (above Verrey's Restaurant), and 20, Rue de la Chausée d'Antin in Paris.

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC.
On Wednesday, the 30th, will be published, in
1 vol. 8vo.

THOMAS JEFFERSON: an Historical View of Democracy in America. By CORNELIUS DE WITT. Translated, with the Author's sanction, by R. S. H. CHURCH.
London: LONGMAN, GREEN, AND CO., 14, Lud-
gate-hill.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of policies to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West Vice- President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,008 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.
A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 690,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 866,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com- pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT., on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrip of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Poux.
C. Hould.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevius.
S. O. Nelson.
S. S. Scomb.
B. F. Voorheis.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.
Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 831,876 11
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,059 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 30th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATE, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI- CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.
These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primeage.

PAYMENT PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.
Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.
Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 329th section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aqueducts, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a penalty and forfeiture: and the master or owner of any ship who refuses to take on board any party that he has suspected to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XVI. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesmen, the Journalists, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the
friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the lenders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.
The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Cannon-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E. C.—August 14, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I—No. 17.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 21, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	257
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	258
Manchester Letter	258
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
The Battle of Seclusionville—Lists of Killed and Wounded	258
Private Letters	259
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	260
Paris	260
EXTRACTS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS	261
LEADERS—
The Tug of War in the North	264
Strength of the Belligerents	264
The Despatch of the 28th of May	265
Federal and Confederate Finances	266
English Neutrality and American Gratitude	267
Garibaldi's Attempted Revolution	268
Editorial	269
REVIEWS—
The Home and Foreign Review	269
Three Letters from a South Carolinian relating to Secession, Slavery, and the Trent Case	269
THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF "STONEWALL" JACKSON	270
A NORTHERN VIEW OF THE STATE OF THE NORTH	270
THE RAM ARKANSAS	271
THE NORTHERN HATRED OF THE NEGRO	271
ADVERTISEMENTS	272

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

No one will be surprised to hear that there has been fighting in the Virginian Valley, and that the Federal account of it is rather contradictory. Before we attempt to analyze it we will reproduce the telegram in extenso. Under date New York, August 11, we are informed:—

Severe fighting has taken place in the Virginian Valley. General Jackson having crossed the Rapidan, General Pope sent forward two army corps, under General Banks, to check him. At daylight they were discovered by General Jackson, who immediately advanced, and the numerous Confederate batteries being unmasked, a very severe contest ensued, about a mile and a half from Cedar Mountain. The conflict lasted from three o'clock till dark, when the Federals retired to a position beyond the Confederate guns, but to what distance is not stated.

The Federal infantry was badly cut up, and the Federals lost two guns.

The Confederate force was estimated at 20,000 men, and that of the Federals at 7000. Large reinforcements have been sent to the Federals, and more fighting is anticipated.

And further, under date August 12, evening:—

Late reports from Virginia Valley, dated to-day, say that the Confederates retreated from Cedar Mountain, under cover of the night. Their rear crossed the Rapidan in the direction of Orange Court House. The Federal cavalry and artillery were in pursuit.

It is said that the Confederate loss in the late fight was heavy. The Federals only lost one gun.

The corps under General Banks appear to have been surprised, for "at daylight they were discovered by General Jackson, who immediately advanced, and the numerous Confederate batteries being unmasked, a very severe contest ensued." And perhaps the Federals were trapped, for it is not likely that, unless surprised or led into ambuscade, that they would place themselves in a position to be opened upon by numerous Confederate batteries. The conflict, we are told, "lasted from three o'clock till dark." Does this mean from early morning till night? We presume so, for it was at daylight that General Jackson discovered the enemy, and advanced upon him; or it may mean that instead of General Banks advancing on the Confederates, General Jackson advanced to meet the Federals, and the engagement commenced at three in the afternoon. Who gained the victory? "The Federal infantry was badly cut up, and the Federals lost two guns." "The Federals retired to a position beyond the Confederate guns, but to what distance is not stated." According to European ideas the Federals were defeated.

Next, we are told, the Confederates retired from Cedar Mountain and crossed the Rapidan in the direction of Orange Court House. This is the key to the movement:—General Jackson advanced upon the Federals under General Banks, inflicted upon them a defeat, drove them back, and having accomplished his work recrossed the Rapidan. "Large reinforcements" have been sent to the Federals," but the Confederate commander did not meet the arrivals. This sending forward of large reinforcements is a confession of disaster, and shows the report that "the Federal cavalry and artillery were in pursuit" is a flight of imagination. It will be noticed that upon reflection General Halleck, assisted no doubt by the experienced Mr. Stanton, declared that the Federals lost one gun and not two. To attack with a superior force a detachment of the enemy, beat it, drive it back with heavy loss, and then to go elsewhere is the well known strategy of General "Stonewall" Jackson.

General Burnside is reported to have concentrated his forces at Fredericksburg to co-operate with General Pope, and, it is added, "but whether their destination is Richmond or any other point is not known." That they will not operate against Richmond is, we think, tolerably certain, for if they did so Washington would be open to a Confederate attack.

It is intimated that the Federals have been driven back from City Point, and that General Hooker's division has fallen back from Malvern Hill. These movements indicate that the Confederates are closely pressing the enemy. The only item referring to General McClellan's army is, that the sickness had abated in consequence of a supply of vegetables. The reported advance to within ten miles of Richmond is not confirmed by latest advices.

The Northern papers give an account of the skirmish near Petersburg, which says that the Confederate loss was six men wounded and two taken prisoners, and the Federal loss "one horse killed."

General Pope's order has led to indiscriminate plundering throughout the Virginia Valley; but the savage edicts of this general are likely to be checked by the resolute attitude assumed by the Confederate Government:—

President Jefferson Davis has issued an order, in which he refers to the conduct of the Federal General Pope, who has directed that all civilians found guilty of violating their oath of allegiance shall be shot.

The President of the Southern Confederacy also refers to General Pope having begun to maintain his troops by plunder. President Davis directs that the Federal Generals Pope and Steinwehr, and all commissioned officers under their command, shall not be considered soldiers, or entitled to the benefit of cartel, if taken prisoners; if any of them are captured, they are to be confined, so that in the event of any unarmed citizens of the Confederacy being murdered, with or without trial, under pretence of being spies or hostages, or any other pretext, an equal number of prisoners shall be shot by command of the Confederate General-in-Chief.

The order does not extend to Federal private soldiers, nor to any other division of the Federal army.

Thus the Northern commanders will understand that they cannot carry on a savage warfare with impunity.

The rumour of the evacuation of Richmond is, of course, contradicted; but the contradiction is accompanied with the assertion that a pestilence is raging in the Confederate capital. Our latest private advices from Richmond give no intimation of the presence of pestilence in that city, though, of course, there is the sickness usual at this season.

There has been an engagement near Memphis, which the North styles an unimportant affair. The Federal General McCook was shot by guerillas in Alabama, and "some Federal soldiers went to the neighborhood of the occurrence, burnt some houses, and hung seventeen men, suspected of being concerned in the affair." The Federal troops in Alabama seem to be pre-eminently brutal, and their acts loudly call for reprisals. No one, we think, could blame the Confederates for retaliating this outrage on Federal prisoners. To hang seventeen men on the mere suspicion of being concerned in the death of one man is intolerable. Indeed, severe reprisals will be merciful by checking Northern brutality.

General Butler does not feel safe in New Orleans, and clamours for reinforcements. And this danger and anxiety is the only reward for conduct that has made his name execrable throughout the civilized world.

The Federal fleet below Savannah is expecting an attack from a Confederate ram equipped at Savannah. At the same time the land forces at Hilton Head expect an attack from the Confederate army at Bluffton.

In Missouri the Confederates have captured Newark and Alexandria. At Mount Pleasant there has been an encounter between the citizens and State troops, the former being united to resist enrolment. The Federal power in Missouri seems to be at a low ebb.

In Indiana a Secret Society has been discovered, numbering 15,000 persons, for preventing Federal enlistments, Federal taxation, and for aiding the Confederates generally. This information is highly important. Some portion of Mr. Lincoln's new levies will be required to preserve the loyalty of the United States.

General Morgan is in Kentucky, which State is again and again reported as swarming with guerillas. There is a rumour that several Secessionists have been shot in Nashville by Unionists. The Federal Government is totally unable to preserve order even amongst its supporters.

Cotton burning continues. Large quantities have been consumed in Columbia, Tennessee. General Sherman has rather unnecessarily forbidden the purchase or sale of cotton for Treasury notes or gold, either by Unionists or Secessionists, but purchases can be made on credit or note of hand payable after the termination of the war.

By far the most important news of the week is the accounts of the excitement and panic caused by the conscription. In the Western States it is openly resisted. The offices of the Foreign Consuls are besieged by applicants for certificates of foreign citizenship. The rush of Irishmen at the British Consulate, at New York, was so great as to call for the interference of the police. Persons are endeavouring to escape from the country by every available route, but the frontiers are strictly guarded. The Habeas Corpus has been suspended. The European steamer was searched, and fugitives were taken disguised as sailors. No one is allowed, under any circumstances, even to proceed to California without giving a bond of $1000 to provide a substitute. Baltimore is being deserted for Canada. The police of New York is constituted a Provost Guard. In a word, the United States is virtually in a state of siege, and the Washington Government may find a large army necessary to compel its unwilling citizens to enlist.

A war meeting has been held at Washington, attended by Mr. Lincoln, who made a speech, in which he defended General McClellan and Mr. Stanton. The former, he said, was not to be blamed for asking Mr. Stanton for what he wanted, and Mr. Stanton was not to be blamed for refusing what he could not give. No one can quarrel with Mr. Lincoln's logic, but it occurs to us that it is more candid than wise to parade the inability of the Government to supply the army of McClellan with necessities at a time when it is asking for 600,000 more men. After Mr. Lincoln's speech the following resolutions were passed by acclamation:—

We deliberately and solemnly declare that rather than witness an overthrow of the Union we would prosecute the present war until our towns and cities should be desolated and we and all that are dear to us should have perished with our possessions. Let the Union be preserved, or the country be made a desert.

That, if at the present time there is any hesitation among the people of the loyal States in devoting themselves and their property to the cause of the country, it arises from the misgivings as to the manner of prosecuting the war, and in the apprehension that there is a want of readiness on the part of those who direct the military operations, whether in the Cabinet or in the field, to employ at once the full power of the nation, which all know to be overwhelming.

We therefore urge the President to take means to assure the people that he is resolved to prosecute the war on a scale limited only by the resources of the country. We hail with joy the recent order directing immediate drafts. We are convinced that the leaders of the rebellion will never return to their allegiance, and therefore they should be regarded and treated as irreclaimable traitors, who are to be stripped of their possessions and deprived of their lives, or expelled from the country.

That Washington is the place where treason should be instantly denounced and punished, and that stringent measures should be adopted to discover and arrest all disloyal men and women infesting the district of Columbia.

The Federal Government must be sustained under any circumstances.

In another part of our impression we reprint an article from the Morning Post, denouncing the brutal character of the above resolutions. Their folly is very apparent, for it is evident, from the dread of a conscription, the people of the United States are not prepared to sacrifice their property and their lives to carry on the war. Surely a more undignified spectacle was never witnessed than the President of the United States haranguing a mob and sanctioning resolutions which excite a feeling of disgust throughout the civilized world.

In Western Virginia the guerillas are "becoming very troublesome to the Federals."

It is reported that the ram Arkansas has been blown up. No details are given, and we are not able to form any conjecture as to the authenticity of the rumour.

The yellow fever is raging at Key West; a vessel arrived at Boston with thirty cases on board from that place.

The siege of Vicksburg is finally abandoned, and the canal that was to turn the waters of the Mississippi turns out to be an unfinished ditch not eight feet wide.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 20, 1862.

Our cotton market, after six weeks of comparative quietness, has again been plunged into wild excitement, and the week under review presents the most extraordinary advance yet recorded in this eventful year.

Our last report left it quietly bordering on the basis of 19½d. for middling Orleans, and 18½d. for fair Dhollerah. On Thursday and Friday the demand became very active, with sales each day of 10,000 or 12,000 bales, bringing middling Orleans to 20d. and fair Dhollerah to 14d.

On Saturday the Asia's news was to hand, whose whole tenor was most adverse to the prospects of peace. Attention was chiefly occupied by the progress of the enlistment question, and the truth flashed upon the public mind in this country that the North was actually prepared to raise a gigantic force by conscription. This proposal had previously been scouted by our press as absurd and impracticable. It was alleged that such a mass of men could never be drawn by compulsion, and that if the North could only carry on the war by means of a conscription, the sooner it yielded with a good grace the better. But the Asia's news effectually dispelled these pleasant illusions, and the conviction has since then taken deep root in the public mind, that the North is now fairly committed to another winter campaign. The object of these advices was to stimulate the market strongly on Saturday, and the sales reached 15,000 bales at ½d. advance on American cotton, and ½d. in Surats. On Monday, however, the full effect of the news developed itself, and resulted in perhaps the wildest excitement yet witnessed in our market. Spinners attended in unusual numbers, speculators and exporters competed with them eagerly, and the sales were estimated at the prodigious amount of 30,000 bales, or one-fourth of the total stock according to the figures of the circulars on the previous Friday! American cotton opened in the morning at 20½d., and advanced ½d. to ½d. per hour, leaving off at 22d. per lb.; the sales in that class alone were estimated at 8000 bales, upon an available stock of about 24,000 bales. In Surat cotton, though the demand was heavy, not more than ½d. to ¾d. advance could be quoted, while longstaples took a medium place between Surat and American.

On Tuesday the excitement continued unchecked, and very soon after the market opened, Middling Orleans was alleged to have been sold at two shillings per lb. Great irregularity, however, prevailed, and discrepancies of 1d. were often occurring simultaneously; for some time the market fluctuated between 23d. and 24d., and finally closed about 23½d. for middling. Considerable parcels of cotton have been brought out for sale at 2s., which checked the upward movement in America. Surats were also sold very largely, but the advance was not more than ¾d. to 1d., while longstaples gained about 1d. per lb. The total transactions were estimated at 22,010 bales. In Manchester there was nearly as much excitement as in Liverpool, and an average advance of 2d. per lb., which placed spinners in a better position as regards yarn spun from Surat cotton, but a much worse one from America.

To-day there has again been a large attendance of the trade, and a buoyant demand, resulting in sales of 15,000 bales; but American is restrained for the moment by the barrier of 2s., which seems to be the common price fixed upon by sellers. At that rate it has been done pretty freely in the course of the day, and, in some cases, even higher; but latterly there has been a general disposition to sell, and a little weakness in prices.

Attention has been gradually turned to the enormous disparity in price between American and Surat cotton, and speculators have been anxious, in many cases, to change their interest from the dearer into the cheaper article. There has accordingly been a great run upon Surats, which have improved to-day full ½d., and even more in the better grades, while Brazils and Egyptians are also ½d. and 1d. dearer. It is impossible to give accurate quotations, but the following may be taken as approximate:—Middling Orleans, 23½ to 24; Bowed and Mobiles ½d. lower; fair Dhollerah, 15½d.; Omrawutta, 15½d.; Broach, 16½d.; Complati, 15d.; and Sawginned Dharwar, 19d. to 19½d. In cotton to arrive an enormous business has been done—probably as great as on the spot—and the closing quotations may be given as 16d. for Broach nearly due, 15d. for May Dhollerah and Omrawutte, 14½d. for June, ditto, and 14½ for July, ditto.

The business of the week presents many curious points of interest, it is probable that the value of the cotton turned over on the spot, and to arrive, is much the largest on record, and not less than five millions sterling; the sales on Friday will sum up far more than the stock remaining in the port, and as the import is very trifling, it is probable that item will stand below 90,000 bales! Neither would it be surprising if the stock next Friday should prove to be the minimum of the year. A very large import of East India cotton is now due, and the arrivals of that class, with Brazil and Egyptian cotton for the next three months, should be close upon 40,000 bales per week, against a demand for consumption and export that is not likely to exceed 30,000 bales per week. It is also curious to observe that our quotations for American cotton to-day are just 7d. per lb. above those of July 2, while Surats are only 2d. higher; but it is probable that even yet the disparity between the two is not greater than is justified, and it is likely in the long run to be rather increased than diminished.

The news by the Etna to-day has had no sensible influence on the market, though for a moment it slightly damped it. Attention was called to the violent measures adopted in the North to carry out the conscription, and to local displays of opposition to this policy. Though it is not likely that these petty obstructions will much impede the warlike preparations of the North, they are apt to be magnified in this country. And inference may be drawn from them which will frighten holders of cotton. There are symptoms that the fire in our market has nearly burned out for the present; and if any uneasiness from political causes coincided with large arrivals of Surats, a sharp reaction may be expected.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, August 19, 1862.

The later telegrams from Calcutta and Bombay, up to the 24th ult., which were received here on Wednesday last, imparted a more lively tone to our market in general. The Calcutta telegram advised us of an advance upon shirtings of from 20 to 25 per cent., and that from Bombay of an advance of from 2s. 6d. to 3s. per piece during the fortnight, with a prospect of still higher prices being paid. During Thursday and Friday there were many inquiries for shirtings, jaconets, madapollams, &c., suitable for the India market, and offers of from 3d. to 6d. per piece advance on Tuesday's quotations for shirtings, and 3d. upon jaconets, were made, but only accepted in few cases, the rest of the holders requiring extreme rates, or with-drawing from the market altogether.

On Saturdays, inquiries for cloth were still more numerous than the day before, on its becoming known that the Liverpool market was excited, and that sales were being effected at an advance of about 1d. per lb. upon Thursday's quotations. Agents were loath to name any figure for cloth, feeling confident that any sudden rise in the price of cotton would still further tend to check what little production was then going on among manufacturers, and place themselves in a position to command higher rates for this staple.

Yarns [arc, upon the whole, in a more favourable position even than cloth, especially those kinds suitable for Continental shipment; and wherever a buyer meets with yarn spun from American cotton, entirely, in such numbers as 24s. to 30s. water, 30s., 32s., 40s., and 42s. mule, and 36s. twist-cops, he has to pay extreme prices, owing to the exceedingly great scarcity of these qualities.

Monday was again an excited day in Liverpool, when an advance of 1½d. per lb. was obtained for American cotton. This intelligence caused almost a general withdrawal of all cloth and yarn from the market, although buyers were willing to pay, during the afternoon, a considerable advance upon offers made during the morning.

To-day, our market has been much excited, in consequence of a further advance in Liverpool of from 1d. to 2d. per lb. on yesterday's rates.

Very few transactions have taken place in cloth and yarn, as holders are unwilling to name a figure at which they are disposed to sell, and in many instances, buyers are equally reluctant to make offers.

In yarns suitable for the home trade, some small orders were placed at an advance of 2d. per lb. upon Friday's rates, but there are very few spinners who will accept such an advance, as they think it very probable that American cotton will go up another 6d. per lb. within the next few days.

The German buyers have been equally unsuccessful in placing orders to any extent, although they have advanced their offers by about 2d. to 3d. per lb. upon Friday's quotations, for 20s. to 30s. water, and 1d. to 2d. per lb. upon 30s. to 40s. mule, and 36s. twist cops.

Cloth has been very irregular in price to-day, especially 8½-lb. India shirtings, which were quoted at from 13s. to 15s. 6d. per piece, just according to quality of material, and position of the holders.

Printers may be quoted at 2s. per lb., and all other kinds of grey goods are held for very extreme figures.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

THE BATTLE OF SECESSIONVILLE, ON JAMES ISLAND. LISTS OF KILLED AND WOUNDED.

(From the Charleston Mercury.)

THE CASUALTIES IN THE CHARLESTON BATTALION.

We give below the list of casualties in the Charleston Battalion. The commanding officer, Lieut. Col. P. C. Gaillard, was wounded in the knee, but kept his place in the action notwithstanding.

SUMMER GUARDS—(CAPT. H. C. KING).

Killed: Lieut. J. J. Edwards, Corporal Isaac Valentine, and Private G. Pozanski. Wounded: Capt. H. C. King, mortally, in the breast; Privates H. S. Newville, slightly in the neck; H. Valentine, shot through the right arm; R. C. Evans, in hip; Dr. E. S. Tennant; G. W. Dingle, left shoulder; S. F. Edgerton, slightly; T. P. Lockwood, slightly, in the foot; A. Roumillat, E. L. Terry, W. W. Johnson, and Sergeant Joseph T. Wells.

CHARLESTON LIGHT INFANTRY—(CAPT. T. Y. SIMONS).

Killed: Private J. B. N. Hammetts. Wounded: Private J. Lacy, slightly.

IRISH VOLUNTEERS—(CAPT. RYAN).

Killed: Private D. Howard. Wounded: Lieut. Burke, slightly; Private Fitzgerald, slightly; John May, seriously.

CALICOON GUARDS—(CAPT. F. T. MILES).

Killed: Thomas Parker. Wounded: Capt. F. T. Miles; Lieut. J. W. Axson, Sergeant S. C. Black, Privates C. B. Buist, C. Pinckney Brown, thigh and head; H. E. Choate, Isaac Holmes, left hand, and J. E. Smith.

UNION LIGHT INFANTRY—(CAPT. SAMUEL LORD).

Killed: Sergeant R. S. Henry. Wounded: James Davis, seriously; W. Commins, in the foot.

CHARLESTON RIFLEMEN—(CAPT. JULIUS A. BLAKE).

Killed: None. Wounded: Capt. Julius A. Blake and Lieut. F. Lynch, slightly.

THE EUTAW REGIMENT.

The enemy had become convinced that all efforts to carry our works by storm would be futile, and he was endeavouring, by throwing out strong flanking bodies, to gain the rear of our position. The Eutaw Regiment was led into action just in time to baffle one of these flank movements. They charged impetuously, and forced the enemy back as far as Legare's, where the gunboats effectually protected the fugitives. In this movement, however, the Eutaw boys encountered a very heavy fire of musketry. The members of the regiment speak in high terms of the cool and skilful manner in which Colonel Simonton handled his command. The following is an official list of the casualties in the Eutaw Regiment:—

ST. MATTHEWS' RIFLES—(CAPT. SELLERS).

Killed: None. Wounded: Private E. V. Shuler and Private G. L. Dantzler, in hand.

YEADON LIGHT INFANTRY—(CAPT. S. LE ROY HAMMOND).

Killed: None. Wounded: Sergeant R. A. Horton, in shoulder, severely.

WASHINGTON LIGHT INFANTRY.

Company B (Capt. Lloyd).—Killed: Second Lieut. R. W. Greer, First Sergeant Fleetwood Linnean, junr. Privates T. N. Gadsden, junr., and S. Saltus. Mortally wounded: J. H. Tavner. Severely wounded: Lieut. S. J. Burger; Privates J. B. Glover, A. S. Trumbo, and T. G. Simmonds, junr. Slightly wounded: J. H. Devoe, and J. C. Martin.

SMITH'S BATTALION.

Company A (Capt. Smart).—Killed: None. Wounded seriously: Privates Henry Cooper and Alexander Brown. Slightly: Sergeant Wm. T. Smith. Captured on Picket: Brevet Second Lieut. Sarvis, and Privates Wm. Russ and S. M. Jordan.

Company B (Capt. Evans).—Killed: Private Duncan Deas. Wounded seriously: Sergeant W. L. McFarland, since died; Private Jesse Pierce; Privates John R. Threalt, R. D. Morse, and Isaac Hirst, slightly.

Company C (Capt. Davis).—Killed: None. Wounded seriously: Privates Wm. Cole and Leonard Oxenden. Slightly: Private Thomas Cole, Corporal John Roller, arm shot off.

Company D (Capt. Best).—Killed: Privates J. T. Alford and J. H. Lay. Wounded slightly: First Sergeant H. Beatty, and Privates S. Jones and M. Stalvey.

Company F (Capt. Carter).—Killed: None. Wounded seriously: Corporal E. F. Lanabash. Slightly: Privates W. D. Rollins, J. E. P. Hickson, and C. C. Anderson.

Company G (Capt. Graham).—Killed: None. Wounded seriously: Privates L. Stricklin and Wilson Elliot. Slightly: Orderly Sergeant John H. Williamson and Private J. W. Fripp. Total—killed, 3; since died, 1; wounded, 21; captured, 3. Aggregate loss, 28.

LAMAR'S REGIMENT.

We regret that we were not able to obtain the full list of casualties in this fine command, which contributed so materially to the repulse of the enemy. The companies engaged were those of Capt. Keitt and Reed. For fourteen days, while having the most arduous and laborious duties to perform, they had been constantly exposed to the shelling of the enemy's gunboats. Of course, the attack found them very much wearied, yet they fought with all the spirit and persistence that could have been expected from fresh troops. Among the casualties were the following:—Col. T. G. Lamar, wounded by a Minié ball passing through the ear and back portion of the neck. Capt. Samuel J. Reed, of Company B, from Barnwell district, killed. Sergeant Baggett, of the same company, killed. Lieut. Humbert, of the same company, slightly wounded.

OTHER CASUALTIES.

Of the casualties in other commands we have no full accounts.

In the 24th Regiment, S.C.V., the following were wounded:—R. G. Geron, Company K, left shoulder; Pickens New, Company K, left shoulder; Sergeant G. W. Burden, Company K, neck; Sergeant D. W. Bowers, Company D, right leg; Francis Connel, Company E, left ankle.

Of the Louisiana Battalion, whose conspicuous gallantry is universally acknowledged we have not yet obtained the casualties.

Our battery was a common earthwork, behind which were mounted one 8-inch columbiad, two 24-pounders, and one 18-pounder. There were no flanking defenses.

47TH GEORGIA REGIMENT—(COLONEL WILLIAMS.)

Sergeant T. N. Mulry, Company E, slightly, in left side; R. W. King, Company E, slightly, in abdomen; J. Prigden, Company E, slightly, in thigh; Richard Youmaus, Company F, three flesh wounds, not dangerous; John Williams, Company F, slightly, in thigh; C. C. Falls, Company H, wounded in left shoulder; James J. Rowe, Company H, flesh wounds in arm and shoulder; P. R. Cone, Company K, wounded in ankle, slightly; T. H. Mikell, Company K, collar-bone broken; A. J. W. Kiekliter, Company K, flesh wound in right side; L. J. Proctor, Company K, wounded in side, slightly; S. Hagan, Company K, contusion, caused by splinters from a tree; E. H. Martin, Company K, seriously, shot through arm and right side; J. H. Martin, Company K, slightly wounded in shoulder; E. Dragers, Company K, wounded in thigh; John Hilton, Company K, slightly wounded in knee; J. Denmark, Company K, wounded by a falling tree top; J. J. Johnston, Company K, wounded in the right arm.

22ND REGIMENT SOUTH CAROLINA VOLUNTEERS.

Below is a list of the killed and wounded of the 22nd South Carolina Regiment, Colonel Goodlett. The casualties occurred among those who constituted a detachment, which was sent to Secessionville early Monday morning for fatigue duty. The detachment numbered 100 men, ten from each company, under command of Captain J. Jamison, who was at Reid's Battery during the fight:—

Company A (Capt. Adams).—Killed: Robert Cohen, Benjamin Harris.

Company B (Capt. Foster).—Wounded: John Wheeler, severely, in the arm.

Company C (Capt. Wakefield).—Wounded: Edward Sizemore, both thighs, severe.

Company D (Capt. O'Connell).—Killed: Henry Presher, William Roach.

Company E (Capt. Hilum).—Killed: Jeff. Spray. Wounded: W. R. Connell, ankle, very severe, leg amputated; F. Connell, ankle, slight.

Company F (Capt. Stuart).—Wounded: W. R. Gilstray, arm, severe.

Company G (Capt. Jamison).—Killed: Harvey Orr, Thos. Stribling. Wounded: Berry Sizemore, shoulder and hand, severe.

Company H (Capt. Peach).—Wounded: Thomas Bowers, chest, slight.

Company I (Capt. Millhouse).—Killed: Duncan Wooly, L. Justice.

Company K (Capt. Messer).—Killed: Alfred Carver.

C. E. FLEMING.

Surgeon, 22nd South Carolina Regiment.

Capt. Henry C. King, of the Sumter Guard, Charleston Battalion, who was announced as mortally wounded in our last issue, died last evening. Private Samuel F. Edgerton, of the same company, whose wound was at first reported not serious, also died yesterday. The loss of the Sumter Guard has indeed been heavy. Their First Lieutenant, J. Ward Hopkins, was severely wounded in an action a few days before, and the company is now left with but one commissioned officer, Lieut. Barbot.

The following is a list of the Confederates wounded in the battles before Richmond previous to the seven days' fight, who were taken prisoners by the enemy and confined in Fortress Monroe.

Hampton Cowan, Company B, 22nd North Carolina, from Marion, South Carolina; Joseph A. Saunders, Company E, 6th South Carolina, Chester; Joseph B. Thompson, Company

F, 6th North Carolina, Saxaplaw; William Brown, Company A, 4th Georgia, Irvington; Joseph Hays, Company C, 41st Virginia, Petersburg; W. B. Simonton, Company H, 6th South Carolina, Winsboro; S. T. Chandler, Company C, Hampton Legion, Clarendon district; Alex. Craig, Company E, 2nd Arkansas Battery, Scotland; E. M. Hollar, Company L, Palmetto Sharpshooters, South Carolina; John R. Martin, Company K, 49th Georgia, Ogdenville; H. Ella, Company K, 5th North Carolina, Salisbury; Thomas B. Brunet, Company D, Hampton Legion, South Carolina; S. F. Cole, Company C, Hampton Legion, Clarendon district; M. V. Blodch, Company C, 6th North Carolina, Orange county; W. C. Perry, Company I, 6th North Carolina, Wake county; Fred Bauck, Company F, 3rd Alabama, Montgomery; E. Keith, Company B, 16th North Carolina, Marshall; M. Bucke, Company C, 7th Tennessee, Gillespie, Tennessee; H. H. Davis, Company G, 41st Virginia, Petersburg, Virginia; L. F. McMaster, Company K, 22nd North Carolina, Franklinton, North Carolina; J. M. Lovell, Company C, 7th Tennessee, Gallatin, Tennessee; M. Cobble, Company G, 6th North Carolina; W. M. Mendenfree, Company C, 2nd Alabama, Tuskegee; E. Wilson, Company I, 14th Tennessee, Nashville; J. H. Canty, Company H, 3rd Alabama; A. Selickshurg, Company D, 18th Alabama, Selma; J. A. Brice, Company H, 6th South Carolina, Youngville; J. Kirksir, Company C, 11th Mississippi, Crawfordville; E. Handlin, Company I, 8th Alabama, Mobile; W. H. Askew, Company K, 11th Mississippi, Carro county; G. Gibner, Company G, 3rd Alabama, Lenthem; R. B. Jordan, Company K, 3rd Alabama, Mobile; William Woods, Company C, 6th North Carolina, Orange county; J. W. Lawson, Company H, 22nd North Carolina, Stokes; A. Benn, Company G, 13th Mississippi; R. Footman, Company K, 6th South Carolina; J. A. Crause, Company F, 22nd North Carolina, Alleghany; J. Q. Jones, Company A, Hampton Legion, South Carolina; B. Thompson, Company B, 2nd Mississippi, Tiphah; S. Derachio, Company C, Hampton Legion, South Carolina; W. J. Robinson, Company D, 11th Mississippi; J. J. Woodson, Company A, 53rd Virginia; Capt. W. G. Freeland, Company C, 6th North Carolina; W. J. Walker, Company H, 6th North Carolina; J. Jennings, Company C, 35th Georgia; A. Einhorn, Company F, 3rd Alabama, Montgomery; W. C. May, Company E, 22nd North Carolina, Guilford; C. Arnold, Company D, 4th Georgia, Cobb county; S. Lee, Company E, 11th Mississippi, Noxabee; S. W. Corly, Company B, Hampton Legion; A. T. Matlock, Company B, Hampton Legion; M. M. Little, Company A, 46th Virginia, Stafford; W. F. Bradford, Company E, 41st Virginia, Norfolk; W. Price, Company F, 11th Mississippi, Noxabee; J. Crushern, Company H, 3rd Alabama, Lowndeshoro; T. Walker, Company G, 3rd Alabama, Benton; L. Thomas, Company B, 41st Virginia, Hanover county; W. G. Bradfoot, Company E, 11th Mississippi, Lounds county; E. Cochnan, Company A, Hampton Legion, Georgetown, South Carolina; — Shell, Company I, 11th Mississippi; G. W. Cone, Company D, 16th North Carolina, Rutherfordton; J. B. Beaumont, Company D, Southern Rifles, Union Springs; Sergeant Pat Hearn, Company I, 8th Alabama, Mobile; William McCready, Company I, 8th Alabama, Mobile; S. B. Day, Company D, 3rd Alabama, Union Springs; W. A. Bayard, Company E, Hampton Legion; A. Pugh, Company M, 2nd North Carolina, Randolph county; S. W. Ward, Company E, 22nd North Carolina, Beauford; L. V. Green, Company D, Hampton Legion; Tom Pierce, 41st Virginia; C. A. Dougherty, Company C, 3rd Alabama, Tuskegee; E. A. Thomas, Company F, 11th Mississippi, Camden, Arkansas; J. F. Conner, Company K, 16th North Carolina, Lincoln; S. Bell, Company E, 22nd North Carolina, Guilford; W. C. Drawpen, Company C, 14th Tennessee, Springfield; B. H. Keiser, Company C, 3rd Alabama, Tuskegee; T. G. Loftons, Company H, 11th Mississippi, Houston; E. Anderson, Company F, 22nd North Carolina, Alleghany county.

The ladies of the Atlanta Hospital Association have presented Colonel John Morgan with a beautiful cane, in token of their gratitude and admiration of his deeds of daring in defence of their oppressed country.

The wife of General Beauregard, reported to be dead, is living, and in health.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following letter needs no introduction:—

Richmond, July 10.

My dear —,—You would not recognize Richmond, as the Richmond you knew, if you were suddenly transported into our midst. The city is crowded with soldiers and strangers, and since the last battles it is like one vast hospital. We cannot walk in any direction without meeting maimed or sick soldiers. I spend every morning in the hospitals. My time, as well as that of many, many other ladies, is spent almost entirely in preparing delicacies, and ministering to the comfort of thousands of poor sufferers. Oh, how often do I wish you were here to aid us in the work. My Heavenly Father has given me an unusual degree of health and strength during the past year, and I thank Him truly that I can use it in so good a cause. The large warehouses, as well as many others, have been fitted up for hospitals, and I visit there also. We have 300 patients there. The ladies are organized into societies and committees, and we often have large donations sent us from the country to distribute amongst them. I am so interested in the work that I will write you too much about it I fear. We have many heart-rending scenes around us, and our sympathies are daily called forth in behalf of some poor bereaved wife or mother. Never before did I realize the horrors of war. On several occasions, when fighting was going on in the neighbourhood of the city, and the flashing and sound of musketry was seen and heard, many of our ladies have worn anxious faces in behalf of loved ones exposed to danger, but never—no, never, have I seen anything like fear or trepidation. A firm trust that we are to be victorious seems to prevail amongst us. We have remained quietly at home, doing all in our power for the sufferers. Some families have been compelled to seek health in the country. In the city we have been deprived of all our usual summer luxuries; no ice, except a little for the sick; fruit, too, is all bought up for the hospitals. Many families are destitute of tea, coffee, sugar, &c. Wines and liquors of every kind are very high. Dry goods, too, would amaze you. Ten cent cotton and calico sell for a dollar a yard. Ladies common boots and shoes for $10 a pair, and other things are in proportion. So if you can persuade Europe to interfere and raise the blockade, we ladies will be very much obliged to you. Many of our gentlemen are so independent they do not wish any foreign interference, but prefer managing for themselves. We often see R.; they have a house full of sick soldiers. Mrs. — has six sons in the army, all doing good service. R. is a prisoner at Fort Warren; you know he was in the United States' navy. I. is staying with us. The second son is with Stonewall Jackson. The eldest was killed at Manassas. The rumour is to-day that Jackson is marching on to Washington. If he is spared he is destined to be one of the greatest heroes of this revolution. D. is full of energy as usual. You find him in camps, hospitals, &c., and always kind and sympathizing. I could write you a great deal more, my dear —, but I do not feel certain that this letter will reach you. If it does, let me know, and I will write again. C.

The following extract is from a letter addressed to a relative in London:—

HEAD-QUARTERS, June 19, 1862.

—, You cannot imagine the depth of hatred here for the Yankees. It is not loud as formerly, but has sunk into the hearts of every Southern man, woman, and child; and how could it be otherwise when we see the tyranny exercised by such men as McCook, at Nashville, and Butler, of New Orleans. I have been in the service a little over a month, and have passed through two of the hardest fought battles unscathed. The last was the battle of Seven Pines, called by the Yankees, Fair Oaks. The Yankees, as usual, claim the victory, but if ever a people were whipped, they were on that occasion.

We drove them from their outcraunchments, took their camps, and an immense amount of artillery, small arms, &c. For the two days we remained there, our army used their provisions, and sent an immense quantity to Richmond. B. was wounded in the hand, but is all right now. W. G.'s regiment was in the fight, but his name is not in the list of killed and wounded; therefore, you may be sure he is safe. T. T. is in a company at Mobile. H. G. was at Corinth, in the Alabama Regiment that so distinguished itself. Do not feel uneasy about me, if I should by any chance get wounded, I have three invitations to private houses to be nursed, and need not go into the hospital. W.

The following letters, though long on the way, are still interesting. They are addressed to a Southern lady residing in England by her nephew and niece:—

May 23.

Headquarters, 1st Regiment, Virginia.

MY DEAR —, I have asked L. to write to you as I am so busy, and it is difficult to find a way of writing in camp. This is the first time I have written with pen and ink for many a long day, and I feared you would not be able to read letters written with a lead pencil. I have just received your letters of December 24. I have sent you two long letters, one by an old friend, but it is difficult, and I can only get them through at long intervals. I am stationed near Richmond, in fact our whole army extends round the city. I was just in time for the battle of Williamsburg, having joined my regiment the night before it came off. We whipped the Yankees well, though they claim a great victory. They acknowledge to having 30,000 engaged where we had only 9000, and our own regiment captured a battery and repulsed five different regiments of the enemy, driving them off the field. That night we continued our retreat to where Johnston is. You must not be uneasy about us for we are getting on finely. N— and E— are somewhere south. I suppose E— was taken prisoner. He was in the Home Guard at New Orleans, or something of that kind, when the Yankees came. All the others of the family are in the regular service; but L—, of course, could not leave. Mrs. —, of Mobile, is very energetic at the hospitals. T— is lieutenant in a volunteer company. H. G— is adjutant of a regiment; his brother T— is in the army. That exhausts all my news from Mobile. Yours, W.

Richmond, May 21st.

My dear Aunt,—As there is a chance of sending you a letter, I must not miss it, more particularly as W— has not time to write. As he is of course the most interesting person to you, I will speak of him first. He has been appointed adjutant of the 1st Virginia Regiment. Joined it only two days before the Battle of Williamsburg, was in the thickest of the fight all day, and came out without a scratch. It was a great victory to us, let our enemies say what they will. His military career was inaugurated under such happy auspices, that I hope a brilliant future is before him as a soldier. The hardships of a very fatiguing march, and a kind of life to which he had so long been unaccustomed, made him a little sick, but he is well now. His regiment is very near this city, but his duties are such as to prevent his coming in often. I have only seen him twice. Aunt M— I hear from occasionally; they are all well, but they have lost all their negroes, I believe. Aunt — is cut off from the mails; the only news I got from her is when she can send a letter by a straggling soldier. My own brothers are all in the army, and all safe yet—that is, they are all living. P— is a prisoner somewhere in Yankee-land, but well. My husband, all my cousins, uncles, of whom I have a goodly number, are in the army. We have not been called yet to mourn the loss of any of our darlings, and I am happy to say they are as full of patriotism as heart could wish. How much I wish I could tell you all about the affairs of our country, for I know you cannot see Southern papers, and therefore cannot know the truth on one single point; but as there is a possibility that my letter may be seen by enemies, I must content myself by saying that we are certain of success. I cannot tell you how thankful I am that W— came home to take his part in it. If he had not taken his share in the war, he could not again have shown his face in his country. He would have forfeited his self-respect, as well as that of every man and woman of the South. Even should he die in the cause, dearly as I love him, I could never regret that he came. I would not withdraw one of my brothers, or anyone I love, from the service if I knew it would preserve their lives. I can give you no idea how we all feel, but you can judge of it when you think that worth, justice, honour, lives, homes, and fortunes are all embraced in one cause. Who can care to have a husband or brother they could not respect, and who would respect the man unwilling to pour out his heart's best blood in the cause for which we fight? We think of nothing, dream of nothing, talk of nothing but "the war;" that must be my apology for writing of nothing else. I hope you and — will not be unhappy about us, who are exposed to the dangers of these troublous times. I feel that we are perfectly safe—never have felt a fear yet, and never shall regret the separation of our States from the Union, even if the life of every man in the South be the price paid for our independence. I am glad you are in a place of safety, as you are not men, but would be glad to see you again, and live in hopes of that happy day coming when we shall all be together again in peace. The Episcopal Convention is sitting here now, but it is a very different one from the last you attended here, just enough members to form a quorum, not a man to spare.

LUCY.

Extract of a Letter from New Orleans, dated July 4:—

Notwithstanding the large import of flour from New York, prices are higher than ever before. We deemed the prices exorbitant during the blockade, when we had to pay $20 to $25 in Confederate notes per barrel; but now the bakers have to pay $35 and $40 in bank notes (which are at about 15 per cent. discount for gold.) This state of things would be unintelligible, if I did not explain that we have only one merchant in the city, who holds the entire large stock in the warehouses, and this no less a personage than the Honourable Major-General Butler. It sounds fabulous; but we hear it daily confirmed by the reports of captains of vessels arriving. There are only four tow-boats here, which are entirely controlled by Butler. On the arrival of vessels at the bar, word is sent to the captains, who have flour or coal to sell, that their vessels will be towed up only on condition of a sale of the cargo to some agent of General Butler, who secures coal at a moderate price to resell it to the United States, his own government, at $18 per ton, or four and five times the price he gave for it.

We have constantly the most contradictory reports from Virginia. They are mostly rumours in favour of the Southern army, but they find at once the most violent contradiction in our newspapers, which are printed under Butler's direction, and contain slips from Northern papers unfavourable to the Southern arms. The Northern newspapers never reach us, they are rigorously suppressed by order of our military commander.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, August 7.

The Secretary of the Treasury has, by his first issues of irredeemable and inconvertible notes, driven all the specie from circulation; the emissions now being made ready, when floated as currency, will chase all the bank "promises to pay" from existence. This will surely put an end to the stock operations in Federal securities, and render them valueless for the gambling operations of the "bulls" and the "bears." The premium on gold has declined 6 per cent. from the highest point it touched; this is owing to many of the small holders being content with a handsome profit, and the fact that the importers, during the month of July, were so hard pressed for money to pay the duties on their importations before the revised tariff went into operation, that they were unable to purchase bills in London, and hence the decline in exchange, and consequent fall in the price of gold. So soon, however, as the foreign merchandize is disposed of, the gross sales—including cost, freight, duty, and profit—will have to be remitted for in specie or specie funds, as the bills drawn against the shipments of grain do not now amount to over one-fourth the value of the importations; besides which the sales of bonds and stocks on European account are on the increase. The duties paid during July, in United States demand notes, amounted to $9,000,000 against $2,000,000 the corresponding month last year. The importations since January I have been $104,000,000 of merchandize, and $46,000,000 of securities, making a total of $150,000,000; against this the exportations of produce were $77,000,000, and specie $38,000,000, summing up $115,000,000, leaving a deficit of $35,000,000, to say nothing of the large floating commercial and financial balances due to Europe. The great ease in the English money market has so far staved off much trouble in Wall-street, but should the Bank of England advance its rate of discount there will be serious times here. Many intelligent persons think that the Tax Bill will never be collected; that before the 1st of September the Washington Government will become a matter of history. There is no doubt whatever that in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and in the Western States there is a large majority of persons opposed to the war. The same is becoming the case in this State, but we are so Yankeeized by close proximity to New England that we are much more slow to move. This is the land of "isms;" there has been an Hibernian-African row at Brooklyn, which may be called pat-riot-ism. The influence of the Irish is very great in the city, and the first effort to force a sofi of the Emerald Isle into the Federal service against his consent will cause a riot, to be followed by the overthrow of the civil authorities, who are in league with Lincoln and Seward, and the appointment of a Vigilance Committee to take charge of the municipal affairs. Mr. Lincoln has added another item to his vulgarities by appearing at a political meeting, and making a speech in his usual unhappy style—such a step had never before been taken by any President. Mr. Buchanan was very much censured for addressing a Committee of the Breckinridge Association from the steps of the White House, but that was a mere trifle in comparison with the recent outrage upon the dignity of the office of Chief Magistrate of the United States.

PARIS, August 20.

Garibaldi's design is said to be to cross over to the Calabrias, and attack the French army at Rome. Rather than to see his country progressing quietly under liberal and orderly institutions, he threatens to unmake the Italy which he has made. If he indulges in the absurd belief that he made Italy, why should not he believe it his right to unmake it?

Napoleon III. does not seem to be the man to submit to the threats of Garibaldi; and the Marquis de Lavalette has officially assured the Pope that no invasion of the States of the Church shall be allowed, and that the French army will protect the integrity of the Papal territory against all insult.

It had taken but a few years for liberal and constitutional little Piedmont to transform itself into a kingdom of 20,000,000 of subjects. It might take but a few months for Mazzini and his tool, Garibaldi, to destroy all the fond hopes of the friends of Italy and of constitutional liberty.

The Turkish question seems to quiet itself, and the statu quo bids fair to be again the state of Eastern affairs, after a patched up treaty between Prince Nicolas and Omer Pacha, and a patched-up settlement about the Belgrade fortress, shall have once more postponed the solution of the vexed problem.

The departure of the next convoy of French troops for Mexico will probably take place on the 25th inst. General Bazaine is to sail in the St. Louis. No new tidings have been received of the expedition since my last. The little French army, of course, maintains its ground, and it succeeds in keeping its communications open against the swarming Mexican horsemen.

We have heard again of the cuirassed frigate La Normandie. On her way from Madeira to Martinique, she spoke to a sailing vessel bound East, and gave her some letters for the French secretary of the navy. It appears that this trial of her voyage across the Atlantic is a complete success thus far. She has reached already the warm latitudes, and all are busy on board in noting methodically the effects of the warm temperature on the plating and on the interior arrangements. Valuable information is obtained daily as regards both the building of iron-plated ships and the proper conditions for the welfare of the crews on board.

You have heard already of the fete of August 15 in Paris, and of the reception of the Spanish Ambassador. You can form a judgment of the effect produced at Madrid by the Emperor's speech from the following extract of the Contemporain of the 15th:—

It is undeniable that the reply of the Emperor of the French to the Spanish Ambassador produced a great sensation at Madrid. What has most attracted attention is, that the Emperor speaks only of the Queen personally, and makes no allusion to her responsible Ministers. The circumstance that the new Ambassador must have been made acquainted with the speech beforehand renders matters still worse. The misisterial press should give some explanation on this point. One important inference may be drawn from the Imperial Speech. The Emperor says that General de la Concha is animated with the same sentiments as his predecessor, from which it would appear that he will not negotiate on other bases. It is well known that M. Mon resigned because he did not approve of the policy of General Prim, which was sanctioned by the Government. General de la Concha, according to the opinion of Napoleon III., has instructions contrary to that policy, and, will, therefore, continue the work of M. Mon. This has also been the general opinion at Madrid from the very first. It results from the Emperor's concluding phrases that he leaves to the wisdom and patriotism of the Spanish Government the choice of accepting or rejecting irrevocable projects. We shall soon see the result of General Concha's first negotiations with the Court of the Tuileries.

The Emperor has left for the Camp at Chalons, with the Imperial Prince. Some interesting experiments in military telegraphy took place there some days ago. An apparatus having been established in a tent at the headquarters, another one was placed in a carriage, and the two were kept in correspondence, by a wire developing itself as the carriage was driven off. It is reported that the distance might have been lengthened to twenty miles. The officers at both ends could keep up a perfect and instantaneous communication with each other. The experiments were considered very satisfactory.

A great deal of disputing is going on about La France. M. de La Guéronnière is not the exponent of the Imperial policy—so say the rival Constitutionnel and the rival Patrie—but nobody can destroy the indisputable fact that the renowned Senator is always better posted than any one else as regards the feelings and opinions of the great statesman to whom France has confided her destinies. Again, others are announcing the appearance of a fourth concurrent in the race, bearing also the more or less official colours; M. Piétri, General Hutton, Marquis de Lavalette, to be at the head of the project.

The new Session of the "Conseils Généraux" will be opened in a few days. We have had a new victim of "rope dancing,"—Mrs. James Potter; the rope broke under her, and she fell from a considerable height, and was seriously injured. "My poor children!" were her first words, when she was able to speak. It will not, probably, be long, in this well-regulated country, before the authorities put a stop to these barbarous spectacles.

At the theatre of the Opera Comique, a new attraction is drawing the amateurs of music, despite the warm weather. They have begun the performance of an opera of Pergolesi, dating from 1730—first played in Italy, and most successful there, it was afterwards given on the French stage; and we can again admire the tunes which were so much applauded by our great grandfathers.

The corn crops have been suffering in the South of France, from the total want of rain. In the centre the reports are of an average crop, whilst they are most favourable in the North. On the whole, the return is above an average.

The Bourse maintains itself with very slight fluctuations, and no animation whatever, at nearly the same stereotyped quotations.

A committee of subscriptions has been organized in Paris, with a view to raise a bronze statue to the memory of Parmentier, who introduced the potatoe into France.

The anxiety of the friends of the South here is very great to get at last the news of the great tumbling down of the Washington mob despotism. We all knew long ago that it was doomed. Foreigners, perfectly ignorant of the country, may be deluded; but every man of sense who has seen America never doubted for an instant the triumph of the Southern cause and the ruin of her baffled enemies; yet the tyrants can still do a great deal of mischief before they are stripped of their usurped power. They are now trampling down every law of civilized warfare, just as they had already every law of international right. They have, though, soon to stand the conscription and the taxes, and I have not a shadow of a doubt that they will not survive these two self-inflicted blows.

ON THE DEFENCE OF TOWNS AND CITIES.

BY JOHN M. RICHARDSON, PROFESSOR IN GEORGIA MILITARY INSTITUTE.

(1) Vauban destroyed the equilibrium between the attack and the defence of fortified places. Since his time every beleaguered place, however well fortified, garrisoned, and supplied, not succour ed by a relieving army, has fallen when besieged by a force sufficiently strong and adequately provided with the usual means of attack. The superiority of the attack over the defence has been continually increasing, and has now, perhaps, reached its maximum, until some new projectile force, more effective than gunpowder, shall have been discovered; but the means of defence have hardly improved since the days of Vauban, except so far as the increased range of firearms may be an advantage, by allowing a greater development of the works of the defence, and by forcing the attack to open at a point more distant than hitherto.

It is doubtful, however, whether the defence draws any real advantage from the development of its works, except in certain localities in which the defence occupies all the practicable ground, and the attack can find no place on which to plant a battery; and the attack can hardly be said to be placed at any disadvantage by being forced to commence at points much more distant than hitherto, because the fire of the attack is so very greatly more destructive now at double distances than it formerly was at single.

(2) The superiority of the attack over the defence arises from—

1. Ricochet firing.
2. The multiplicity of the curved fires of the attack.
3. The defence being at the centre of a circle, of which the attack occupies the circumference, the fire of the attack is converging, whilst that of the defence is diverging.
4. Dead angles of defence and the sectors without fire.
5. The impossibility of making a good muzzle to muzzle fight, owing to the weakness of the works that protect the guns and gunners of the defence, and the vastly superior number of guns brought to bear by the attack upon the defence.

(3) The progress of a siege is briefly this: The attack opens at a given distance, soon discounts the barbette batteries, and forces the gunners to take refuge in the casemates; breaching batteries are then brought up, the scarp is battered, a practicable breach is made, and the garrison surrenders.

When the place can be surrounded by the attacking party, the duration of a siege is usually a matter of simple calculation. Thirty-two days have usually been sufficient for the reduction of the strongest places.

(4) To restore the equilibrium between the attack and the defence it is required—

1st. To guarantee the material and personnel of the defence against ricochet and curved fires, and thus force the enemy to abandon the distant attack, and advance to the muzzle to muzzle struggle.

2nd. So to locate and protect the casemate batteries, that the enemy cannot reach and destroy them by any other means than by subterranean warfare.

3rd. To command the ground so thoroughly as to force the enemy to commence his system of mines at the greatest possible distance from the counterscarp of the outer ditch.

These requirements can only be satisfied by placing all the works of the defence with an armour of wrought-iron sufficiently thick to resist the heaviest projectiles of modern times—by using none but casemated batteries, and by so locating and protecting them, that they cannot be reached by the distant attack, nor affected by the proximate.

When these requirements have been satisfied, the only resort of the besieger is to subterranean warfare. In this struggle, the advance is with the besieged, because he has prepared the ground in advance, and located obstacles on the progress of the besieger in every spot not needed for his own system of mines. The place can only fall, then, when its means for active defence have been exhausted, for its passive obstacles to the progress of the besieger remain untouched.

It may not be strictly necessary to protect all the works of the defence with iron armour-proof against shot and shell; but the scarps should be thus plated, and all casemated batteries for flank defence and direct firing. The parapet may consist exclusively of earth, as hitherto, but then it should be of such dimensions that the besieged may have it in his power to construct it at, at any time of the siege, by means of the sap, snakes, blind batteries to bear upon any point of the attack. Nor may it be strictly necessary to discard barbette firing altogether, only the pieces thus used, should be so lightly and easily handled, that they can be readily withdrawn at any moment, sheltering from ricochet firing, and again brought into play.

Fixed barbette batteries of heavy guns are hereafter worse than useless; they not only do little, if any, damage to the besieger, but are a source of unnecessary expense and loss to the besieged.

The days of barbette batteries, of masonry scarps, and of masonry forts, with two or three tiers of guns for sea-coast defence, are numbered. The engineer who relies upon them only prepares cruel disappointments for himself and terrible and disgraceful reverses for his country's arms.

(5) It is a question for economy and mechanics to decide, whether the present system of defensive works, retaining their development, may not have the thickness of their vertical sections so diminished, that the whole may be increased in iron, and completed at a less expense than the cost now. It is known that four to six inches of good wrought iron, sustained by two to three feet of solid timber, will perfectly resist the heaviest projectiles thrown at short distances from the improved artillery of modern times.

Whether or not masonry plated with iron will, without the introduction of an elastic cushion between the two materials, offer the same resistance as wood plated with iron, is for experiment to determine. But whether the cushion is or is not needed, to prevent the crumbling of the masonry under the shock of the projectiles, the employment of this defensive armour will place the material and personnel of the defence completely under shelter from curved and ricochet firing, will remove many of the objections that have hitherto prevailed against tiers of casemated batteries, and may even allow fortresses to resume the frowning and commanding heights they had before the discovery of gunpowder (if such heights are found advantageous to the defence), and the placing of barbette batteries so high up as to be exempt from ricochet fires.

(6) But it is probable that the war in which the Confederate States are now engaged, will not, during its continuance, give any opportunity for the construction of permanent works on a large scale, and the preceding remarks may seem to have no practical relevance to our affairs. They are chiefly introductory to some suggestions for the defence of such of our towns and cities as can be reached by the iron-clad vessels of the enemy.

(7) The conditions of a good defence require—

1st. Such a construction of our water and other batteries that they may be indifferent to the distant attack of mortars and rifled guns, and laugh at the muzzle to muzzle struggle.

2nd. Such a location of the batteries that a concentrated fire at short ranges may be brought to bear upon a series of dangerous points, over which the enemy's vessels must pass.

3rd. The obstruction of the water-way in such a manner that the enemy's vessels may be detained for the longest time possible under the very guns of the batteries;

4th. The employment, if possible, of floating batteries and gunboats. The first condition can be satisfied only by dispensing altogether with open batteries, and by building casemated batteries of heavy timber plated with iron. Some of these batteries should be sunken, so that their fires can just graze the surface of the ground; others may be more elevated; but the lower they are, the less they cost, the less the mark they offer to the enemy's guns, and the stronger they are.

For plating these batteries there is an abundance of railroad T iron, that may be used without any change of form, if the rolling mills of the Confederacy cannot convert them into plates with sufficient rapidity. For various reasons, plates are preferable to the rails, but especially because their fit would be more accurate than that of the rails. The lower layer is spiked down. The upper layer is secured to the lower, and held immovable by means of wedge bars of wrought iron. The rails should be horizontal.

The second condition can be satisfied by an intelligent location of the batteries, conformably to the accidents of the ground and the particular points of the channel to be rendered dangerous. Numerous guns of heavy calibre should be brought to bear upon these points, and the gunners, secure from the distant attack, instructed not to reply to it, unless a battery has been thrown up for that particular purpose, but to await with coolness and confidence the proximate one. Of course, it is supposed that the first condition has been satisfied, that the batteries are guaranteed from the distant attack, and that they cannot be taken in reverse from any bend of the channel within range.

Even if barbette batteries were not—except in the case of simple apartements on a battle-field—an absurdity in the present state of military art and science, the practice of mounting a few pieces in the salient of a work, and giving them a horizontal sweep of 180 degrees or more, is nothing more nor less than to invite the enemy to disable the guns and kill the gunners. It is impossible for a gun to defend a great arc of 90, or 180, or more degrees, of which it is the centre; it is criminal to expose men and guns, and call upon them to perform certain duties which it is impossible for them to discharge. Nothing but disaster has ever followed the practice; nothing but disaster can result from it.

The points to be defended by any particular gun should be few, their range accurately known, and the gun devoted to their defence. These points, called dangerous points, are not mathematical points, but spaces; they should be obstructed so as to detain the assailants in them, and numerous guns should be brought to bear upon them. These dangerous points should be as numerous as possible, and, if the means at command are sufficient, the whole of any given portion of a channel or waterway may be converted into a dangerous point.

This system of building batteries of wood and iron enables the engineer to diminish the space between adjacent embrasures to that just sufficient for manoeuvring the guns; the fire, therefore, from any given front of a work becomes a maximum. For defending a bend of a river from either the concave or the convex side, a circular battery of several guns firing through a single embrasure, may, under some circumstances, be used with advantage.

The third condition may be satisfied by sinking vessels, caissons or cribs of stone, or by constructing floating or sunken rafts of timber.

Where timber is abundant, a raft may be soon constructed which would not only obstruct a river in its entire width, but in its length for miles. A raft, to be of service, should not be a narrow one stretching across the river, for that could easily be removed by the enemy, or would, in all probability, be carried away by a rise of the river, or by a strong wind blowing down stream; it should extend up and down the river for a distance equal at the least to its width, and the branches of the trees should be so intermingled, and the trunks secured by chains, &c., that the whole would become a consistent and co-operative mass. It would be almost impossible for the enemy to remove such a raft, or for wind and flood to carry it away. Moreover, the whole could be secured to the bottom and banks by numerous anchors and stay-chains. For a narrow river there would be no difficulty timber being abundant, in the way of constructing such a raft. It may be supposed that such rafts could not resist the destructive action of the rivers themselves. Experience is our only guide. The chance constructed rafts on our Western rivers have resisted for years the persistent and untiring efforts of civilized man at their removal. A narrow band of ice extending from shore to shore of one of the tidal rivers of the North, would, on the rise or fall of the tide, be broken to pieces and washed away. But it is the universal experience on such rivers, that when once sheeted over with ice a few inches thick, although the rise and fall of the tides break the sheet into innumerable fragments of greater or less size, yet these fragments wedged against each other and the shore, continue to form a (in one sense) coherent mass, and defy the efforts of wind and wave at their removal.

In the construction of rafts, therefore, let the teachings of nature be followed. Don't make them in a narrow line across the river, but let their length, up and down the river, be at least equal to the width of the river. The length may with advantage be much greater than the width. Indeed, in particular cases, varying with the characteristics of rivers, it would be advantageous to make the lengths of the rafts measured up and down the stream, equal to several times the width of the river.

Batteries should command the rafts at all points. Indeed, batteries might be constructed on the rafts themselves. Those portions of the raft nearest the enemy should be protected not only by batteries, but by a well-located system of rifle-pits.

In addition to these fixed rafts, smaller ones, arrow-headed and solidly built, might be used for launching against the enemy's vessels. Torpedoes could be attached to them, and arranged to explode when the rafts come in collision with any heavy body.

Of the advantages of floating batteries and gunboats—both iron-clad—nothing needs be said; but, unfortunately, we have them not; and their construction requires so much time and skill, that, if not prepared before the place is attacked, they can hardly be got ready for service in time to assist in the defence. On every stream that will float them they should be in process of construction. They are thus briefly dismissed, because they are not properly in the province of the military engineer, according to modern systems.

This brief memoir being merely suggestive, none of the details of execution are given. If the principles alluded to and the means suggested can be made at all available in the defence of Richmond, Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, or Mobile, the writer will feel that he has done his country some service.

The modification of the means suggested, which may be rendered necessary for resisting a land attack, are so obvious that they need not be mentioned.

The following paragraph has appeared in the Southern papers:—"A large force was lately ordered out in Nashville for the purpose of capturing John H. Morgan, information having been given to the Yankee Provost Marshal that he had arrived in town the preceding night. The excitement took a new turn when it was discovered that the party to be arrested was only six hours old, a patriotic woman having bestowed that name on her last contribution to the population of the Confederacy."

THE DEMORALIZATION OF THE NORTH.

(From the Morning Post.)

If any one wishes to see to what a frightful extent a fratricidal war can demoralize a people, let him read the accounts, furnished by the American papers, of the great war-meeting held at Washington at the beginning of this month, under the auspices of President Lincoln. The savages in the yet uncivilized parts of America hold war meetings, and vow eternal enmity and utter extermination to their enemies. The ancient republics did the same; but that a great progressive nation, proud of its rapid growth, its liberty, its civilization, and its religion, should so far forget itself as to rival the wild Indian in savagery, and be so far behind its age as to have recourse to popular passion instead of patriotism, and to call in the fury of the mob in aid of the policy of Government, as the Greeks did three thousand years ago, is a spectacle which we had not thought to witness in the middle of the nineteenth century. Yet what wild tribe from the Red River or the South Sea Islands, dancing round its fires, and goading each other to fury by cries and curses, could exceed in deliberate cruelty and implacability the citizens of Washington on the occasion to which we refer? The resolutions passed were studiously inhuman, and were as disgraceful to the country as the assembly itself was inconsistent with the first principles of good government.

A war meeting, such as that reported, is an anomaly in any constitutionally-governed State. What must be thought of a Government which, in time of war, has no resource but to collect mobs, and, after exciting them with speeches full of blood and fire, to pledge them while in the burning heat of passion to extremities of policy and cruelty which make the rest of the world stand aghast in disgust and consternation? Wherever power may reside in a popular Government, surely the conception and direction of policy ought to rest in the Executive. But these war meetings presuppose the direct contrary. They appeal to those who have not the power to reflect, the wisdom to guide, the materials for forming a sound judgment, nor any responsibility to a superior power. The consequence is, that the great question which must sooner or later be entertained—whether the people of the South shall be recognized as independent, or exterminated as traitors—is not only indefinitely postponed, but hopelessly prejudged. The effect is most disastrous. The voice of reason may be heard in councils and cabinets. A few men solemnly deliberating under a deep sense of the gravity of the questions at issue, and of their own perilous responsibility, have some chance of arriving at what is right, and of seeing the true way out of a frightful complication. But the conscience of crowds is nowhere. Their judgment counts for nothing. Their policy is pretty sure to be destructive. The Government that is constitutionally bound to refer its measures in detail to a mob, is founded on a wrong principle, and must give way at the base. The Government that does so when it is not so bound, is helpless and incapable; its days are numbered, and its end not far off. Of course we can all understand the necessity, when a line of policy is determined upon, of keeping public opinion up to the mark, in order to get the greatest amount of popular support, especially when heavy burdens have to be imposed upon the people; and for this purpose public meetings, speeches, and explanations may be very proper and useful. But the war meetings, to which the Government of the Federal States is now resorting, are very different things, as may be seen by the resolutions adopted. We take it as a sad sign of weakness in the Government that it should appeal to such meetings, and as an indication of unspeakable brutality on the part of the people that resolutions, such as we have now to notice, should have been passed with any sort of unanimity.

The first resolution is to this effect—"We deliberately and solemnly declare that, rather than witness an overthrow of the Union, we would prosecute the present war until our towns and cities should be desolated, and we, and all that are dear to us, should have perished with our possessions. Let the Union be preserved, or the country be made a desert." Is this the language of reason, or of passion? Does it show the wisdom or the madness of the people? Is it policy or perversity? Did ever statesmen before goad a people to stake the very existence of a nation upon a single course, and to cut themselves off from any alternative? We are far from supposing that the good sense of the reflecting classes amongst the more respectable Americans will be compromised by manifestoes like these. The Washington mob may speak for themselves; they bind nobody else. But what are we to say of a Government that can put such language into a mob's mouth?

Another resolution states that if the war is not popularly supported it is from a want of confidence in those who have the direction of it. With this we have no fault to find. But the third is much more serious. After urging the President to observe no limit in the prosecution of the war but the resources of the country, it adds:—"We are convinced that the leaders of the rebellion will never turn to their allegiance, and therefore they should be regarded and treated as irreclaimable traitors, who are to be stripped of their possessions (!) and deprived of their lives (!), or expelled the country." These words will be read in this country with feelings of intense abhorrence. Their palpable injustice, their repugnance to any known principle of morals or religion, will make people on this side the Atlantic burn with very shame for the discredit done to the Anglo-Saxon race by the implacability of this degenerate people. We must accept this demonstration as a specimen of the expedients to which the Government will have recourse in order to stimulate the warlike frenzy of the populace. None know better than Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward that the war is beginning to stink in the nostrils of a large proportion of the citizens, and they therefore adopt this method of keeping up the war spirit to boiling point. They dread, above all things, a collapse in their resources. Signs of that collapse are too visible in the scarcity of money and the reluctance to enlist. If these continue the Union is lost. And, therefore, the nation is urged to pledge itself to no peace with the Confederates, no partition of territory, but to the Union, the entire Union, and nothing but the Union, or in default of that, national annihilation, and in the meantime every possible cruelty towards the rebels.

We have no sort of expectation that such pledges will be redeemed. Peace will come at last. The Union will not be re-constituted, nor will the Federal States be annihilated. The Yankees are good at repudiation, and the rabid outbursts of a Washington mob are not likely to be held binding on the rest of the community. But, as far as they go, these resolutions and their recourse to war meetings are a bad sign both of the moral condition of the American people and the prospects of the Federal Government. The effect of them on the minds of Europeans will be very painful. Few of us ever imagined that even a two years' civil war would have plunged a great people so low.

CUTTING OUT A FEDERAL TRANSPORT ON THE JAMES RIVER.

(From the Richmond Examiner.)

On Saturday morning a party of five of the Prince George Cavalry, (Captain Marks) consisting of Corporal Teller Cooke and Privates Thomas Martin, William Daniel, Alexander Dimitry, and William Williams, conceived and carried out successfully a private little enterprise of their own, which resulted in the burning of a large Federal transport, the capture of its commander, and the consternation and surprise of the Yankee fleet in the immediate neighbourhood. The party left Coggin's Point, on the south side of James River, five miles below City Point, about one o'clock on Saturday morning, in an open boat, armed with naked sabres and their revolvers. The Federal fleet of transports and gunboats lay around them. One gunboat was at anchor about 100 yards above them, and another half a mile immediately below, while several others, invisible at the time, were in various positions. The transports lay scattered along the channel, some not twenty yards apart. After getting among them, the party made a reconnaissance to discover the largest, and finally selected a splendid-looking schooner of 200 tons burden, which proved to be the Louisa Rives, of New York, loaded with corn, oats, and other articles of forage, and commanded by Captain John A. Jones. As they approached her, a dog on board commenced barking furiously; they plied their oars vigorously and quietly, and, reaching the bow chais, boarded the schooner without faltering. The crew were sleeping soundly, but the captain, awakened by the dog, rushed on deck from the cabin, and was met at the very door by Martin (himself a sailor), who seized him by the collar, and placing a pistol at his head, cautioned him that to speak a word was death. Taking the surprised captain back into his cabin, he was allowed to dress, and secure whatever valuables he wished to carry away with him. The mattresses were then drawn out, ripped open, and fired, the door locked, and the captain escorted to the boat. In a few moments the party reached the shore, when the flames burst from the fired vessel, and the whole fleet was in commotion. Small boats plied about in every direction, hawsers were attached to vessels, anchors weighed, and a general pulling and tugging commenced to keep clear of the burning vessel. In the meantime the crew of the Louisa Rives, awakened by the smoke, yelled "fire!" and scamped over the decks with buckets of water with all the volubility and nimbleness of New York "plugs." A boat was sent from one of the adjacent vessels to their relief and assistance, and for the additional purpose of saving the schooner if possible. But the crew had scarcely mounted the deck before a shell and some rifles which were in the cabin exploded. All hands commenced a general stampede, and tumbled over the bulwarks into their boats in the utmost confusion. No farther attempt was made to save the vessel and she burnt to the water's edge. The heroes of this achievement, concealed in the woods above Coggin's Point, watched the event with the utmost satisfaction, and then carried their prisoners into quarters. They stated that they would have taken the whole crew, but their boat was leaky, with a hole in one side just a little above the water line, so that if they had taken the crew in, all would have gone down together. Had they stopped to lower a boat from the vessel, their manoeuvre would doubtless have been observed, and their capture the consequence."

SHELLING A BRITISH STEAMER.

(From the Nassau Guardian.)

One of the most glaring outrages we have ever had occasion to record took place within sight of our citizens on July 25. At daybreak two steamers were observed from the shore, one giving chase to and firing at the other. The vessels tumbled out to be the Federal man-of-war Adirondac (14), Commander Gansevoort, and the English steamer Herald, Captain Coxetter. We have been favoured with the particulars by an eye-witness on board the latter vessel. The Herald was steering for Nassau at half-speed, the lighthouse being in sight, and shortly afterwards saw a vessel about two-and-half miles ahead. At half-past five o'clock she was about four points off the starboard bow, and a mile distant. She then changed her course and stood for the Herald, as if to cross her bows. When within 200 or 300 yards of her she rounded up alongside. The former then hoisted the British flag, and the latter fired a shotted gun across her stern. The Herald kept on her course, still at half-speed, when the other fired a shot across her bows, slightly grazing her, and afterwards showed the American flag. On this Captain Coxetter ordered all steam to be put on his vessel, when the American sheered off between 300 and 400 yards, and fired a broadside, which was ineffective. From this time she kept up a continuous fire, throwing shell, solid, chain, and grape shot; giving chase, and not desisting till the Herald was within two miles or less of the lighthouse. The flag was shot down, but immediately replaced. The deck was splintered over the cabin by a shell, part of which was found on board. Captain Coxetter stood on the paddle-box all the time, and was heard to exclaim, "He may sink me; but he shall not take me." No material damage was done to the vessel, and not a man on board was hurt. The Herald entered the harbour between six and seven o'clock, and reported the case to Captain Hickley, of Her Majesty's ship Greyhound, who immediately got up steam and proceeded to the Adirondac, for the purpose of protesting against the proceedings of Captain Gansevoort. The captain of the Federal man-of-war, however, asserts his right to search any vessel suspected of carrying contraband of war within three miles of any coast, and quotes "Vattel on International Law" in support of the step he has taken. The subject, we understand, will be referred to the Home Government, at the request of Captain Gansevoort. With all due deference to the captain of the Adirondac and the authority he has brought forward in support of his untoward act, we feel convinced that the Imperial Government will never countenance such a gross infringement of the neutrality laws; and we sincerely trust that no similar outrage will be perpetrated again within our waters. Our goods are detained from month to month by the Custom-house authorities of New York; our vessels are constantly being boarded by Federal gunboats within our own waters, and that while our time-honoured flag is flying; not even the mail packet British Queen can pass along unmolested, for she was fired at and brought to this very passage. Only a few weeks ago the British steamer Bermuda was captured off Abaco, within sight of the lighthouse; and on the 8th inst. what do we find?—why, the Federal gunboat Adriatic carrying off the British steamer Adela within sight of the Bimiois. It is high time to put an end to these unheard-of proceedings.

GENERAL BUTLER'S THREATENED BRUTALITY TO PRISONERS OF WAR.

The following correspondence needs no explanation. It will be observed that the resolution of General Ruggles had a very salutary effect on General Butler.

Headquarters, First District,
Department Mississippi and East Louisiana,
Tangipahoe, La., July 21, 1862.

To Major-General Butler, Commanding United States' Forces,
New Orleans, La.:

General.—The bearers of this note, Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Jones, Volunteer Aid-de-Camp, and First Lieutenant Alexander Barry, Confederate States' Army, are charged with delivering to you, under a flag of truce, a communication concerning prisoners of war, which will, I trust, receive your earliest consideration. I have to request that these gentlemen be permitted to return by the best practicable means and under proper protection. I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
DANIEL RUGGLES,
Brigadier-General, Commanding Department.

Headquarters, First District,
Department East Louisiana and Mississippi,
Tangipahoe, La., July 15, 1862.

To Major-General Butler, Commanding United States' Forces,
New Orleans, La.:

General.—I have received petitions from officers of the 1st Regiment Louisiana Partisan Rangers touching the case of Henry Castle, a private of Company B of that regiment; and also an application respecting Thomas C. Pennington, a private of Captain Wilson Tate's company of the same regiment, and I deem it expedient to request your early consideration of the subject. It appears that Private Castle was captured by a detachment of Federal troops in the vicinity of Baton Rouge, on or about the 7th of the present month, and Private Pennington on or about the 28th day of June; that they were taken to New Orleans, and are now held either there or at one of the forts in the vicinity, in close confinement, with the threat that they are to be tried and executed as members of a military organization not sanctioned by the laws of civilized warfare. It is to be observed that the first great law of nature, the right of self-defence, is inherent in communities as well as individuals. No law condemns the individual who slays the robber or assassin; and no just law can condemn a community for using all its power to resist the invader and drive him from their soil. The exercise of this right, so universally recognized, becomes an imperative duty when the invader, as has been the case with the Federal troops in this district, disregards those rules of warfare recognized and respected by all civilized nations, and adopts that code which has heretofore been confined to the rudest savages. The proof of this is unfortunately too abundant in the vicinity of Baton Rouge. It is attested by helpless women and children flying from their burning homes, and by desolation of plantations, by the plunder of private property, and the wanton destruction of growing crops. Such acts are crimes against humanity, and justify all men in taking up arms against their perpetrators. The independence of nations has rarely been achieved by regular armies. Our own Revolution—that Revolution which successfully established the great principle for which the Confederate States are now contending, "that all Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," was mainly fought out by men who left the plough at the news of the enemy's approach, and returned to it when he had been driven back. It may be conceded that in Europe, where the Governments mainly rely upon large standing armies, which are as much as possible disconnected with the people, and where the policy is to prevent the people from bearing arms under almost any circumstances, some very absurd refinements on this subject have been asserted, and, to some extent, tolerated. But such doctrines have never been recognized on this continent. The United States especially have repudiated them.

The various revolutions which have agitated the Central and South American States have been conducted by the people, frequently without organization and without leaders other than those chosen upon the spur of the occasion, to direct a single enterprise. And to recur to the Revolution of our forefathers, the history of that immortal struggle abounds with instances where the hardy yeoman—as at Lexington and Bunker Hill—were, like the clansmen of Roderick Dhu, called by a concerted signal to some "Limerick mead," and there selected their officers on the very field of battle. But whatever differences of opinion may exist upon this point, it has never been claimed, even by the most stringent advocates of legitimacy, that one belligerent has any right to complain of the name or form which the other may choose to give to its military organization. The right to adopt these to the peculiar service required has been universally conceded; so far, indeed, has this practice been carried in naval warfare that privateersmen—"the militia of the seas"—with charters as broad as the ocean's bounds, are recognized as legitimate among belligerents. And now, indeed, the extraordinary spectacle is presented to the contemplation of civilized man in this boasted nineteenth century of the Christian world, of a nation claiming to be civilized, in violation of its constitutional obligations, inaugurating deliberately servile war by stimulating the half-civilized African to raise his hand against his master and benefactor, and thus make war upon the Anglo-Saxon race—war on human nature. This with the Federal Government is legitimate warfare; but the defence of their firesides by Southern citizens is treason and murder. In military organizations, the Polish Lancers, French Zouaves, and British corps of scouts and guides in this late East Indian war are cases in point. The Confederate States claim and have exercised this undoubted right. The formation of companies, battalions, and regiments, of Partisan Rangers, has been especially authorized by an Act of Congress. The officers of this corps are commissioned. The men are regularly mustered into service, receive pay, rations and equipments from the Government, and are entitled to the same privileges and governed by the same regulations as all other troops in the Confederate service. It is asked, therefore, what pretext can be offered by the enemy for subjecting the members of this corps to a different treatment from that extended to other prisoners of war? Certainly, no such distinction can be recognized or tolerated by us. The Government, having called these men into service, is bound, by every obligation of good faith, to protect them to the extent of its power; and if found necessary for their protection, as well as for that of numerous unarmed citizens, who have been subjected to outrages unparalleled in civilized warfare, will not hesitate, I feel constrained to declare, to resort to retaliation, even to the extent sanctioned by the Jewish law—an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and life for life. I await an answer containing an explicit declaration of the intentions of the United States' Government respecting these prisoners.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
DANIEL RUGGLES,
Brigadier-General Commanding District.

To which General Butler replied as follows:—

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, La., July 23, 1862.

General.—It is the intention of the United States' Government to let these men go on their parole, and one of them has been gone more than a week.

I have the honour to be your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
Major-General Commanding.
Brigadier-General Ruggles, Commanding at Tangipahoe.

THE VICTORY AT MURFREESBORO.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

Another most brilliant victory is added to the history of our struggle for independence. Hereafter, the 13th of July will be a day enshrined in the memory of Southern patriots. This most successful expedition had been planned, and for days was moving forward from Chattanooga. On Saturday, at twelve o'clock, the command, about 1600 strong, left the vicinity of McMinnville, and, after a march of fifty miles, the grey dawn of the quiet Sabbath found the command all safely within two miles of Murfreesboro. Being halted here for a few minutes, the arms were examined and the plan of attack agreed upon. Again the word of command was given, and they moved forward. The Texas Rangers had led the advance during the entire march, and they still occupied the position. In a few minutes more a gun fired, and the pickets on the Woodbury pike were their prisoners. Then commenced this dashing charge in good earnest.

Colonel Forrest had assigned the attack on the first encampment to Colonel John A. Wharton and his daring Rangers, together with Colonel Lawton and the Second Georgia Cavalry, whilst he was to lead the remainder against the other forces. The Texans were now fully in earnest, and they spontaneously awoke the still morning with their usual terrific yell, which enlightened the charge; and when Colonel Wharton, at the head of the column, reached the point where he was to turn to the right, he led his men and dashed forward. By some means the regiment was here divided, and only 120 men of all these assigned to this important work were found with him, the remainder of the regiment, and Colonel Lawton's regiment following Colonel Forrest. Supposing his whole force was with him, he at once charged through the brigade wagon-yard, and through the 7th Pennsylvania Cavalry, a portion of it being here—probably 125—then into the Michigan 9th, which was just beyond, and already formed in a hollow square to receive the charge.

The fire being now exhausted, and the support failing to come up, they reloaded in face of the enemy, and bravely charged on foot. Thus did this Spartan band fight on foot or mounted, as circumstances justified, for four long hours. Supposing all the while that reinforcements would come to their relief, they heroically battled against four times their number, who had the advantage of position and long-range guns, at every point inflicting terrible havoc upon the enemy. During one of these foot charges, the Colonel, being mounted, and leading his intrepid band, received a severe flesh-wound in his arm. But, nothing daunted, he still retained command until some time after, when Lieut.-Col. Walker came up, and he turned it over to him. He soon effected a union with the remainder of the regiment, and, with Major Thomas Harrison, led until the final surrender at eleven o'clock.

During these four bloody hours, this small number, soon reduced below a hundred, did the work assigned to a thousand men; and undoubtedly to their gallantry, persistent determination, and unflinching charges upon these camps, is mainly attributable the final glorious issue. No blame can be imputed to the other three-fourths of the regiment for not participating in this most honourable and desperate conflict, for they were, by some strange blunder, led to another part of the field, where their fighting was unavailing. Surely, if gallant bearing and glorious success, gained by desperate fighting, is ever rewarded in this great struggle for home, happiness, and liberty, then should "Murfreesboro" be inscribed in golden letters upon their battle-flag by order of the Commanding General. Modern times do not furnish an instance where such a badge of honour and distinguished valour have been more heroically won, or more dearly purchased. But let the figures tell the story of their deeds of daring, and the brilliant success of that noble 120.

During the different charges they killed and wounded thirteen of the Pennsylvania Cavalry, and in the camp of this 9th Michigan 103, as their officers acknowledge. Among these, Lieutenant Chase was killed, and George Duffield was severely wounded. He gives Colonel Wharton credit for shooting him, and then pays him a well-merited compliment in saying that he is the bravest man he ever saw upon the field of battle. Well might he say this when hearing the clear voice of the gallant colonel crying out above the roar of musketry, "Charge them, my men! charge them," as they rushed, time after time, with renewed courage upon their foes. But this result was not accomplished until every fifth man was killed or wounded. During this continuous engagement they brought out over 100 prisoners, and fired the brigade waggons—thus destroying a considerable amount of forage—at the same time securing a large number of mules.

Then the surrender of the whole command took place; some 300 or 400 were surrendered from this encampment. It was here the principal fighting took place during the morning, and this decided the glorious victory of the day. For, although the Georgians gallantly received the fire at the Court-house, where the enemy were protected, yet, whilst pouring a deadly fire into their ranks, he, in return, suffered but little. They made a charge upon the battery, but were repulsed, and it was surrendered with the remainder. This was Captain Hewitt's celebrated Kentucky Battery; whilst the Minnesota 3rd had no general attack. But of this 120, who were thrown, unsustained, upon greatly superior numbers, every man seemed to feel the responsibility of his position, and nobly did each one do his duty.

Among the most active and daring, and, at the same time, most conspicuous, was Adjutant Royston, whose chivalric bearing was observed wherever duty called and danger was to be met. He was cool on all occasions, and a stranger to fear. Upon Colonel Wharton was conferred the honour of bringing the prisoners through to this city, where they arrived safely today. He was accompanied by Company B of the Texas Rangers.

Among the forty-five officers is found General T. T. Crittenton.

den, of Indiana, with one colonel, two lieutenant-colonels, one major, eleven captains, and twenty-nine lieutenants. Colonel Forrest had previously paroled about 1100 privates. Over 300 mules and horses, with some fifty waggons, were captured. With these a splendid lot of arms, some ammunition, stores, &c. A large amount of quartermaster and commissary stores were destroyed. In brief, everything was brought away or destroyed, thus making a clean sweep. It was a complete surprise to the enemy and a perfect success for our cavalry. We hope that many such may follow in quick succession, until Tennessee shall be delivered from the power of the oppressor, and be once more free and prosperous.

The forty-five Federal officers captured by Colonel Forrest at Murfreesboro, on the 13th inst., arrived in Knoxville on the 21st. The privates and some wounded officers were released on their parole by Colonel Forrest. Among other good things done by Colonel Forrest, he released from the jail in Murfreesboro a Confederate Lieutenant from Alabama, a private from Tennessee, and three citizens, who had been placed in jail by the Yankees, and who had received felons' treatment. These Federal officers are greatly chagrined at their surrender to so small a force, unaided by infantry or artillery. They say that their forces were in three separate camps, at some distance from each other; were attacked in detail, and were completely surprised—that Colonel Lester, of the 9th Michigan Regiment, surrendered without firing a gun—that Brigadier-General Crittenden had only assumed command on Saturday, the day before the fight—that he had intended to concentrate his forces in one camp, and, if Forrest had only waited two days, he would not have been successful.

The number of Yankees killed and wounded was about 25; prisoners captured about 1250—of the 3rd Minnesota Regiment, 600; 9th Michigan, 500; Pennsylvania Cavalry, 150; Hewitt's Kentucky Battery of four guns, two brass and two steel; 300 horses and mules; 60 waggons; several ambulances, and 2000 stand of arms. The Federal camps, with all their contents, embracing a large lot of new clothing, were burned, as was also the depot at Murfreesboro, containing near half a million dollars' worth of quartermasters' and commissary stores. Several railroad bridges near Murfreesboro were also burnt.

The Confederate forces engaged, 1300 to 1600. The Confederate loss in killed and wounded was about 46.

THE RAILWAY MERRIMAC.

(From the Charleston Mercury, July 12.)

For weeks before the opening of the recent bloody battles before Richmond, hundreds of citizens daily flocked to look upon and wonder at an iron-clad railroad battery that was being swiftly but mysteriously constructed on the railroad near the York River depot. Many were the speculations as to the specific purpose for which it was designed, and not a few were the predictions that it would prove a failure. Some persons, indeed, conceived so low an opinion of its usefulness as to predict that it would be "taken prisoner" on its first trip. Unchecked by ominous predictions, the work went on, and the battery was completed. Lest our enemies should borrow the idea, we refrain from giving a minute description of the work. It is an iron-clad battery, mounted on seven sets of wheels, and carrying one large rifle gun. The whole machine was propelled by an ordinary locomotive.

Lieutenant James Barry, of the Norfolk United Artillery, was assigned to the command of the novel craft. His crew consisted of Sergeant Daniel Knowles and thirteen men, all members of the same artillery corps. Mr. N. S. Walker, one of the engineers of the York River Railroad, volunteered to run the engine which was to push the battery into action. Owing to the breakage of one of the timbers supporting the gun, the first trip of the battery down the railroad proved a failure, and it was necessary to bring it back to the city for repairs. These were soon effected, and on Saturday evening it again got under way, and bore down toward the Yankee army at Fair Oaks. It was halted that night at our last entrenchment, between five and six miles from Richmond. Sunday morning the engine attached to the battery got up steam, and Lieutenant Barry prepared for action and awaited orders.

The men were in exuberant spirits and anxious for the fray. At ten o'clock, a.m., having received orders from General Magruder, Lieutenant Barry proceeded down the road a mile, when his further advance was obstructed by the Yankee fortifications which crossed the track. About two hours were consumed in re-opening the track, when the battery advanced steadily down the road. About twelve o'clock, the battery being about seven miles from Richmond, Lieutenant Barry came in sight of several thousand Yankees moving at a double-quick down the road in front of him, in the direction of Savage's. He was about to open into the flying mass, when he was stopped by General Magruder, who suggested that they were our own troops in pursuit of the enemy. Just as the troops disappeared around a curve, one of the enemy's batteries, stationed in the woods in front of Savage's house, opened upon our forces, who were in the woods to the left of the railroad, and about seven miles from Richmond.

The first gun of the enemy killed General Griffiths, of Mississippi. Lieutenant Barry was ordered to engage this battery, which he did with such effect that the second shell from his gun silenced it. He then continued for some time to shell the woods near and around the spot from which the Yankee battery had retreated. At four o'clock he was ordered to proceed down the railroad abreast of our skirmishers, and to fire into anything and everything he saw ahead. As he turned the curve and entered Savage's field, he saw, a half a mile in advance of him, a party of Yankees engaged in setting fire to a train on the track. Having fired two shots into this train, a white flag was raised on it, and General Cobb, coming up at the moment, ordered him not to fire into it again, as he had information the train was loaded with sick.

Immediately afterwards General Magruder rode up, and seeing the enemy drawn up in line of battle, in the field in front of Savage's house, ordered Lieutenant Barry to go a quarter of a mile nearer and open into his ranks. On the bursting of the second shell the enemy fled in confusion to the cover of the woods to the right of the battery, and from that point poured on it and the engine a perfect hail of rifle bullets. Kemper's battery now opening on the enemy from a position in the rear of the battery, Lieutenant Barry was obliged to withdraw in the direction of Richmond. As he was receding up the railroad, his battery drew the whole fire of the enemy, but fortunately, though the narrow escapes were innumerable, not one of the men was struck. A Minie ball passed within an inch of the engineer's head, and struck in the railroad embankment.

As the battery drew back to Fair Oaks, the 3rd South Carolina, supported by other regiments, dashed across the railroad, and, charging into the woods in which the enemy had taken shelter from the rifle shells of Lieutenant Barry, drove them in the direction of Bottom's Bridge, with great slaughter. It was estimated by General Magruder at the time that the loss of the enemy in this engagement was between 800 and 1000 in killed and wounded. How important a part was played by the railroad battery in this engagement may be conjectured by the statement of a prisoner who was captured on the occasion. He informed Lieutenant Barry that the second shell thrown into the ranks drawn up in the field just in front of Savage's house, killed and wounded 100 men and 30 horses. It is believed, also, to have done great execution in the woods, and contributed, by the terror inspired by its immense missiles, to the easy rout of the entire division of the enemy.

Since that battle, the enemy having left the track of the railroad, the battery has seen no service. It has performed handsomely all it has undertaken, and must, therefore, be pronounced a complete success.

THE LAST DAY OF GENERAL ASHBY.

(From the Richmond Dispatch.)

It was a busy one. Scarcely had he ordered his baggage train to proceed before the enemy opened fire upon his camp. With but two companies of his old cavalry he prepared to meet them; seeing this, they immediately withdrew. The command was then moved slowly through Harrisonburg, and drawn up 300 yards from the opposite end. Soon a regiment of "blue coats" came charging through the town, around the bend, in full sight of Ashby's men, who stood upon their trained chargers as if fixed to the ground. When within a very short distance, they commenced to slacken their speed, only giving us time to tender the salute due them. Soon their ranks were broken, and in confusion they fled through the streets.

Never before had I heard our noble General utter such a shout. It was not one caused by victory over a brave foe after a hard contested fight, but only seemed designed to shame an ignominious band for running before they were hurt. We had begun to entertain a high opinion of this body of cavalry. Upon one instance it flanked and charged upon a battery, which was left without a support—a most daring feat for them. (Here General Ashby stood by the guns, fired every load from his three pistols, and brought everything away safely.) Soon we were moving along the road to Port Republic, the enemy pressing closely. Ashby's eagle eye was upon them, as if watching for an excuse to give them battle. An excuse, and even the necessity for a fight, soon became evident. The road was very bad, the train moved slowly, and the main body of the enemy's cavalry was only a mile from its rear. They gave us no time to prepare to meet them. Ashby had but begun to form his men, before three regiments, with colours flying and music rare, emerged from a woods three-fourths of a mile distant. Bearing to our right, they charged, presenting a beautiful sight. Ashby could contain himself no longer. Gently drawing his sabre, and waving it around his head, his clear, sounding voice rang out his only command—"FOLLOW ME." The dash was simultaneous. Fences were cleared, which at any other time would have been thought impossible.

The enemy came to a halt. It was but for a moment. As they heard the strange wail of the sabre around their heads they broke and ran. The work of slaughter had commenced. At every step, Ashby, followed closely by his men, cut them down, or sent them to the rear. For two miles and a half the chase continued, and the scene became more bloody. Never before did our general or his men use their sabres to such an extent. None but those who have witnessed a similar can imagine the spectacle. Enraged by deeds too horrible to mention, led by a general whose presence exerted a mystic influence over every heart, the bravery of the men knew no limit, and seldom was a summons to surrender heard. The scattered fragments of the three regiments hid themselves behind their column of infantry three miles beyond the point of attack; and the pursuit ended not until this infantry opened fire. Here Ashby drew up his men, and remained beneath their fire and waited for reinforcements from Jackson. In this fight Major Green, of the 6th Virginia Cavalry, was slightly wounded; also another, name unknown. We took forty-four prisoners—among them the colonel commanding the brigade of cavalry. The infantry having arrived, Generals Ashby, Ewell, and Stewart (of Maryland), led them to the fight. Here Ashby's gallantry could not have been excelled. Having led the 1st Maryland Regiment in a charge, which sent the enemy flying from that quarter, he sought the 58th Virginia, and, still between the two fires, he ordered the charge. His horse fell dead; he rose, beckoned to the men, and whilst in the very act, a ball entered low in his left side, came out near the left breast, and shattered his right wrist. He fell—he died. Not even a groan or a sigh was uttered by the dying hero. He was brave whilst living, but braver in dying. The men were not discouraged, but pressed on, and soon the victory was ours. Night closed the fighting. The noble Ashby fell between six and seven in the evening. The news went like a flash through our lines. Every heart was wounded. The aged, the young, and the hard-hearted wept. Nature made deeper the gloom; and soon the darkness of the night made still darker the regions of the mind. He now sleeps in the University Burying Grounds, near Charlottesville.

THE CAPTURE OF GENERAL M'CALL.

The Richmond Dispatch, in its account of the fight of the 30th, has the annexed particulars of the capture of Major-General M'Call, the commander of the reinforcements sent to M'Clellan, and second to him in command:—

On a hill, obliquely to the right of General Hill's advance, was posted a battery of some twelve pieces, which had been twice captured during the afternoon by our forces under General Longstreet, but recaptured by the enemy. This battery, the brigade of General Fields—reduced in numbers and worn out with fatigue from their participation in every general engagement since Thursday—was ordered to charge. With spirit and alacrity they responded to the order, and with close rank and steady step they moved forward to its execution. In their approach to the battery, they fired three or four rounds, and then engaged the enemy with the bayonet. Here the struggle was bloody and determined, but after a most obstinate resistance the enemy was driven from his pieces and pressed back some two hundred yards in a hand-to-hand engagement. This charge was made by three regiments—the 4th, 53rd, and 16th Virginia.

The other brigades of the division coming up to the support of Fields, fleeing the enemy routed, commenced cheering vociferously. The Federal general, M'Call, hearing this cheering, and mistaking the source from whence it came, rode up and said, "Hurra, boys; I am glad you have held the battery. Hold on for a short time and reinforcements will be up to sustain you!" He was accompanied by Major Biddle, his Adjutant-General, Major Williams, another aid, and two couriers. Suspecting that he had, perhaps, made a mistake, he asked what regiment it was that held the battery. An officer present replied, the Forty-seventh Virginia. On obtaining this information, Majors Williams and Biddle and the two couriers wheeled about and endeavoured to effect their escape. They were fired upon, and Major Biddle shot through the head and killed instantly. The others, so far as is known, escaped without injury. General M'Call, being in advance of his party, was brought to a stand by a private in the Forty-seventh Regiment, who drew his gun upon him and demanded his surrender. His sword was received by Major Mayo. The General was particularly solicitous that no indignity should be offered him, when he was emphatically assured by Major Mayo that he had not fallen into the hands of a soldiery unacquainted with the usages of civilized warfare. Under an escort, M'Call was then sent to General Hill.

THE FEDERALS IN TENNESSEE.

The following letter, which we copy from the Atlanta Confederacy, describes the outrageous career of the Northerners in Tennessee:—

In the Mountains near Nickajack, Marion County, Tenn., June 18.

The Yankees have routed me from home, stealing my provisions, clothing, &c., and taken four horses and one negro (the rest faithful). I have been compelled to put my family in a place of security and provide for their welfare, as I am ordered by the Secretary of War to report at once to General Beauregard. The Yankees have been travelling back and forth from Stevenson towards Chattanooga in large force, in an apparently undecided manner, robbing and destroying as they go. It is reported they are crossing at Alley's Ferry, which, however, is doubtful. Our forces are ready for their advent, come where they will.

The Yankees robbed us of nearly everything they could take—crockery, knives and forks, silver cups, all the tin and stove fixtures, ornaments, watch, and many highly-prized articles—heirlooms from our revered parents; my gun (I saved my Minie musket), my clothing, all our towels, some bed-clothing, earrings belonging to a servant, and a pair of pants belonging to a negro man, which they put on the spot. They planted a cannon before the door, and quartered 300 men at and around the house. They have taken horses, &c., from Union men also, putting their horses in wheat fields, and stealing and killing cattle, sheep, &c. They took many prominent citizens prisoners, dragged them about with them for several days, and released some on parole to appear at Huntsville on the 4th of July, taking others to Columbia, Tennessee, to try as "rebels and traitors." They seem to do their best to ruin and produce as much mischief as possible. They seem to have full license from their officers, and the officers say they must take provisions to sustain them, as transportation is too high and difficult.

Union sentiments are fast disappearing before a stern desire for revenge. When our men get into their country, as we believe they will, vengeance will be taken. We have lost all our brotherly love and Christian charity, and desire to be avenged on the scoundrels and their nation. Our troops here desire to come in contact with them, and nothing but superior officers detains them here. H. H.

NORTHERN OPINION.

The following is an extract from a letter written by a Northerner to a friend in London:—

The South are at present gaining ground, but when it will end, and how, none can tell. My opinion has never been changed from the commencement. The Union can never be restored. It is possible the South may be conquered, but it will never be by subjugation, reducing States to provinces, and an armed occupation of the entire South, involving forcible and speedy emancipation, and the destruction of every material interest. The great question follows, "What then?" Is the Union restored? No; only in name; and amidst the excitement of strife this great question is apparently overlooked, and the Radical Party seem to be gaining ground, but in reality there are many calm, cool Conservative and sensible men all over the North, that are quietly and sensibly asking themselves and others, "What then?" and since the great disaster to M'Clellan's army, I find numbers of intelligent men among my acquaintances in New York, who have heretofore had great confidence in the ability of the Government to restore the Union, now say that their faith is shaken, and that they now look for a speedy intervention by England and France; and that, as practical and sensible men, we must prepare for the recognition of the South, and accept it as the least of the evils. These humiliating facts are before us. No truer patriots, or more ardent lovers of country live; but when madness rules the hour wisdom is extinct. The time may even come when it will be heard. If we could only again be as we have once been, a united and happy people, none would rejoice more than I; but I see no hope. Thus, I do not feel that I am doing wrong, or entertaining any disloyal sentiments or desires, when I express and feel the conviction that this is the only practical way of restoring peace and prosperity to our distracted land, and relieving thousands in other lands that are suffering with us.

A correspondent of the New York World, who is with General Pope's army, writing from Culpepper Court-house, complains that the order to subsidize the army upon the enemy has been read by the soldiers as a simple licence for indiscriminate plunder.

"The new usage which has been instituted in regard to protection of rebel property, and the purpose of the Government to subsidize the army as far as practicable upon the enemy's country, has produced a decided revolution in the feelings and practices of the soldiery, and one which seems to me very much to be regretted. Unless these innovations are guarded by far more stringent safeguards against irregular and unauthorized plundering, we shall have let loose upon the country at the close of the war a torrent of unbridled and unscrupulous robbers. Rapid strides toward villany have been made during the last few weeks. Men, who at home would have shuddered at the suggestion of touching another's property, now appropriate remorselessly whatever comes within their reach. Thieving, they imagine, has now become an authorized practice, and, under the show of subsidizing themselves, chickens, turkeys, hams, and corn have become a lawful plunder, with little discrimination as to the character or circumstances of the original owner. I blush when I state that on the march through a section of country, every spring house is broken open, and butter, milk, eggs, and cream are engulfed, almost before the place is reached by the men. Calves and sheep, and, in fact, anything and everything serviceable for meat or drink, or apparel, are not safe a moment after the approach of the army. Even things apparently useless are snatched up, because, it would seem, many men love to steal."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORTZ, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 21, 1862.

The Tug of War in the North.

GENERAL "STONEWALL" JACKSON has put in an appearance and satisfied the Northerners as to his whereabouts, though by this time it is quite possible his movements may again be the subject of hazy speculation; for when he has delivered his blow he forthwith resumes his march, leaving the enemy "to bind up his wounds," and indite grandiloquent despatches. The meagre and evidently edited Federal account of the battle near Cedar Mountain is sufficiently graphic to enable us to understand the affair. A force, stated by the Federals to be 7000 strong, under the command of General Banks, had been detached from the main body under General Pope, and pushed forward, but not, as suggested, to check General Jackson; for we cannot suppose the Northern commander would be guilty of the folly of attempting to cope with an army reported to number 30,000, and led by a general whose reputation is in itself formidable. But whatever the motive of General Banks' movement General Jackson was prepared to take advantage of it. At early morning, we are told, General Johnston discovered the position of the enemy, forthwith advanced, and opened on him from numerous masked batteries. Masked batteries are not made ready in an hour, and therefore we may be sure that before the morning of the battle the Confederates had arranged to give the Federals a warm reception. The fight lasted from three o'clock until dark, when the Federals withdrew from the range of the Confederate guns, "but to what distance is not stated." The Federals admit that their "infantry was badly cut up," and that they lost two guns. It is estimated that the Federals lost 3000 killed and wounded; and, as the fight lasted some six hours, we may believe the loss is not overstated. As usual, the Northern telegram announcing the disaster, is accompanied by an assurance that "large reinforcements had been sent to the Federals." It is singular that their large reinforcements should not be sent before the fight, but be merely kept in readiness to go forward after the battle is lost.

Having defeated and driven back the enemy, General Jackson recrossed the Rapidan, a movement which the Federals are pleased to call "a retreat." The report that the Federal cavalry and artillery were in pursuit is a singular announcement. It is not usual for defeated armies, needing large reinforcements, to pursue the victorious foe. The sum of the matter is that General Jackson has gained an important victory, and shown the North that General Pope's boastful proclamation was not the herald of Federal triumph.

The rest of the news from Virginia does not call for lengthened comment. General McClellan's army has been relieved by the receipt of fresh vegetables; and the people of the United States may be surprised, if not a little indignant, at the negligence of the Government in not preventing the sickness and mortality by such indispensable supplies; but the heat in Virginia is excessive, and the remnant of the army of the Potomac has to encounter fever and pestilence that cannot be kept at bay by any system of diet. The only movements reported are that the Federals have been driven in from City Point, and that they have fallen out from Malvern Hill. In Washington it is expected that the Confederates are preparing for some great operation in the neighbourhood of James River, and the aspect of affairs seems to warrant the expectation. General Burnside is at Fredericksburg to co-operate with General Pope; but it is considered uncertain whether they will "attack Richmond or some other point." The probability is that as long as possible they will interpose their forces between Washington and the Confederates.

Guerillas are everywhere. In Western Virginia, where they have become very annoying to the Federals; in Missouri, where they have captured Newark and Alexandria; in Kentucky, in which State General Morgan is again operating; in Alabama, where they have captured the Federal General McCook, and which act has been followed by the Federal outrage of hanging some innocent men residing in the neighbourhood of the occurrence. But more important than all is the discovery in Indiana of a Secret Society, numbering 15,000 persons, organized for the purpose of preventing Federal enlistments, resisting Federal taxation, and for generally aiding the Confederates. This is the outbreak of the storm we have so long foreseen, and not we only, but all those who were not blinded by the pretensions and accounts of the North. In Illinois and Ohio there is great agitation, from the prevalence of Southern sympathizers. The Governor of Pennsylvania hesitates to convolve the Legislature, well knowing that in the Lower House there is a Democratic majority opposed to his views, and determined to call him to account for his unconstitutional proceedings. In New Jersey there are also strong evidences of a similar feeling. In fact, it is only in the six New England States where there is not a manifestation, not only of opposition to the Washington Government, but of a decided opposition to the continuance of the war. If Mr. Lincoln succeeds in raising another army of 600,000 men, a portion of it will probably be required to keep in order some of the adhering States of the Union.

But will he raise 600,000 men? The conscription panic passes description. The Irish, who have abused England, loaded her with opprobrious epithets, indignantly repudiated any connection with her, are now frantic to be recognized as English citizens, and so escape drafting into the Federal army. The Germans, whose fighting proclivities are unquestionable, protest against impressment. By every available route crowds of persons are endeavouring to escape from the dominion of Mr. Lincoln. Native-born citizens, who can think of no other asylum, are going to California, not to seek for gold, but for an asylum from the deadly swamps of the South, and from battles which are signalized by unprecedented slaughter. Disguised as sailors, the citizens of the Union seek refuge on board the steamers bound for Europe. We have read, in fanatical abolitionist romances, of negroes escaping from slavery by going into Canada, but to-day we behold the spectacle of troops of white men emigrating to that land to escape from the despotism of the United States Government. In this emergency the writ of habeas corpus is suspended, and personal liberty no longer exists in the United States. The Chief Superintendent of the New York police is appointed a Provost Marshal, and the New York police is constituted a Provost Guard. The frontiers are rigidly watched. Californian passengers, citizens passing from one to another of the United States, are obliged to find bonds for $1000 to provide a substitute if drafted. The Secretary of War has issued an order prohibiting any citizen liable to be drafted to go to a foreign country, and persons attempting to disobey this edict are to be arrested, and without any form of trial, placed on military duty. All persons who shall in any way discourage volunteer enlistments are to be arrested. This statement we do not glean from Southern, but from Northern sources, and yet we confess that it is almost incredible. The North is in a state of siege. The people who boasted of their liberty are suffering from a despotism that has no parallel, at least in this century, in the civilized world.

Possibly Mr. Lincoln may recruit his army; possibly, but not probably. In Missouri, for example, where the citizens have banded together not to enlist, he may find it difficult, if not impracticable, to get the required complement. In Ohio the State Militia is not more than enough to protect the frontier and repress Southern sympathies in the State itself. In Indiana and Illinois all the troops he can raise will be required to keep those States from becoming actively hostile to the war policy of his Government. But, grant that he gets the men, what then? What can be expected of an army composed of men thus pressed into the service, and bitterly hostile to the Government.

Under such circumstances, Mr. Lincoln attending a mob meeting at Washington, at which resolutions were passed about the perpetuity of the late Union, long since broken into fragments, and recommending bloody and savage vengeance against the South, not only against the leaders and the men, but against the women, is inexpressibly undignified, but almost ceases to be infamous by being supremely ridiculous. Under such circumstances, the cry of passionate despair, and the clamour for the extermination of the people of the South, that are raised in New York are a bitter mockery. The Empire City has for ever lost her principal trade; she will no longer batten on Southern wealth; her commercial supremacy is a thing of the past. The struggle may not be over; the end may not be so near as it seems; the desolating war may be continued—but no sane man can believe in the possibility of the North subjugating the South.

The Strength of the Belligerents.

On the 6th inst. Mr. Lincoln attended a meeting at Washington, on which occasion resolutions were passed to the effect that the war should be prosecuted even at the cost of the desolation of the North; and, further, that the leaders of the rebellion were to be regarded as irreclaimable traitors, "who are to be stripped of their possessions and deprived of their lives, or expelled from the country." This demonstration was intended for Europe, and not for the United States. The Washington Government is perfectly aware that neither the North nor the West is prepared for a war of mutual extermination. If the South had one neck, and the Northern mob had the opportunity, we have no doubt that the South would be sacrificed; but, as it is, all the world knows that Northern rage is as impotent as it is diabolically malignant. This loud-mouthed determination is intended to support the Federal agents who are busily engaged, both in London and Paris, in endeavouring to postpone the recognition of the Confederate States by England and France. These agents, with unwonted and suspicious frankness, admit that Northern expectations of crushing the "rebellion," have signally failed. They do not deny that the South has, until this hour, maintained her independence. But they point to the unanimity of the North, and say that, though the struggle may be prolonged, the South must, unless she receives foreign aid, ultimately succumb. They repeat, in season and out of season, that the twenty millions of the North must inevitably overcome the six or seven millions of the South. We propose to show how utterly false this argument is, both with respect to its premises and its conclusion, and that the Confederate States can maintain their independence against the power of the North.

Even if the assumed difference in numbers represented the exact difference in strength, it would not follow that the North must conquer. In warfare, the contending parties are seldom, if ever, equal. The aggressor commences hostilities relying upon his superior resources; and if we read the history of war, we shall find that it is not always the most powerful that succeeds, for much depends upon the skilful use of strength, not to speak of the overruling will of Providence. Spain did not conquer the Netherlands, despite her superiority. During the first War of Independence in America, whenever any friends of peace in England protested against the prosecution of the war as useless, they were sneeringly reminded of the might of England, and the weakness of the handful of colonists; yet England had to confess herself defeated. Or, as a still more striking example of the absurdity of calculating on mere numbers, take the case of British India. There the invader is outnumbered by more than two hundred to one. Is it not a very reasonable supposition that the Southerners, a homogeneous race, engaged in the defence of their homes and country are, at least, three to one better than the mixed population of the North, fighting only for pay and plunder? Have not the two campaigns manifested this to be so, if there is any truth in the Northern boast of twenty millions to six or seven millions? A compact people like the Southerners, for recruiting purposes, is nearly as superior to a divided, incongruous people like the Northerners as a troop of soldiers is to an undisciplined mob. The North has more men and the immense advantage of being able to resort to the European markets for warlike supplies. Still, the contest is equalized by the superior prowess, devotion, defensive attitude, and ability of the South, and above all, by the blessing that ever waits on the right; or the North would not, in vain, have sacrificed so much blood and treasure.

But the Federal argument is fallacious, because the numbers are not so unequal as asserted, and the respective circumstances of the belligerents equalizes the mere strength, so as to make the South truly independent. The numbers are not twenty millions to six or seven millions. According to the returns of the census for 1860, as estimated by Mr. Kenedy, of the United States' Census Office, the population of the North and West is eighteen millions; of the Confederate States six millions and a-half, exclusive of slaves; and of the Border States two millions and a-half, exclusive of slaves.

Now, it will not, we presume, be asserted by the most bigoted Northern partizan, that Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland, add to the power of the North. Granting, for argument sake, that these States are not de facto members of the Southern Confederacy, it is manifest that their Unionism is of such a peculiar character that it necessitates the presence of Union forces to prevent its complete extinction. The Border States, then, are not Northern; and, for the moment, we will suppose that they are neutral, which, we need not add, is not the case. It is, on this assumption, eighteen millions to six millions and a-half.

It will be conceded that an invading Power, to equal the invaded Power in strength, must be numerically superior. Especially is this the case with countries so situated as the Southern and Northern States, where each one is vulnerable to the other. The North must keep a force at home to protect its frontiers from the very possible invasions of the South. Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, for example, fully appreciate the danger of Confederate reprisals, and are mustering their State troops on their Southern borders. The North has to invade and conquer a country of, excluding the Border States, 833,000 square miles, and also to defend an extensive and accessible frontier. Besides, the forces of the North have to be gathered from a population scattered over an enormous territory. Not only does this make it difficult to collect troops, but a less proportion of the male population is available for foreign military duty, unless it is determined to accept the desolation and ruin consequent upon the total abstraction of the male population from whole districts and counties. In the Northern eighteen millions is included the 380,000 inhabitants of California. It is certain that California is so effectually cut off from the United States that it cannot afford the Federal Government any assistance. Taking these things into consideration, the eighteen millions, as opposed to the six and a-half millions of the South, is very remote from being overwhelming odds.

Thus far we have assumed the neutrality of Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland—an assumption not only in itself unfounded, but the very opposite of the truth. Maryland can only be kept in the Union by a force equal to the entire militia of the State, but which, be it observed, is not composed of the militia of that State. In Kentucky and Missouri there is open warfare; they are swarming with guerrilla bands; cities and towns are at the disposal of the Confederates; even the Federal Governor of the former State is accused of treason. And so far from assisting the Federal Government, the Governors of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio are obliged to prepare for the threatened contingency of invasion from Missouri and Kentucky. It would be strictly in accordance with the true state of affairs to give the Border States to the Confederate States, and so make the numbers eighteen millions to nine millions. Even those who choose to dispute this conclusion cannot fail to perceive that, so far from the Border States being neutral, they are a tax upon the North, and materially diminish the numerical difference.

Then look at the elements of the Northern population. How can it be expected to carry on a long war for the conquest of the South? New York is by no means the United States. Is it likely, nay, is it possible, that the men of the West will abandon their farms, and their newly-adopted country, their prosperity and hopeful future, in order to save the commerce of New York from annihilation, or to revenge its loss? The prolongation of the war will not subjugate the South, but it will hasten the separation of the West from the North. The Germans are already sick of hostilities, and the Irish will no longer enlist except upon compulsion.

The climate, too, is a deadly enemy to the invader. This year the season has been hitherto healthy, and yet the Northern armies, and even the Northern sailors, have been prostrated and demoralized by sickness. If next year the season, instead of being healthier than usual, is rather more than usually sickly, the Northern armies will be defeated without the agency of the Confederates. Put all these things into the scale—that mere numbers never decide a war; that it is not twenty millions to six millions, but, at best, eighteen millions to six millions and a-half; that the Border States really make it less than eighteen millions to six millions and a-half; that the Northern population is too widely scattered to be thoroughly available; that the Northern frontier is to be defended as well as the South invaded; that the invader, unless numerically stronger than the invaded, is absolutely weaker; that the Southern population is one race, whilst the Northern population is composed of various races; the nature of the Southern climate, and the experience of the war as far as it has gone—and it is evident that in the defence of her independence the South can defy the North, can defend as long as the North can attack, and may laugh at the malicious threatenings of the New York mob. The only argument the Federal agents can adduce against the immediate recognition of the Confederate States is utterly untenable, and it is known to be untenable by the enlightened public of Europe, or else the press would not unanimously agree that the Union can never be restored; that the South cannot be conquered; that the war being waged by the North is useless and hopeless; and that the recognition of the Southern Confederacy cannot be long, much less indefinitely, postponed.

There is, however, another suggestion whispered by Federal agents, which we will briefly notice. "We can stir up a servile war." We do not think so. It is very difficult to persuade the negroes to revolt against their masters. Their fidelity has been severely tested, and it has not failed. We ought, indeed, to have included the negro population as an item of the military strength of the South, because this population enables all the whites to go to war; whereas in the North a portion of the eighteen millions must remain at home to till the fields. Besides, the negro hatred of the North is nearly as bitter as the Northern hatred of the negro. But imagine that, contrary to all precedent, events should induce the Southerner to think that the North had a chance of making the Southern States worse than a huge St. Domingo—that his life, and the lives of his wife and children, were in imminent peril—would the Southerner be without any resource? Would he be compelled to submit to the North? No; he would still have in his hands an awful power of revenge. He would have no difficulty in stirring up his slaves against his enemies, and he might turn them, half-maddened to ravage on Northern territory. Of course there is not the remotest chance of a servile war in the South; but it is curious that the Northerners, when gloating over the idea of six or seven millions of white people being butchered, should never have thought of the terrible reprisals that the South could make if they were imperative and lawful.

The Despatch of the Twenty-eighth of May.

WITH punctilious perseverance, Mr. W. H. Seward continues to perform the proverbial duty of diplomacy. If he but remembered the second great maxim of his art as well as he bears in mind the first, and were as free from the reproach of zeal as he is from that of veracity, Talleyrand himself might be proud of such a disciple. He is not, it is true, singular in his studied disregard of facts. Truth and the Federal Cabinet have long since parted company, and officers, civil and military, of every rank vie with one and another in the open display of courtier-like contempt for the discarded virtue. But Mr. Seward, as becomes his functions, outdoes them all. Pope's muster-rolls of prisoners, Halleck's announcements of weekly victories, McClellan's strategic reasons, the bulletins of the War Office, the reports of the Treasury, the proclamations of the President, are all thrown into the shade by the despatches of the Secretary of State. And as on former occasions he has outdone generals, commanders, and ministers, so in his recently-published achievement he has fairly outdone himself. The despatch of May 28 deserves immortality as a masterpiece of mendacity. It is scarcely too much to say that it does not contain a single statement which is not essentially and utterly contrary to truth. And it is perhaps worth while to examine in detail the view which Mr. Seward officially promulgates of the events of the war and the position of the Union; not that he believes himself, or is weak enough to expect any one else to believe him. But he is shrewd enough to know that a fiction which courtesy compels a correspondent to accept is almost as available in argument as if it had been a fact; and in this despatch we have a statement of the manner in which Mr. Seward close that the situation of affairs should be officially regarded.

In the first place, he expressed his satisfaction at finding that Europe was becoming gradually aware of the hopelessness of the rebel cause, and that European sympathy with the South was consequently declining. As a proof of this, he alleged the presence at Nassau of a number of British vessels, which had determined to await the opening of the Southern ports, instead of attempting to run the blockade. It might very well suit Mr. Seward to be unaware of the reason which might influence many vessels to adopt or pretend such a determination; for it would not be very desirable to call the notice of the British Government to the close blockade of a British port by American cruisers, and to the captures of ingoing vessels constantly effected in defiance of every rule of international law. But we can hardly suppose him really ignorant of the tone of European opinion and feeling in regard to the American contest. He must be well aware that every month of its continuance has increased the mischievous effect on the industry and commerce of European countries, and added fresh bitterness to the consequent resentment against the wanton aggressors in the quarrel. He cannot but know how cordially Englishmen sympathize with the heroic daring of a people of English blood and speech, in defence of their homes, their country, and their flag; and how much every new instance of Northern ferocity, and every new display of Southern resolution, tends to enhance their sympathy. And, however little he may understand the general sentiment of civilized nations, we should hardly have suspected him of such want of tact as is manifested in the hint that the losses and misfortunes sustained by the Confederates had cooled towards them such well-wishers as they had at first found in England. It is not when brave men are struggling with undeserved calamity that the sympathy of a generous nation deserts them. Had the tide of victory flowed from the first steadily in favour of the South, they would never have awakened that English interest on their behalf which is so fiercely resented by the North. The calm and dignified courage with which the Southern Government received the heavy tidings of the loss of Fort Donnellson won for it a European respect which had not been extorted by the victory of Manassas; its unflinching endurance of severe disasters, its evidently unshaken power, and the loyal adherence of the people, did more than its previous career of success to confirm European confidence in its stability. The American Cabinet must be very ill served by its agents on this side of the Atlantic if the Secretary of State did not know, when he wrote of the decline of European sympathy for the South, that at no period had the Confederates commanded so much good-will and admiration in Europe as at that very crisis of their fortunes.

It was not unnatural that the Federal Government should exult ostentatiously over the successes of the Federal arms, and the enthusiasm for the Union, and confidence in its restoration, which those successes had awakened in the North. But, after all, what were those successes, and what was their value? Thanks to the unexpected aid of the elements, the Federal flotilla had taken New Orleans; a city which affords no resources to an invader, and which is utterly unavailable as a base of operations even in the State of Louisiana. A few isolated corps had been established at various points on the Southern seaboard—whence they found themselves unable to advance, and unwilling to withdraw; and while they remained there to die by fever, the main army, on whose operations alone any important result must depend, was weakened to a perilous extent. Federal gunboats had sailed up the Mississippi and the Tennessee; and Confederate positions on those rivers had been forced. The Army of the West had marched to the frontiers of Alabama, leaving a hostile country and insecure communications behind it; the Army of the Potomac was engaged in that brilliant series of strategic movements which still await their appropriate culmination, by the entry of McClellan and his army into the Confederate capital. It is true that "the insurgents had been forced to battle," but Mr. Seward prudently forbears to remark, how every battle in which the gunboats bore no part had ended. The present position of affairs sufficiently illustrates the real value of those military achievements which excited the North to a frenzy of self-gratulation. Nor were the "enthusiasm and confidence" of the people more real or substantial than the successes which had given them birth. The "confidence" was but the momentary exultation of boastful ignorance; the "enthusiasm" that of a mob which had nothing to lose, and could afford to applaud a war of which, come what might, others must pay the cost. The sober and well-informed political thinkers, whom the Federal Government had sternly silenced, never for one moment believed that by any exertions and any sacrifices on the part of the North the South could be crushed or the Union restored; they regretted in silence the lavish waste of the national wealth in a hopeless cause. They knew that a people of six millions, thoroughly in earnest, defending a country nearly as large as Europe, could by no possibility be conquered by such a Government and such powers as those of the North, so long as they were resolute to maintain their independence to the last; and they had learned, by terrible experience, to appreciate the stubborn resolution of the South.

Mr. Seward still made light of that resolution. The insurgents, he said, were but men, and must yield to overwhelming force. He chose to forget that those who were to put forth that overwhelming force were also but men, and men, from the nature of the case, far less resolute than their antagonists. Men, worthy of the name, will make any sacrifice in the defence of their country; they will not sacrifice everything to the lust of empire and the gratification of the vindictive rage of a disappointed faction. True, the Northern population and wealth are to those of the South as three to one; but then the Southern Government can command all the resources of the country in a war of self-defence, while Mr. Lincoln can make but limited demands on the people for a war of wanton aggression. But then, said Mr. Seward, the resources of the North are increasing by the cessation of commerce and the encouragement given to manufacturers by a war demand, while those of the South are already exhausted. It is not our business to instruct the Federal Secretary of State in those first principles of Political Economy of which he is so strangely ignorant, or prove to him that war can never increase the resources of a nation. It is enough to point to facts. The Confederates, despite their exhaustion, are still, on the showing of their enemies, able to recruit their armies, and sustain the credit of the Government. The resources of the North, both in men and money, seem to have become almost unavailable; Government paper is depreciated to an enormous extent, coin is driven from the country, and recruiting is at a stand-still. It is the Federal Government whose "credit is dead before the first dollar has been raised by taxation to support it."

But the most characteristic portion of this eminently characteristic document is that which revives the exploded fiction of Unionism in the South. The dis-Unionists, we are told, are not a people but a faction, living by terror and violence, but too weak everywhere to prevent the return of any State or district into the Union when once the loyal population is encouraged and protected by Federal troops. We should like to know how many Unionists General Butler has found at New Orleans, or General Hunter in South Carolina. Was it over a loyal population that Andrew Johnson established his reign of terror in Tennessee? Or did Colonel Turchin's soldiery draw any nice distinctions between the daughters of Unionists and Secessionists at Athens? How is it that no information as to Confederate movements reaches the Federal generals? Could Beauregard's retreat from Corinth, or the withdrawal of the Confederate army from Manassas, have been accomplished with such profound secrecy in the midst of a disaffected population? It is said that the Border States are heartily loyal; that Kentucky, now overrun by Confederate guerrillas, is devoted to the Union; that Missouri is active and earnest in the Federal cause; that in Maryland the Union is as strong as in any of the Northern States. How comes it, then, that Maryland is held down by a powerful Federal army of occupation—that more than half the members of her lawfully-elected Legislature were thrown into prison, and new elections held under the eyes of the invading troops, while orders were given to arrest all voters of "Secessionist tendencies"? Why are citizens of Missouri shot in front of their own houses by the Federal soldiery? Why are the youths of Kentucky absent in the Confederate armies? Why is all Virginian property indiscriminately given up to plunder by General Pope, under the orders of his Government? If acquiescence in Federal rule immediately follows the appearance of the invaders, how is it that the invaded districts are always treated as an enemy's country? Really, this fiction of a Unionist party in the South is one of which even Mr. Seward should be ashamed; one which receives the lie from every command of the Federal Government, and every action of its officers. How, indeed, could there be Unionists in the South? How could men of human hearts and with the spirit of manhood endure the thought of submission to the employers of General Butler, and renewed fellowship with the countrymen of General Mitchell? How could the husbands, brothers, fathers of Southern women—were they the meanest and vilest of the human race—desire peace and reunion with those whose deeds of infamy have won for them the abhorrence of distant and unconcerned spectators? Such acquiescence as a town taken by storm must yield to the victors, such submission as unarmed men yield to the robber with the knife at their throat, the Federal armies receive in the immediate neighbourhood of their camps; but they have not found a friend or partisan from the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico.

Finally, the despatch adverts to the possibility of a servile war. We have so recently stated our reasons for believing the likelihood and the danger of any such event to be greatly overrated, that we need not now revert to the subject. But it is worth while to notice the use which Mr. Seward makes of the negro, in argument as in action. The emancipation of the slave is a weapon, not an object of desire in itself. Even when addressing English statesmen, and courting English public opinion, the interest of the coloured race is altogether left out of sight, and Abolition is not promised, but threatened. England is menaced with the disorganization of Southern industry, just as the South is menaced with massacre, incendiarism, and pillage; and the possibility of the forcible abolition of slavery is actually used as a covert threat towards a nation abolitionist par excellence. "If Europe encourages the rebellion, we shall be forced to consider the question of Emancipation. If Europe interferes, we shall excite a servile war." Such is the language held by the American Government towards England—language significant as well of its own profound indifference to the fate of the black race, and its intention to use that race for purely selfish ends, as of its conviction that other nations regard the subject solely as it affects their own interests, and that all pretence of pity for the slave is pure affectation. It is worth our while to take note of this, as a key to the real meaning of all abolitionist professions and proposals which we have already heard or may hear hereafter from the people or the Government of the North. To free the slave is their last thought—they seek but to render him the agent of their own vindictive fury, and then abandon him to his fate, the victim of a terrible retribution.

Federal and Confederate Finances.

WHEN South Carolina, on the 20th of December, 1860, withdrew from the political firm of the United States of America, her first act was to despatch commissioners to Washington, to treat with the Federal agents for a settlement of all matters in connection with the late co-partnership. Although her envoys were not received, a similar course was adopted the second time, in conjunction with the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Georgia, Texas, and Louisiana, which met with a like result. The seceding States were desirous of bearing their portion of the indebtedness, and receiving their share of the assets of the concern. But, alas! those that attained power in the North were as ignorant of the principles upon which the Government was founded as they were dishonest in their schemes and practices. The Federal debt was then $80,000,000; it has now reached the gigantic proportions of $1600,000,000, or $100,000,000 a month since the breaking out of hostilities. This stupendous amount has been expended before the collection of the first dollar of taxes for the purpose of paying the interest on the same; and not over $50,000,000 has been subscribed for by the people. The banks of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, took about $70,000,000, which they have since disposed of to stock-jobbers, the remainder being represented by Custom House demand notes, Treasury interest-bearing notes, certificates of indebtedness, quartermasters' receipts, colonels' vouchers, and irredeemable notes from one cent. and upwards; many of these securities (?) gaining credit as collateral on the basis of the Stock-board quotations, in support of the promissory notes of contractors and others. It is not, therefore, difficult to imagine the end of Mr. Chase's financial engineering. A system of reckless extravagance and plunder was inaugurated in the North from the very outset of the war, which has been the cause of the vast accumulation of debt. Not so with the South; the expenses of the Confederacy have not exceeded $25,000,000 per month, and hence they are only under liability for one-fourth the amount of that of their late allies. By reference to the Acts of the Southern Congress it will be found that all the money affairs of the Confederacy have been based on the very soundest economic principles. The first funds paid into their Treasury was $500,000, advanced by the State of Alabama on February 8, 1861. On the 28th of the same month a loan was authorized for $15,000,000 at ten years, 8 per cent. interest, but redeemable in five years upon three months' notice; the principal and interest being secured by an export duty of one-eighth of a cent. a pound on all raw cotton; which is the only tariff or tax they have on commerce with other nations, the Northern States excepted. This loan was taken at par. On March 9, 1861, the Secretary of the Treasury was empowered to issue Confederate notes in amounts not less than $50 to the extent of $1,000,000, with interest to begin after one year from their date at one cent. per day for each $100, and to cease upon sixty days' notice of readiness to pay the same. On August 3, 1861, the limit was extended to $2,000,000. On May 16, 1861, a loan was created for $50,000,000 bonds, twenty years to run, 8 per cent. interest. In lieu of $20,000,000 of these bonds, the Treasury Department could issue notes payable in two years without interest, in sums not less than $5, receivable for all taxes, except export duty on cotton, or in exchange for bonds at ten years, bearing 8 per cent. interest; but the privilege of funding to cease after six months' notice beyond two years. On August 19, 1861, Congress passed a Bill granting authority for the issue of Treasury notes payable to bearer six months after the treaty of peace with the United States, in amounts not less than $5; the aggregate, including former emissions, not to exceed $100,000,000, receivable for all debts due to the Government, except the export duty on cotton. These notes are convertible into bonds at twenty years, with 8 per cent. interest, and are secured by a direct tax of a half per cent. on all real estate, slaves, merchandize, bank-notes, railroad and other corporation stocks, money at interest in the purchase of bills, notes, and other securities, except bonds of the Confederate States, and cash in hand or on deposit. Colleges, schools, charitable and religious corporations are exempted. On December 24, 1861, the amount was increased to $150,000,000, and after the meeting of Congress, under the permanent Constitution, the Government was authorized to continue its issues on the same terms until the cessation of hostilities. The planters have subscribed two-thirds of the value of their crops, giving the Secretary of the Treasury orders upon their factors for that portion of the net proceeds of the sales of the cotton and other produce. The Treasury notes have not been made a legal tender, but the patriotism of the people is such that they pass from hand to hand as currency for all transactions, their convertibility keeping only a limited amount in circulation at any one time.

The South has in readiness for shipment $350,000,000 worth of produce at usual valuations; the North cannot boast of over $20,000,000 in value of breadstuffs. As far as specie is concerned, the North holds about $80,000,000, and the South $50,000,000. The North owes a commercial floating balance to Europe of about $200,000,000; the South nothing whatever. Three-fourths of the stock and bonds of the railway companies of the North are owned by foreigners; while those of the South are mostly held at home. Pretty much the same may be said of the respective State securities; and one-half of the vessels displaying the "star-spangled banner" are sailed by European capital. It is not difficult to foresee which section of the late Union will be uppermost in credit after hostilities cease. Should the Western States withdraw from the Union, the population of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, the remaining States, would number 10,601,244 persons, subject to a tax of $16 per head to pay the dividends on the Federal loans—to say nothing of the large amount of State interest which is now annually drawn from them. As to the wealth of the North, its investments have been in the character of securities based upon its commercial prosperity. The real estate in the large cities and manufacturing towns is not worth, on an average, 40 per cent. of its value eighteen months ago, and will decline still more, when the expenditure of the Government ceases; the railway traffic will fall off for the same reason, and Federal ships must, in future, give way to British tonnage in the carrying trade; the former will be subjected to a tax, while the latter will be favoured in every way by the Confederates.

Neither the Western nor the Southern States have been pampered up by the false principles of Protection; they have depended on their natural resources, and never sought artificial aid; they, therefore, will be unharmed by the dissolution of the Union; while their old co-partners, who have so stupidly disregarded the teachings of Adam Smith, will be ruined.

After sixteen months' struggle we find the indebtedness of the United States and Confederate States to be $2000,000,000; the South can easily afford to pay her share of the interest thereon; the commissions brokerages and taxes, by way of tariffs, that she has been contributing to the North have far more than equalled that amount annually; and she has a career of prosperity now before her unexampled in the history of the world. After all, it has been this question of taxes that has caused the dissolution of the Union of American States; the seeds of discord were sown in 1833, when South Carolina refused to accede to the protective system, on the ground of its unconstitutionality, and compelled the North to a modification of the tariff. In the debate in the Senate on that occasion, Mr. Calhoun made use of the following remarks: "The Government of the Twelve Tribes of Israel, at first, was a mere confederation, without any central power, till a military chieftain, with the title of King, was placed at its head, without, however, merging the original organization of the twelve different tribes. This was the commencement of that central action among that peculiar people which, in three generations, terminated in a permanent division of their tribes. It is impossible, even for a careless reader, to peruse the history of that event without being forcibly struck with the analogy in the causes which led to their separation and those which now threaten us with a similar calamity. With the establishment of the central power in the King commenced a system of taxation, which, under King Solomon, was greatly increased, to defray the expense of rearing the Temple, of enlarging and embellishing Jerusalem, the seat of the central government, and the other profuse expenditures of his magnificent reign. Increased taxation was followed by its natural consequences—discontent and complaint—which, before his death, began to excite resistance. On the succession of his son, Rehoboam, the Ten Tribes, headed by Jeroboam, demanded a reduction of the taxes. The Temple being finished, and the embellishment of Jerusalem completed, and the money which had been raised for that purpose being no longer required—or, in other words, the debt being paid—they demanded a reduction of the duties—a repeal of the tariff. The demand was taken under consideration, and, after consulting the old men [the councillors of '98], who advised a reduction, he then took the opinion of the younger politicians, who had since grown up, and knew not the doctrines of their fathers. He hearkened unto their counsel, and refused to make the reduction, and the secession of the Ten Tribes, under Jeroboam, followed. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which had received the disbursements, alone remained unto the house of David."

Who will say that history does not repeat itself?

The Southerners were the first people in modern times to advocate the principle of Free Trade; yet they have been kept from putting their favourite theory into practice for years by the legislative aggressions of the North, and now that they have seceded from its political control, and discarded the use of custom houses, except for dealings with their former allies—as a punishment for the invasion of their soil—the leading Powers of Europe prevent them from carrying on unrestricted commerce by recognizing the existence of a "loose" blockade, as if it were as effectual as that called for by the Treaty of Paris. Europe has hitherto lavished her money upon the North by unlimited credit; all the South asks is a fair exchange for the productions of her soil, which are now and at all times so much needed.

English Neutrality and American Gratitude.

It may seem strange that there should be two opinions as to the fairness, straightforwardness, and impartiality of England in the American quarrel: stranger still that complaint, if complaint is to be made, should come from the Northern side. To nearly all Englishmen, two things seem perfectly clear—first, that the British Government has observed throughout a careful, anxious, undeviating neutrality; and second—that the Northern Government and people have done everything in their power to render the preservation of that attitude morally and politically difficult, to exasperate the British nation, and to provoke the hostility of the British Government. Most Englishmen would say that if any just cause of complaint could be found in the conduct of this country, it would be found in the over-compliance and excessive forbearance displayed towards the Federalists, to an extent scarcely, it may be thought, consistent with justice and equal dealing towards the Confederate States. But the South makes no complaint; the feelings of its people towards England are those of cordial regard, and the conduct of its Government, in the few and unimportant cases in which the two countries have been brought into any relation, as in the course pursued by Confederate vessels, and the treatment of British subjects in the Confederate States, has been at once dignified and conciliatory. On the other hand, the whole of the Northern press, the platform orators, popular preachers, and public men of the North—nay, even the Northern Government itself—incessantly revile and menace us on account of our alleged departure from the line of neutrality in favour of the South. Every expression of Northern feeling in regard to England reveals a spirit of intense animosity, an animosity justified by Americans, and by the more violent section of Northern sympathizers in this country, as having been provoked by our bearing towards the Federal cause from the first outbreak of the quarrel.

It has been often alleged that, when the news of the Secession first reached us, the public feeling of England was warmly and generally expressed in favour of the South; that our press and politicians hastened to exult over the downfall of the Union, and to hold forth the hand of fellowship to those who had retorted upon the United States the principles and the policy which not a century ago separated the United Colonies from the British Empire. But this is not true. English ignorance of the peculiar nature of the Federal tie led most men to regard Secession as a species of high treason; and the want of acquaintance with American politics, till then, almost universal among us, made it difficult to understand the bitter provocations which justified, and the imperative necessity which compelled, the movement. At first, the current of English opinion and feeling set decidedly and strongly in favour of the Federal Government. Most well-informed men felt and expressed the conviction that the Union was at an end; a good many felt, if they did not express, the conviction that its dissolution was a gain to the world, and especially to Great Britain, as affording security against the quarrelsome and aggressive temper which had rendered its foreign policy one of constant encroachment and overbearing violence. But the public judgment was divided on the question of fact, and the only feeling which found utterance was one of regret for the disruption of a Power which certainly deserved no regret by its past behaviour towards us. The strong sympathy which now exists for the South has grown up since then out of increased knowledge of the origin of the quarrel, out of disgust at Northern ferocity, and admiration for Southern heroism. At first, we repeat it, the sympathy of England went with the North, with the Republicans, and with the President. Had it been otherwise, what cause of complaint could the North have found? They gave their warmest good wishes to Russia, when her breach of faith and law forced us into the Crimean war; they exulted over the disasters of our army, did their best to insult and embarrass us during the struggle, and lamented over the fall of Sebastopol. And when we were compelled to fight for our Indian Empire against a horde of mutineers and assassins, who signalized themselves only by the murder of defenceless men, and by unheard-of atrocities committed on women and children, New York and New England gave their hearty sympathy to the Sepoys, and proclaimed, with premature gratulations, the downfall of British rule in India. Their admiration and good wishes were for Nana Sahib and Tanta Toppee—not for Havelock and Lord Clyde. With what face, then, could they ask our sympathy for their war upon a people of English speech, and English race—our admiration for victories gained, or supposed to be gained, over men who fought with loyal gallantry in defence of all that is dearest to loyal and gallant men?

Passing over the charge against the nation of "Secessionist proclivities," as one less dwelt on by Americans than by American sympathizers, we inquire, what has been the conduct of the Government? Here we are told, at the outset, that England had no business to take any cognizance of the "rebellion;" no right to an official knowledge that the United States were divided between two contending Powers, or that Mr. Lincoln's authority was not as fully established in South Carolina as in Massachusetts. It might have been possible for Her Majesty's Government thus to have ignored the Secession had England had no kind of relations or dealings with the South, for then it would not have been necessary for her to adopt any rule for the guidance of her subjects in such transactions. But the Southern ports were full of English ships, to which, after a certain day, Mr. Lincoln threatened to forbid egress. English merchants had a most important trade with the South, and the Federal Government announced its intention to interrupt that trade. Hundreds of English vessels frequented American waters; those vessels would be liable to visitation, perhaps to capture, by the cruisers of either party. Ships with Confederate clearances, vessels of war bearing the Confederate flag, might claim admission to English ports. British subjects, resident in either division of the territory still claimed for the Union, might find their rights, interests, and property affected by the action of either party. It was necessary that the English Government should take some course in reference to these matters. They must either recognize in some form the existence of the Confederate Power, or deal with the Confederates as pirates at sea and plunderers by land. As no sane man contends for the latter alternative, it is clear that it was not possible for England to ignore altogether the Southern "rebellion," or the existence of a de facto Government, claiming the allegiance and controlling the affairs of a portion of what were still called, by diplomacy, the "United States." And in recognizing that such a Government, in a state of war with the Government at Washington, did exist, she acted not only as the facts of the case obliged her to act, but in the strictest accordance with the precedents afforded by every similar case, from the Revolt of the Netherlands down to the Greek Revolution, or the Belgian War of Independence. No civilized nation ever pretended to treat the rebel provinces of another but as legitimate belligerents.

But the formal acknowledgment of the Confederates as a belligerent Power, and the Queen's solemn proclamation of neutrality, gave great offence to the Government and people of the North, and have by the latter been angrily resented ever since. A proceeding so public and so impressive seemed to give to the "rebellion" an importance which the Cabinet at Washington denied to it, and which the North hardly believed it to possess. The people, unable to draw nice distinctions, might not unnaturally think that England had manifested by this act a desire to take the part of the South: it was the duty of the better-informed Government at Washington to undeceive them. Mr. Seward and his colleagues must have been well aware that the recognition of the belligerent rights of the two parties to the war, and the strict injunctions to neutrality issued to the subjects of Queen Victoria, were really acts of necessity for England, and of substantial advantage to the North. Had we refused to recognize the South as a belligerent Power, we must have denied the existence of a war, and refused to the American Government the right of search, of blockade, and of capturing contraband of war. But for the proclamation of neutrality, British subjects might have fitted out privateers in British ports, and preyed upon the vast commercial marine of the North under letters of marque from the Confederate Government. The strict neutrality of third parties is always of greatest advantage to the stronger belligerent; and its enforcement by Royal proclamation, though dictated simply by a regard to the interests of England and of peace, was not a ground of reasonable offence, but an act of substantial favour to the United States.

In all indifferent matters, in all instances in which two methods of fulfilling neutral obligations were open, in every case of doubt, the English Government has placed on its neutrality that interpretation which is most consonant with Northern interests. It was open to us to admit or to exclude the prizes of the cruisers of both belligerents: we excluded both. The exclusion did no harm to the North, which can make no prizes, and if it could, has its own ports open to receive them; it inflicted an immense disadvantage on the South, whose cruisers, excluded from our ports, and from those of other neutral nations by our example, and finding their own ports closed by the Federal blockade, could not dispose at all of their numerous captures. When the North complained that we harboured the Confederate cruisers, we replied by placing severe restrictions on the presence of belligerent vessels in our ports, the effect of which was to cut short the destructive career of the Nashville and Sumter, without imposing any serious inconvenience on Federal men-of-war. In regard to the shipment of arms, again, we have taken the course most convenient to the North. Instead of vigilantly preventing the export of arms and ammunition to either party, we have left the enforcement of the Queen's injunction in this respect to the belligerents themselves; so that the North receives large and regular supplies from this country, while the cargoes shipped to Southern ports are generally seized by Federal cruisers. When the blockade of those ports was first proclaimed, and for a long time afterwards, it was notoriously inefficient. Evidence of its inefficiency was placed in the hands of the Government. If tolerated, it threatened with ruin the most important branch of English industry—with starvation hundreds of thousands of English families. Yet it was tolerated. While British ships were captured every week in right of this nominal blockade, the Foreign Secretary declined to interfere, and permitted the illegality to pass without even a protest, rather than depart from the policy he had pursued from the first, of interpreting the neutrality of England, as far as honour and equity would allow, in favour of the Northern cause. We have done even more than this. In order to allow the quarrel to be fought out without interference on our part, we have forbore to enforce rights which the Federal Government had invaded, or to take up in a determined manner any of the thousand affronts and wrongs which British subjects have sustained at its hands; and when forced to assert the honour of our flag, we have asked the least reparation that could be demanded, and allowed it to be made as tardily and ungraciously as Mr. Seward could make it. Unless England had actually given material aid to the North, it is difficult to see how she could have acted with less partiality to the South than she has actually shown. Every compliance that a belligerent may reasonably demand of a neutral Power, the North has received unasked from Great Britain.

And what has been our recompense? From Mr. Lincoln's accession to power, his Administration has treated England with studied discourtesy, endeavouring now and then to make its impertinence to this country the more marked by a tone of almost servile complaisance towards the ally with whom, throughout, the measures of England have been concerted. On the outbreak of the war, Mr. Seward addressed himself to the British Court in a tone of dictation and menace, threatening us with untold vengeance if we should swerve a hair's breadth from the course he chose to mark out for us. And of this kind has been his language throughout, and the language of the Northern press, pulpit, and platform. Every contemptuous epithet, every phrase of defiance, contempt, and menace, that is contained in the copious vocabulary of the American editor and stump-orator has been lavished on England.

We have been threatened with war, either instant or at a more convenient season—with annexation of Canada, with invasion of Ireland. Fortunately for the temper of this country, and the peace of the Northern States, American newspapers are but little read in England; and those who read them know how to rate their abuse, and can endure anything from them but praise. But the spleen of the Northern people has not been vented in mere abuse. British subjects, guilty of no offence, have been thrown into Northern dungeons as loathsome as those of Naples, subjected to every kind of maltreatment, and only released on taking the oath of allegiance to a foreign Government; nor has it been possible to obtain any redress. Englishmen, despite the interference of the British Consuls, have been pressed or kidnapped into the Federal service, and there detained for months after Lord Lyons had extorted a promise of their discharge. A gentleman of Liverpool was arrested on landing for the first time in New York, insulted, searched, and plundered of his papers, because spies employed in Liverpool by the Federal Government reported that he had expressed himself in favour of the South; for the Northern Government pretends even to control the expression of English opinion on English soil! When Captain Wilkes kidnapped the Southern Envoys on board a British vessel, the outrage to our flag was hailed with frantic delight. The people, the municipal authorities, Congress, the Government itself, were enthusiastic in approval, not of the capture of the Commissioners, but of the insult to Great Britain. Under the influence of fear, and of fear alone, that insult was reluctantly atoned; but it was not long before the Federalists recovered sufficient courage to recommence their course of outrage and provocation. They have since the affair of the Trent repeatedly seized British vessels in transit from one neutral port to another, and either condemned them as prizes, or released them without compensation. They are now blockading a British port, boarding every vessel that goes out or in; and their last exploit has been to fire shot and shell at a merchant ship hoisting the British flag, and obviously pursuing an innocent voyage to a neutral port. This is the return they make for the strictest observance of good faith, the most unexampled forbearance on our part—this gross outrage on our national rights, this extravagant violation of the laws of nations!

Garibaldi's Attempted Revolution.

SOME surprise has been expressed at the persistent protest of the Southern States of America as to the constitutional right of Secession, and that the war is the fruit of Northern revolution against the solemn provisions of the Constitution of the United States. After an appeal to the sword, it has been called idle to appeal to Constitutionalism. But the South, without denying the right of revolution, does well in repudiating the responsibility incurred in the use of that extreme right. Revolutions are made with blood, not with rose-water; and woe unto the nation that needlessly and unjustly revolts from constituted authority.

Of all the uncalculated attempts at revolution that have ever taken place, the present insurrectionary movement of Garibaldi bears the palm. It is impossible to conceive any position more assuring than that of the new Kingdom of Italy. The revolution is thoroughly accomplished, and all fears being removed of foreign aggression, there is ample opportunity for consolidation. If Rome and Venice are indispensable to the unity of the Italian Kingdom, the patriot had the consolation of knowing that every year made the annexation of these places more attainable by peaceful measures. The subjects of Victor Emmanuel enjoy abundant liberty, and, we believe, are thoroughly contented. Suddenly, but not unexpectedly, Garibaldi raises the standard of revolt. What for? Not to avenge his country. No one pretends that, not even his avowed partisans. The object of this wild movement is to carry out the designs of Mazzini, and found a Republic, in which demagogism and anarchy may flourish. The only excuse offered for Garibaldi is, that he is an unconscious tool of designing politicians; but though his judgment may be very weak, he surely cannot altogether blind himself to the unlawfulness of his proceedings. If he had chosen to throw off his alliance to Victor Emmanuel, his conduct would have been equally reprehensible, but not so inconsistent. The world might charitably have believed that he erred in judgment only; but to profess to owe allegiance to Victor Emmanuel, and yet to levy forces against the commands of his sovereign, to, if possible, seize upon Rome, is so flagrantly lawless that we cannot imagine any person can be unconscious of the criminality of the action. Garibaldi sets himself above all law, and would, if he had the power, treat the King of Italy as his puppet. We also find that even the enthusiastic Italians are not deceived by such a transparent artifice, and that they do not second the ambitious designs of the masked assassins who have persuaded Garibaldi to strike at the new-born liberty of his country.

One of the most curious phases of this unfortunate affair is the abuse that Garibaldi heaps upon the Emperor of the French. Can worse ingratitude be conceived? But for the Emperor Napoleon's gallant and timely intervention the Kingdom of Italy would not have been established on its present firm and promising basis. That Garibaldi is a brave, dashing soldier, no one denies; and from his early life, we gather that he is an excellent guerilla chieftain, but at present he has given no proof of generalship. All he had to do with the conquest of Naples was to pass through it in a delirium of popular triumph. He had not to fight a single battle, and, under the circumstances, his undisciplined army would have done as well if it had been commanded by the youngest lieutenant in the service. We are not blaming Garibaldi for not having the occasion to manifest his generalship, we merely note the fact. The Emperor of the French did the fighting, conducted the campaign in a manner that elicited the applause of Europe, gained victories that are glorious to France, and which made the King of Piedmont King of Italy. Not Garibaldi, but Napoleon III., was the King-maker, and he will be remembered in history as the friend of Italy and the founder of her national unity.

The firmness of Victor Emmanuel and the loyalty of his people will frustrate the scheme of Garibaldi's instigators, but yet it will for a time do detriment to Italy by agitating the public mind. Will that land never be free from the machinations of conspirators? One good result may follow the present attempt. The most sceptical must now see that the love of liberty is with the Mazzinians a mere cloak for personal ambition; for when Italy is regenerated and in the enjoyment of constitutional freedom, they do their best to bring about disorder and anarchy; for such persons are the bitter enemies of the law and order which curb their ambition. We are sorry Garibaldi, who has been so highly lauded, should have so sullied his fair fame; but no good can come from tacitly condoning his offence, though we may exonerate him from any guilty intention, on the score of great weakness of judgment.

THE New York Tribune says that Russia is the great natural ally of America, and adds:—

She can help Russia, and Russia can help her, and there is no knowing how soon that help may be needed. If France and England are willing to make war upon America, it would be no small hindrance to them to have Russia behind their backs befriending America. Therefore nothing should be left undone to confirm a lasting and reciprocal friendship.

Whether a war between France, England, and the United States is imminent we will not offer any opinion, though it is quite certain that the insults of the Federal press and people, endorsed as they are by the Washington Government, would be a sufficient excuse for war if they were not beneath contempt; but it is possible that Northern insolence may wax so bold by impunity as to demand the attention of Europe. The notable feature, however, in the above paragraph is the proposed alliance with Russia. Knowing what the United States is, we are not in the least surprised that it should gloat over the idea of an intimate alliance with a Government reputed the most despotic in Europe, but we are somewhat astonished at the prevailing ignorance as to the political condition of the Continent. Russia may or may not entertain feelings of cordiality for this country, or even for France, but Russia will not sacrifice her interests to gratify a sentiment of hostility. Besides, Russia does not contract useless alliances, and even if she could be of any service to the United States, it is quite certain the last-named Power cannot assist her. We may also observe, it is believed in official circles that there is a complete and definite understanding between France and Russia in reference to American affairs.

Reviews.

The Home and Foreign Review. No. I. London: Williams and Norgate.

This new competitor for public attention is likely to be useful. It represents the opinions of that large section of the Church of Rome which, whilst remaining perfectly loyal to the Church, eschews fanaticism. In politics the Home and Foreign Review is philosophically Conservative. The articles are well selected and well written; but it must not be inferred, from these favourable comments, that we endorse all the opinions of the review, for there are more points on which we differ than on which we agree. We totally dissent from the theory of "Nationality," as set forth in rather a dreary article under that heading. The writer of that contribution says, "Inferior races are raised by living in political union with races intellectually superior." If by political union is meant the full participation in equal political rights, we reply that all history proves that the tendency of man is to come down, and not to rise up; and that where the superior mixes up with the inferior race upon terms of political equality, the former deteriorates much more than the latter improves. We are astonished at the tone adopted in reference to Mr. Disraeli. In an editorial in a daily newspaper it is not very surprising that the Conservative leader should be attacked upon sometimes palpably insufficient grounds, but in a review, written at leisure, and supposed to be the outpourings of mature judgment, it is curious to find the same misconception of facts, and the same desire to speculate upon motives, and to test the character of a man by such speculations. Mr. Disraeli is supposed to be the incarnation of inconsistency, and yet in his actions and in his principles he has been far more consistent than many statesmen who are looked upon as marvels of unchangeableness. In this instance it is not our wish to offer any opinion upon Mr. Disraeli's career, but to enter our protest against a quarterly reviewer being guilty of reflecting popular cant and prejudice. The article on "Savage Life in Africa," though brief, is instructive. We read pathetic narratives of the poor African being stolen from his happy home and doting parents, and the picture conjured up is a European village, a fond mother clinging to her carefully nurtured and neatly-dressed baby, and a ferocious, theatrical-looking brigand tearing away the interesting infant, despite maternal entreaties. We do not mean this as a sarcastic defence of the slave trade, but we recite the popular idea as a remarkable specimen of popular delusions. In Africa there is nothing but savage life—the worst and most degraded form of savage life. Slavery is so general that "as the Americans say 'dollar,' as the English say 'pound sterling,' so the Africans of these regions say 'slave.' Fines are paid in slaves, wives are purchased for slaves; and if the buyer has no slaves, he pays as much of some other commodity as will represent the number of slaves required." The writer of the paper from which we are quoting says:—"In every part of Africa the traveller seems to find Fetishism to exist; in every part there is slavery;" and the descriptions he gives of African life are undoubtedly true, and exceedingly revolting. It seems hardly credible that the negro in the Southern States of America comes from such a source, and his condition is the most wonderful instance of mental and moral progress on record. And let it be remembered that the savage life of the African is not of recent growth, but is traceable to the earliest times:—

If we leave out of reckoning Egypt—that mysterious seat of a civilization which is hardly to be called African, but stands, as it were, in a region of its own—nowhere else in that ill-fated continent has history recorded any thing which the African races have contributed to human progress. Whatever has been done is to be assigned to colonies, either Carthaginian, Greek, Roman, or Saracen. Among the native Africans a few barbaric dynasties are all that relieve a history of continuous slavery and degradation, of wars truly like those of "kites and crows flocking and fighting in the air." The part which is destined for Africa in the remote future of human history is hard to conjecture. Hitherto its place has uniformly been such as to verify the tradition that its people have laboured under a primitive curse, age after age beholding them as unchanged in their poor and low approaches to improvement, as the lower orders are in instinct.

The future of Africa is, indeed, an impenetrable mystery, and but for the negro in the Southern States we might suppose the Africans could never, in any respect, be improved.

The Negro is undoubtedly in the position of an infant as compared with the Europeans; but we have no right to assume that that infancy is to be permanent because it has lasted for thousands of years; a principle which would have led political reasoners of the age of Tacitus to predict that Providence had no future in store for the great Germanic race.

The comparison with the German race is, we submit, a mistake. We think the African susceptible of vast improvement, but that the negro is inferior, physically and mentally, to the white man is unquestionable.

Three Letters from a South Carolinian relating to Secession, Slavery, and the Trent Case. London: Smith, Elder, and Co.

THESE letters were printed at the commencement of the present year "for private circulation only," and they are from the pen of Mr. Edwin de Leon, late Consul General of the United States in Egypt, and one of the earliest advocates of Southern rights, including the right of Secession. We do not propose to offer any criticism upon Mr. Leon's terse and statesmanlike letters; our object is to point out the great foresight these letters display, by quoting a passage from one dated May 23, 1861, written in reply to the letter addressed by Mr. Cassius M. Clay to the Times.

"But can you subdue the revolted State?"—"Of course we can," says Mr. Clay. "Of course you cannot," say those States, and have joined issue of battle thereupon. But if Mr. Clay's be a foregone conclusion, and the Federal Government can "blockade them by sea and invade them by land, and close up the rebellion in a single year, if we are let alone,"—why these pathetic and obligatory appeals to a Power which has just formally declared its intention to be neutral? Why this perversion of facts and figures to impress the conviction on the mind of Europe? for we of the South, too, only ask to be "let alone;" and if invaded, in the stout hearts and arms of her own sons the South finds, and will continue to find, sufficient protection, the sentiment of your great poet, who sang the "Lays of Rome" animating every Southern heart:—

"For how can man die better Than facing fearful odds,
For the ashes of his fathers,
And the temples of his gods?"

"If all the Southern States were to make common cause" (which they have done since the Northern sword has been thrown into the balance), they can bring into the field, according to the last census, 1,250,000 fighting men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, besides all those above and under those ages respectively, who would take up arms against the invaders of their hearths and homes.

The bloody battle-fields of Mexico, where the South furnished about 45,000 and the North about 20,000 men, can attest to Southern valour and discipline; and the veterans of the army and navy who have left the Federal to join the Confederate service are well capable of commanding troops who have never believed that "force was necessary" to cement fraternity, volunteering, as they have done, solely for defence, not for aggression. The old watchword of the Jacobins in France's darkest day of blood and tears, "Fraternité ou la mort (Be my brother, or I will kill you!)" is now the rallying cry of the "free North," not of the South, who stands with drawn sword beside her own altars. Is that a watchword to enlist the sympathies or stir the pulses of free-born Englishmen, when a new reign of terror is sought to be inaugurated once more, under the desecrated name of liberty, over the smiling fields and happy homes of the sunny South? We cannot, and we will not, believe it. England has ever been a generous foe—she will not prove a faithless friend.

The statement that "the population of the Slave States is divided perhaps equally for and against the Union," is without a shadow of foundation. The secession of the South now forms a part of history; and never in the annals of mankind has such entire unanimity of sentiment and of action been manifested by any people as in the formation, deliberations, and action of the Cotton States. Since the despotism d'état attempted by the Northern President, the same spirit has spread like a fire on a prairie over the Border States, as witness the instantaneous action of Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee, with Missouri and Kentucky moving in the same direction; or, more striking still, the reception of the Northern volunteers in the city of Baltimore—once regarded as most loyal to the Union, but now mourning, like Venice, under a foreign yoke, and powerless for the moment to avenge the blood of her children slain in resisting the profanation of their soil.

THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF "STONEWALL" JACKSON.

In the following article a writer in the Richmond Whig gives some interesting particulars of the campaign of General "Stonewall" Jackson in the Valley of Virginia:—

In reviewing the operations of General Jackson for the last three months, it will be found that he has probably accomplished more in that brief period, with the means at his command, than ever was achieved by any other general of ancient or modern times. I believe that his campaign during the spring will compare favourably even with the almost incredible achievements of Napoleon in his celebrated campaign in Italy. With a handful of citizen soldiers, but partially drilled, and poorly armed and equipped, he has, in little more than sixty days, marched over 500 miles, fought about twelve battles, five of which were pitched battles, defeated four generals, routed four armies, captured millions of dollars' worth of stores, &c., and killed, wounded, and secured as prisoners almost as many of the enemy as he had soldiers under his command. These are startling assertions, but they are literally true. Explore the pages of history, and see whether they afford the record of more brilliant successes.

In the latter part of March Jackson was at Winchester, with about 3000 or 4000 men. Being pressed by a superior force, he was compelled to fall back before the hosts of General Banks. Slowly and in good order he retired up the Valley, contesting every inch of ground. At Kernstown he turned upon his pursuer, and for two successive days gave him battle. And here permit me to remark, that the recent occupation of the lower Valley by our forces has enabled us to gather facts in regard to those battles which add new lustre to the glories of those fights. It is now ascertained that Jackson's force at Kernstown was not much over 2500, whilst that of the enemy was 12,000. Of the enemy 860 were buried in Winchester and on the battle-field, many others were sent home for internment, and 1500 were wounded; whilst our loss in killed and wounded was less than 500. The 84th Pennsylvania Regiment went into the battle with 800 men and came out with 300.

Having taught the enemy this severe lesson, Jackson continued his progress up the Valley, holding the whole army of the enemy in check until he could obtain reinforcements. Arriving at Harrisonburg, with his men wearied and exhausted by continual marching and skirmishing, Jackson left the main Valley road and turned off eastward on the Swift Run Gap Road. His object was to cross the Shenandoah River, and, having placed this strong defence between him and the enemy, to be quiet—to give his men a chance to rest—to watch the movements of the enemy, and to wait reinforcements. Here he was joined by General Ewell, but their united force was not sufficient to meet the enemy in the open field. It must be remembered, too, that at this time Staunton and the upper part of the valley were threatened by a large force from the West, under Milroy. General Johnson, with about 3500 men, was the only obstacle to the advance of Milroy. Being thus with a command of less than 20,000 men, including Johnson's, and threatened by Banks, with an estimated force of 35,000, on the one side, and Milroy, with 6000 or 8000 on the other, he was obliged to accomplish by stratagem what he could not effect in the open field. To this end, he moved across the Blue Ridge, as if with the view of uniting with the forces of General Jos. E. Johnston. He took care, however, to leave Ewell's forces concealed in the gorges of the mountains, near Swift Run, and Ashby's cavalry to picket the country closely, so as to cut off all information from the enemy as to his true purposes. The manoeuvre effectually deceived Banks, and he forthwith telegraphed to Washington that Jackson had evacuated the Valley and fled to Gordonsville! In a day or two Jackson turned up at Staunton, and, hastening to join General Ed. Johnson, he fell upon Milroy, at McDowell, and routed him, and pursued him to Franklin, in Pendleton county.

In the meantime, Banks, supposing that Jackson was east of the Ridge, weakened his force by sending Shields with 10,000 men to join McDowell, and another detachment to reinforce Milroy. Jackson having thus cleared his left flank, by dispersing Milroy's forces, hastened by the nearest route towards Harrisonburg, where he could act in conjunction with Ewell. Ewell came out of his hiding place, and, while a portion of the conjoint forces marched down the Valley turnpike towards Strasburg, to which place the greater portion of Banks' army had fallen back, the residue crossed the Massanutten Mountain, and hurried down the banks of the Shenandoah to Front Royal, where they attacked and captured the forces stationed at that point. The sound of the cannon gave Banks the first intimation of the proximity of an enemy, and he immediately commenced his precipitate flight to Winchester. An effort was made to intercept him near Newton, but the attempt was only partially successful. The swift-footed Banks had passed the junction of the road, with a part of his army, before the wearied forces of Jackson could come up with them. He pierced Banks' column, however, and drove a portion of it southward up the road, while the main body fled towards Winchester. A running fight of eight or ten miles ensued, Banks flying and Jackson pursuing. Near Winchester the enemy made a stand, but the invincible columns of Jackson bore down upon them with irresistible power, and they broke and fled ingloriously, and were pursued through the streets of Winchester and on to Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry, where the demoralized elements of the once powerful army of Banks sought refuge in Maryland. At Winchester, and Martinsburg, and Front Royal, stores, estimated at from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 were taken, and near 3000 prisoners. Encumbered with his spoil, and embarrassed by his prisoners, on the very borders of the enemy's country, Jackson found himself in a critical position. He remained only long enough to secure the booty, which was of the highest importance to our army, and having sent that in waggon up the valley, he followed to protect his trains and put his prisoners in a place of security.

We all recollect the sensation which these daring achievements created throughout the country. Lincoln was thrown into a paroxysm of fright, and telegrams were despatched throughout the North calling for the whole militia force of the country to protect the United States' Capital, which it was feared Jackson might seize at an early day.

When the authorities at Washington recovered from their panic, they were overwhelmed with shame and confusion, and immediately set to work to avenge the wound that had been inflicted on their national honour. It was ascertained that Jackson had but a small force—that he was encumbered with immense trains and vast numbers of prisoners, and that he would have to march 120 miles before he could reach a point of safety. The whole Northern press teemed with threats and promises of the speedy annihilation of Jackson and his daring followers. Three armies—one from the North, under Dix, one from the West, under Fremont and Milroy, and one from the East, under Shields, were immediately set in motion to intercept him, and it was even said, by some of the Northern journals, that Jackson had fallen into the trap that had been set for him!

The reader will observe the position of the parties: Jackson's forces were scattered from the Potomac to Winchester; Dix came by railway from Baltimore; Fremont was west of the North Mountain, at Franklin, in Pendleton; and Shields was east of the Blue Ridge, near Warrenton. The plan was for Fremont and Shields to push forward and unite their forces at Strasburg, and cut off Jackson's retreat up the Valley, while Dix would press him in the rear. The eagle eye of Jackson saw the danger at a glance. By a forced march of over 100 miles in three days, he won the race for Strasburg; but, so close was the struggle, that, as he passed the proposed point of union, his rear guard was compelled to fight the advanced columns of the enemy.

Then commenced another retreat and running fight up the Valley, Jackson contesting the advance of the enemy, so as to secure his trains and prisoners. When he had accomplished this object, learning that the enemy had divided his overwhelming force into two columns, one of which, under Shields, was advancing east of the Shenandoah River, and the other, under Fremont, up the main Valley turnpike, with a view to unite in the upper part of the Valley, Jackson again turned off at Harrisonburg, having previously caused Ashby to burn the bridge over the Shenandoah, near Swift Run Gap, and went to Port Republic, a small village situated at the point where the North and South Rivers come together and form the Shenandoah. There was a bridge over the North River at Port Republic, which was the only means of crossing the stream, which was swollen by recent rains. Jackson occupied the ground near both ends of this bridge, and thus had it in his power to elect which column he would fight, as the two were separated by an impassable river. On Sunday he determined to attack Fremont first, and, accordingly, leaving a sufficient force to guard the bridge, he marched about five miles to the Cross Keys to meet Fremont, and after a terrible conflict of many hours he succeeded in repulsing Fremont with great loss. He then returned to the bridge, and after passing over it to the Port Republic side, burnt it, so as to prevent Fremont, in case he should be reinforced and rally, from coming to the rescue of Shields. The result vindicated his sagacity, for Fremont on Monday was reinforced and did rally, and advanced with an overwhelming force to renew the conflict with Jackson. But, when he reached the bank of the river, he found that Jackson had passed over and destroyed the bridge, and that an impassable stream was between them. Fremont was thus compelled to be an unwilling witness of the conflict between Jackson and Shields, for as soon as the bridge had been effectually destroyed, and his rear thus secured, Jackson advanced upon Shields, who was encamped at Lewiston, the estate of General Samuel H. Lewis, about two miles north of Port Republic. Shields was aware of his approach, and made every preparation to receive him. The attack was made about sunrise on Monday, 9th June, and lasted until about ten or eleven o'clock, when the forces of Shields broke and fled in utter confusion and dismay. The rout was complete. The slaughter was great, and the pursuit continued until a late hour of the day. About 1000 prisoners were taken, and six pieces of artillery. The whole road was strewn with knapsacks, arms, blankets, &c. Those who witnessed it think that the rout was as complete as that inflicted on Banks. The loss of the enemy in the two battles of Cross Keys and Lewiston, in killed, wounded, and missing, is estimated at near 6000, while ours does not exceed 600. It seems almost incredible, but it is nevertheless true.

Those two battles are among the most brilliant, if not the most brilliant, of the war. They are the crowning glory of Jackson and his gallant associates. No: I recall that. Not the crowning glory, for I believe still brighter wreaths are destined to encircle their brows if this unhalloved war shall continue.

Thus it will be seen that Jackson and his army, in one month, have routed Milroy, annihilated Banks, discomfited Fremont, and overthrown Shields. Was there ever such a series of victories won by an inferior force, by dauntless courage, and consummate generalship?

With 50,000 fresh troops under Jackson, Lincoln would be compelled to raise the siege of Richmond, and look to the security of his own capital.

Fremont still remains on the hills opposite Port Republic. He is reported to have about 20,000 men. Shields had 9000, and Jackson encountered him with about the same number.

What the next move will be it would be impossible for me to say, even if I knew. But Jackson keeps his own counsel. He speaks by deeds, not by words. Suffice it to say, he will strike at the right time, and in the right place. Whatever courage, skill, industry, and patriotism can accomplish, he will be sure to effect.

A NORTHERN VIEW OF THE STATE OF THE NORTH.

The following report of a trial in Massachusetts, taken from the Boston Courier, deserves attentive perusal. Many men in the United States may think as does Mr. Sennott, but few would have the boldness to own their sentiments:—

At the examination of the Gordons for treason in Boston, R. H. Dana, junr., the District Attorney, appeared, and said in substance that there was no statute of the United States under which the Gordons could be held merely for expressions of hostility to the Government, or for receiving intelligence from the South; that such things were not actually treason, there being no overt act proved; that the line must be drawn somewhere, and that, although the conduct of the Gordons was pretty close up to it, he must enter a nolle prosequi in the case.

Mr. H. M. Parker replied that, after what had been said by the attorney, it was his duty to protest against any disposition of the case, except by a hearing and determination by the magistrate. He said that no one of the five Gordons had been guilty even of improper talk, except Henry, the youngest. He warned those self-constituted committees that the community would not tolerate such interference as they had been guilty of. He thought the counsel for the defendants ought to have an opportunity to vindicate the character of these men. He had not himself preferred to argue this case, having from the beginning left that to the junior counsel, Mr. Sennott.

Mr. Dana said that an argument in the case after Government had abandoned it would be useless; but if anything could be said in vindication of the Gordons, it would be quite fair to allow it.

Mr. Sennott was obliged to the District Attorney for that. He said that, after what the Gordons had suffered, it would be no advantage for them to argue their case. What they wanted their counsel to do was to vindicate their character, and expose the meanness of their prosecutors. This he proposed to do now.

He then addressed the Commissioners in a speech, from which we make the following extracts:—

THE RIGHT OF FREE SPEECH.

"I declare before God that, as I understand that right, I value it more than I do my life! And I call this whole country to witness if I have not before now proved the sincerity of this declaration by my actions! And the right I vindicated at the hazard of my life, before a Southern tyrant, I will not give up, for the sake of my business, to a Yankee sneak. Neither shall the Gordons. Their case is ours. We are tried with them. And in defending them we defend ourselves, and our country from a gang compared with whom Colonel Ledbetter is humane, and General Floyd respectable. Mr. Sumner was once the advocate of free speech. He claimed to be almost one of its martyrs; and in defence of it, or in consequence of it, he certainly was the victim of a cowardly assault, inflicted with a ferocity and endured with a meekness unexampled in the annals of cudgelling! He now changes his opinion, or, at least, his language. With that felicity of illustration which belongs, among the public writers of America, to him and to Governor Andrew alone, he advises his friends to put their 'heels' upon those who differ from them and who dare to speak out. The advice is given in a letter to the late war meeting at New York. Is this prosecution an experiment made upon poor mechanics by a few small conspirators, in pursuance of an agreement between the principal Thugs at Washington, in order, if it works well, to sacrifice more important victims to the Abolition Kalee? I do not know. I know that the gentlemen of the Republican Party do not countenance it, and that it will fail here, because, to reach their political opponents they must cut down their political and personal friends. If free speech is treason here, our excellent Governor would speedily be known as the late unlamented John A. Andrew, for his speech is exceedingly free and easy—quite loose, as you may say. Then, what would become of Mr. Phillips? Does he speak in favour of the Government? Has he ever said anything in favour of any Government except that of Hayti? Did he not lately advise a large and patriotic assembly not to give a man or a dollar to any Government of the United States? And did not that patriotic society applaud that liberal suggestion? Shall we prosecute Mr. Phillips, therefore? Not with my good will. Not without my active resistance. I should violate the very first principles of Democracy; which is greater to me than anything but the Word of God himself, if I did not fight for Mr. Phillips' right to talk treason to any fool who wants to hear him."

WHAT WAS SAID OF THE IRISH TROOPS ON LEAVING BOSTON. "When the regiment of the late Colonel Cass went off, without an escort even of the 2nd Battalion, it was not actually hissed in State-street, as was the Massachusetts Regiment on its return from Mexico, but the agreeable remark was made and heard that the departure of the Irish would be a great relief to our poorhouses and gaols. The Governor and his friends may say so about Colonel Cass's countrymen, the Irish, without committing treason or even giving offence. We are not accused of talking so badly even about Mr. Andrew's countrymen—the negroes—yet are we prosecuted!"

WHAT MR. SENNOTT THINKS OF SECRETARY SEWARD.

"Have we arrived at such a state that no one must find fault with any action or omission of the Government or any member of it, without having treason imputed to him? Cannot you, sir? Cannot I? I, for example, have the misfortune to think that Mr. Seward, our present Secretary of State, is not fit, as a statesman, to index the papers of the late Silas Wright. However little he may be affected by my thoughts, I do think his want of sense—sober sense—has made him the laughing-stock of Europe. I think that he is a small wart and county politician, who writes like a sophomore and acts like a stock-jockey. Every time he speaks about what will happen in sixty days, in ninety days, he puts me in mind of a kerb-stone broker, chattering over the approaching maturity of a dubious note! I think such men have been advanced to important places in this country about as often as they will be, and cannot help rejoicing to think that Mr. Seward will probably be the last of the Lilliputians."

AN ILLUSTRATION—SEWARD AND SUMNER.

"Again, I do not worship Mr. Sumner. I cannot admire a person who is so simple as to think it a finer thing to pretend to be a fanatic than to be a dull, but honest man. There is a fine old German story called 'The Adventures of Reynard the Fox,' in the illustrations of which animals of different countries are represented in the attitudes and with the expressions of men. The illustrations are very good, and from the well known fact that men often resemble certain animals in a most curious and unaccountable manner, their effect is highly amusing. It is particularly so, if you happen by any chance to be reminded by them of any particular person. Now, must I suffer death if I say that I never looked at those pictures without thinking of Mr. Seward and of Mr. Sumner, and that I never hear the names of Mr. Seward or of Mr. Sumner without thinking of the picture of the Fox and of the picture of the Gander?"

SICK OF THE IMBECILITY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

"And what if I am frank enough to say that I am sick of the swaggering imbecility with which the Government have managed this war of life and death? Is that treasonable? Shall my Government—that is to say, my servant, my creature—waste my money, and even let it be stolen, and stop my paper, and interrupt my business, and violate my Constitution, and starve and kill my soldiers out of pure neglect, and gain only disaster and defeat for me by all this folly? And shall I say nothing? If I am to put up with this, and more, and say nothing, or else be shut up by order of W. H. Seward, I want to know, seriously and calmly, what shall I fight Jeff. Davis for? What shall I fight Jeff. Davis for? What worse can he do to me than Seward or Stanton have done already? What, indeed, when their want of sense and want of energy have made him everything that he is? Lost money may be regained, lost armies may be replaced out of our swarms of men, but who shall give us back the time we have 'fooled away' before the dirt heaps of Manassas? Expose a cup of clear water to the frost. Observe it, and even when the cold begins to fill its transparent substance with beautiful spicula of ice, if you agitate the mass it will not immediately freeze. But give it in that condition a very short period of rest, and it becomes a rock, hardly yielding to the energies of gunpowder and fire? So have we found the South. They were once undecided. Time and the stupidity of Government have consolidated a hesitating into a hostile people. Yet Mr. Gordon is a traitor if he calls a fool a fool!"

A PICTURE OF A NEW ENGLAND SOCIETY.

"New England to-day is covered with societies, in which the best of men and women conscientiously, but reluctantly, and the worst of men and women, eagerly, and with a devilish delight, perform the part of spies and informers upon each other. To say that such a gigantic system of mutual espionage does not tend to degrade character, is simply to say that eavesdropping and tale-bearing are not low and mean occupations. Under its influence, nothing is known of a man's real character or disposition. Habitual watchfulness upon the one side awakens habitual hypocrisy on the other. And it is only when the little saint of Boston expands into the gigantic villain of New Orleans or San Francisco that you can tell how vast a benefit you derived from his enigration. The wickedness looked little here, because we saw but little of it. The enormous pressure of universal listening and peeping had driven it deep into the innermost fibres of our society. So pressed, it produces Smelling Committees—it elects Hiss legislatures; it brings such men as Deacon Palmer to associate, out of fear, with men like Mr. Washburn, whom they receive into their cellars, and dismiss through back doors. Nobody will deny the fact, or its application here, who is not prepared to deny the existence of the Reverend Mr. Kallach or his church member, Mr. Hayes, who pecked after him, and black-mailed him, and then exposed him. It is Mr. Hayes's turn to-day. It may be Mr. Kallach's turn to-morrow. It is Mr. Washburn's now. It may be the Gordon's turn by-and-by. But be the turn whose it may, the system of a barbarous age and people applied to the control of civilized mankind, awakens the fiercest resentment. Men have put up with the savagery taskmasters. They have endured the bloodiest tyrants without resistance for many years. They have submitted to the Kings of Prussia, to the Czars, to the House of Austria, and even to the Turks. But a Government of meddling philanthropists they cannot bear. It resembles the government of vermin more than any human despotism—individually vile and odious, but quite insignificant; when collected they are all-pervading, all-devouring, appalling, loathsome to every sense, and intolerable to the strongest body and the firmest mind."

THE RAM ARKANSAS.

The correspondent of the New York Tribune gives the following account of the unsuccessful attempt to destroy the Arkansas. His record of Federal doings is not complete, but, so far as it goes, sufficiently graphic:—

So patent has been the demoralizing effect of the late achievement of the Arkansas, and so greatly has fear diffused itself as day by day without her capture or destruction, that Lieutenant-Colonel Ellet deemed it necessary to call Commodore Davis's attention to the matter, and renew the proposition—the execution of which was attended with so much hazard—made to him immediately after the rebel vessel reached Vicksburg.

This proposal was to attack the Arkansas at her moorings off the town, and endeavour to sink her by running her down. For this purpose the following plan of operations was formed: Three of the vessels of Commodore Davis, the Benton, the Cincinnati, and the Louisville, were to engage the upper rebel batteries, the Bragg to lie behind the bend in readiness to butt the Arkansas in the event of her appearance above, and the Essex to run down in advance of the Queen and grapple her as she passed, draw her out into the stream, to give the Queen an excellent opportunity to ram her, Farragut meanwhile engaging the lower batteries. After the Queen had struck the enemy she was to come up or go down the river, as was most advantageous, the Benton protecting her retreat in the former, and the Essex in the latter case; the Sumter to ram the hostile gunboat if the Queen failed to perform her task. This arrangement was good, and entirely satisfactory to all parties, and promised to be faithfully carried out. The three gunboats opened fire; the Bragg took her position, and the Essex led off in line style, the Queen following at a high rate of speed, and under very favourable auspices. As the ram passed the flagship Commodore Davis waived his hand to Colonel Ellet, standing near the pilot-house, and cried out "Good luck, good luck!" The Colonel misunderstood the words, supposing the Commodore said "Go back, go back!" and therefore turned the Queen about and stemmed towards the Benton, when he heard "Go on, go on!" Without comprehending this apparent inconsistency, and believing the first duty of a soldier is to obey, the Colonel steamed down under the batteries, and, arriving at the first water battery, near the Marine Hospital, where the hostile gunboat was lying, he discovered the Essex had gone on, and was then in advance one-half or three-quarters of a mile.

The Queen was now exposed not only to the batteries of the enemy, but to those of the gunboat, which lay with her stern into shore and her bow up stream, apparently expecting and prepared for an attack. All this while, so far from the gunboats drawing the hostile fire, and standing between the Queen and harm, she was receiving most damaging attention from all sides. Shot and shell were raining around her, and she had been struck a number of times in very delicate localities. Colonel Ellet saw his was a desperate chance; that he had staked his life upon a cast, and that he had probably lost; that those on whom he had depended had failed, and he could now depend only on himself and fate.

To attempt to strike the Arkansas with his wooden boat while a score of the heaviest guns were pouring their fire upon him seemed certain destruction. There appeared no chance for escape above, and none below. He was hemmed in on every side. A wall of fire on both sides. And still he saw and heard nothing of Farragut, who was to occupy the lower batteries, while the ram relieved herself from her hazardous strait.

Colonel Ellet now determined, come what might, to strike the Arkansas—willing, if he could but sink her, to lose his existence. The Arkansas's position was unfavourable. He would have to take a roundabout course before he could reach her, and strike her going against the current; thus decreasing the rate of his speed, and diminishing the accuracy of his aim. But even these adverse circumstances did not deter him, nor the fact that heavy shot were every moment piercing his vessel, going through and through her, as if she were made of paper. The Colonel determined to take the odds, sink or not, and he took them. He went against the Arkansas partially up stream, designing to butt her forward of her side guns, her weakest place—but the eddies in the river altered his course somewhat, and he struck her aft of the aft side gun, and, unfortunately, a glancing though violent blow, that made both the traitorous and the loyal craft tremble. The Arkansas seemed to shrink and yield before the blow, and for a moment it was thought her side would give way; but she recoiled, and the ram flew back from her, and, in moving toward her again, ran into the bank. The Queen reversed her engines, and, as she went sternward into the stream, her head veered up the river, and it was then evident that her sole opportunity for escape was above.

Nothing more could be done, and Colonel Ellet resolved, if possible, to save his men, though that, under the circumstances, was the most forlorn of forlorn hopes. No friendly gunboat or Union vessel was near. Three or four of the hostile batteries were playing upon the devoted and seemingly doomed Queen, which must run by the great death-belching guns before she could be regarded as in any way secure. She had already been struck by more than twenty shots. Her chimney-stacks were perforated with balls; one of her steam-pipes had been shot away; in various places large holes had been bored through the sides and bow of the dauntless vessel, and yet no one was hurt, though many of the escapes had been almost miraculous. The Arkansas had given her broadside just as she was passing, and it was feared she would soon be water-logged. She therefore moved up the river, the Confederate batteries increasing their fire as she did so. Heavy shot and shell fell before, behind, and around her, and every few seconds one would go tearing through her deck or cabin. As she passed one of the upper batteries, a thirty-four pounder shot struck her in the rear, went through every one of her larboard state-rooms, in which no persons happened to be at the time, into the captain's office, penetrating the iron safe, and, passing out, shattered the wooden carriage of one of the mounted brass pieces on the boiler deck, dismounting the gun, and, hitting it, left a deep indentation in the metal. This shot, which was afterwards picked up, was a peculiar one. It was composed of powder mostly, with an admixture of lead and zinc, and weighs, probably, as much as fifty pounds. It is, probably, moulded out of the heterogeneous materials which the citizens—the wives, mothers, and daughters of the "Confederacy"—have from time to time been urged by the rebel leaders to contribute to the glorious cause.

The Queen ran by the hostile batteries, through a terrible fire, and made her appearance above the bend riddled with shot, but not a man on board seriously injured. She was received with acclamations by the crews of the fleet, who had as little hope of seeing her return as Colonel Ellet himself had of returning. His escape was what the orthodox call miraculous, and the philosophic, fortunate. The same experiment could not be tried with the same result once in ten thousand times, though her almost entire freedom from casualty is partially due to the precaution of Colonel Ellet in taking as few persons as possible, knowing that the probability of injury would be proportioned to the number of his crew.

On coming out of the action the Queen presented a most dismantled and forlorn appearance, and is as nearly shot to pieces, for any vessel that will float, as can well be imagined. The many who have visited her since her terrible experience are with difficulty persuaded that not one of her crew was killed or dangerously wounded. She has the semblance of a complete wreck, and it will be necessary to send her north at once for repairs, though some think her injury too great for remedy—that she is not worth the mending.

After Colonel Ellet's return it may be supposed he felt as if he had been, to say the least, unfairly treated by the two commanders, who had in no wise fulfilled their portion of the covenant, while he had done a great deal more than his. The Colonel chiefly regrets the contresens because he is firmly of the opinion that if Farragut and Davis had performed what they agreed he would have been successful in capturing or destroying the Arkansas, and he expresses himself not only willing but anxious to repeat the attempt whenever they will assure him they will achieve their portion of the task.

Commodore Davis crying out "Good luck" to Colonel Ellet, was very unfortunate, for it threw the ram behind, and gave the Essex leisure to get too far ahead. Had the Queen and Essex been nearer together, it is quite possible they might have achieved a favourable result.

Commodore Davis informs Colonel Ellet that after the Queen had passed down his position was very much exposed, and he ordered the Cincinnati and Louisville up the river, following them with the flagship, forgetting, until they had ascended the stream some distance, his promise to cover the Queen's retreat. The Commodore immediately ordered a downward movement again, but his boats are so slow that before he could recover the ground he had lost the Queen was out of danger and saved, but without any cause of gratitude to the distinguished commanders of the combined fleets.

The Benton was struck several times, but was not injured, and has no loss of men to report. The Cincinnati received some twenty shots, but is also little damaged. The Louisville entirely escaped. The Essex lost one man killed, and three wounded, all sailors.

The Arkansas was very little hurt, it is supposed, by the butting of the Queen of the West, as she had up steam, and was moving about an hour ago in the river. Doubtless, she needs repairs for the injuries inflicted on her on the 15th inst., and is not by any means her former self; though, I apprehend, she could still do us a great deal of damage if she were bold enough to attack our fleet. The best evidence, as I have said before, that she is or was badly damaged, lies in the fact that she has not made a second attempt to engage our flotilla. Had she passed unscathed through the gauntlet she had selected for herself, she would most assuredly have had sufficient confidence to attempt the renewal of her first brilliant performance. Many persons believe that the Arkansas will pay us another visit very speedily, especially since our fleet has been reduced by the departure of the Taylor, Conestoga, Carondelet, Sumter, and Essex, but Commodore Davis has no fear of the rebel gunboat, and thinks, with his present force, he could destroy her, if she were to assume an offensive position. Commodore Farragut and Colonel Ellet, as well as Commodore Davis, are burning to destroy the Arkansas, and would engage in almost any undertaking to secure that end. At present, however, circumstances are too unfavourable to the project.

THE NORTHERN HATRED OF THE NEGRO.

There has been a serious riot in Brooklyn, arising out of an attempt to prevent the employment of negroes in a tobacco factory. The following particulars are given by the New York World:—

A serious disturbance occurred in Sedgewick-street, near Columbia-street, yesterday afternoon, caused by the employment of negroes in the tobacco manufactories of Messrs. Watson and Lorillard, and resulted in the expulsion of the employés of the factories, consisting mostly of women and children (coloured) of whom, but for an accident, a large number would have been destroyed by fire. Shortly after noon, some fifty persons collected together, and making known their object, assembled a crowd numbering between 2000 and 3000 persons, and proceeded to the factories, which are three-story buildings of brick, and in which between 300 and 400 persons are employed. The overseer, or foreman, of Watson's factory is a coloured man, as are all the persons employed therein, most of whom are women and children, to the number from fifty to seventy-five. In Lorillard's factory about 250 are employed, whites and coloured. There has been no difficulty until within the past few weeks, but it has been understood for some time that a disturbance might take place any day. The population in the vicinity are principally Irish. Several local politicians, having for their object the making of political capital for use in the future, conceived the idea of making a demonstration against the factories for the purpose of expelling the objectionable employés. They proceeded to both factories, which adjoin each other, and commenced by smashing in the doors and windows with stones. They entered the lower floor of Watson's factory, and discovering a covection of liquorice and whiskey, mistook it for tar, and heaping a parcel of old clothing and some more combustible material around, set it on fire; but they were disappointed. It would not burn. A smoke was created, but there was no flame of consequence. The affrighted employés, meantime, took refuge in the upper stories. The men stood at the head of the stairs; there were some half dozen of them, who, armed with such weapons as they could get hold of, stood there to defend themselves and the women and children. A number who came up, thinking they could overawe the coloured guardians of the staircase, were knocked down, and several were seriously injured. The resistance at the landing was so persistent, that the rioters could not get up, and were compelled to depart much faster than they came. All in Lorillard's factory had been driven out, and at length, when nearly all the mischief was done, the police arrived, and proceeded to quell the riot by clubbing the negroes. Some of the officers did their duty manfully; among them were Sergeant Wright and officers Oats and Burns, of the 43rd Precinct, who were most unmercifully beaten. One of the assailants of these policemen was a naval officer in full uniform, who took a very active part in the affair. Inspector Folk having been notified at his house, which is about three miles from the scene, arrived at about two o'clock, and then everything like a disturbance was promptly quelled, and the rioters were scattered in every direction. The inspector ascertained that nearly every house in the neighbourhood was an unlicensed rum shop, where the rioters had wrought themselves up to the fighting point by the virtue of gin and whiskey. He promptly ordered every place to be closed, and, after a time, all those disposed to create disturbance dispersed. Some six or eight were arrested, among them Patrick Keenan, who stated in presence of Sergeant Wright that "they (the niggers) must be driven out if it cost life to do it, and he was willing to lose his." The negro foreman of Watson's factory was also arrested and locked up. His name is Charles Baker. He defended himself and others at the head of the stairs with an axe, and hurt several—among them officer Donnelly. "There were but few of the male employés present, most of them being absent at the Emancipation jubilee in Haupt's Myrtle Avenue Park. The police state that the substance the rioters set on fire in the lower room was tar, and that they had great difficulty in suppressing the flames. They were violently assaulted with stones while thus engaged, and if they had not succeeded and the flames had spread, those who had taken refuge upstairs must have perished."

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specimen illustrations furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rumbold-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
Jos. T. Robinson & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER, Three and Six Cord Speed
Thread, Cotton Bells, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.; F. RIMAILHO AND NEYREY,
New Orleans.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE and NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A.
Represented by R. G. BEESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

HARPER AND CAUGHIEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHIEY, Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States, Commission for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDER-ICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published
the following Catalogues of their Stock:—

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books.—Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP-CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History,
Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign
Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of Advertising.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the means of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee nation. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.
The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Retailers, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 21, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
A. Regent Street, London (and 20, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris).

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC.
On Wednesday, the 30th, will be published, in 1 vol. 8vo.

THOMAS JEFFERSON: an Historical View of Democracy in America. By CONRAD EDW. WYATT. Translated, with the Author's sanction, by R. S. H. CROUCH.
London: LONGMAN, GREEN, and Co., 15, Lud-
gate-hill.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West Vice- President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE: 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending
31st December, 1861 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861 232,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 16th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 16th March, 1862.
A. J. WHEELER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861 609,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861 806,420 93
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com- pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT., on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Penberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Ponts.
C. Honold.
G. Miltenberger.
S. N. Nevins.
J. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
B. F. Voorheis.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.
Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861 331,870 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861 237,338 27
Assets 30th April, 1861 1,442,050 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 10th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRAUTT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI- CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primeage.

PARTY PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.
Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of crediting
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.
Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 24th section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, ammunition, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £50; and the master or owner of any ship who fails to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XVII. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the
friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Crown-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—August 21, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.
OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I—No. 18.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 28, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	273
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter.. ..	274
Manchester Letter	274
TOBACCO MARKET	274
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
The Battles before Richmond—Lists of Killed and Wounded	275
Private Letters	276
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	277
Paris	277
EXTRACTS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS	277
LEADERS—
The Collapse of the Federal Armies	280
The Undercurrent of Disunion	280
The Justice and Duty of Reprisals	282
Federal and Confederate Resources	282
Rebellion or War: the Consequences of a Misnomer	283
A very Veracious Story	283
REVIEW—
The Port and Trade of London	285
A VOICE FROM PENNSYLVANIA	286
THE CONFEDERATE ARMY: THE CONSCRIPTION
ACT AND ORGANIZATION	287
ADVERTISEMENTS	288

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE maxim of Talleyrand, that speech was given to conceal thought, may be diplomatically true, but it cannot be said that the art of writing has been given to the Federals to conceal the truth. The Northern despatches and the Washington editions of the war news are substantially false, but then their falsehood is so palpable that it deceives nobody. Take as an example the Federal accounts of the late battle near Cedar Mountain. We need hardly observe that they claim a victory for the North, yet they admit that the Federal force was attacked by overwhelming numbers, and that it had to fall back, and also that their loss was 3000. In fact, they describe a defeat, and call it a victory. One misrepresentation deserves a passing notice. General Pope reported, or his friends in Washington reported for him, that the Confederate commander sent a flag of truce, asking permission to bury the Confederate dead. That this is untrue we know from the Northern acknowledgment that the battle ended by the Federals' falling back beyond the range of the Confederate guns, leaving the battle-field at the disposal of their enemy. There is, however, some foundation for the story. The Confederate commander sent a flag of truce to General Pope, giving him permission to remove the wounded Federals.

Instead of Federal cavalry and artillery pursuing the Confederates, as reported, we learn that General Jackson attacked the Federals at night with artillery, and produced a panic and rout.

The New York people are not deluded by official accounts. The New York Journal calls General Pope to task for suffering himself to be taken unawares, for, as we last week stated, General Banks was surprised. It appears, too, that General Pope and his staff had a narrow escape from capture, and that in the confusion they were fired upon by their own soldiers.

General Pope's army is suffering from typhoid fever and other diseases peculiar to the climate and the season. In one regiment, the 60th New York, 180 were on the sick list, and only 100 of the men appeared on parade. This statement is founded on a report from General Pope's headquarters.

We repeated last week a Northern announcement that the sickness in General McClellan's army had considerably abated, in consequence of a supply of fresh vegetables; but other and later accounts, so far from authenticating this rumour, declare that the sickness was increasing, and that the condition of the army was most distressing. Those who are acquainted with the climate of Virginia, and especially with the position occupied by General McClellan, are fully aware that his army must be subjected to the ravages of disease; it would be so if he had unlimited supplies of fresh provisions, but these he cannot obtain; and he will learn that in warfare pestilence claims more victims than the fire and sword of the enemy.

It cannot be said that the people of Washington and New York have an overweening confidence with regard to the Federal position in Virginia.

They anticipate, though they are not prepared for, the worst. Thus general apprehensions were lately rife as to the safety of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Portsmouth. No doubt the Washington Government encourages these rumours, for the purpose of stirring up the people to recruit the army; but, in the first place, the prospect of disaster does not stimulate the invader to increased exertions, as it does the invaded; and, secondly, the gloomy reports of the mortality in the Federal armies in Virginia are sufficient to deter enlistment, and to explain the panic caused by the order for drafting.

At Key West the yellow fever has broken out, and it has been found necessary to remove nearly all the Federal vessels from that station. The mortality at Key West has been considerable.

Baton Rouge was taken by the Confederates, under General Breckinridge, on the 6th inst. The Federals were defeated; General Williams was killed, and the camp equipage and stores were captured. It is further reported that the entire Federal force was captured. This is another proof that the advantages gained by the North cannot be maintained. This affair at Baton Rouge, of which at present we have no details, is of considerable strategic importance. So far from the Federals being masters of the Mississippi, it is evident that their position is critical.

General Butler does not feel himself secure, and, like other Northern commanders, clamours for more men. Mr. Lincoln would say he is quite right to ask for reinforcements if he wants them, and that the Government is justified in refusing his request if it has no means of sending him reinforcements. The new Federal levies will find plenty of employment.

General Butler, it will be remembered, suppressed some of the New Orleans papers, and appointed Northern editors to conduct the others. We were under the impression that his creatures were eminently servile, and that the tone of the Picayune, for example, was sufficiently subservient to satisfy the most exacting despotism; but it appears we were mistaken, for the publication of that journal has been temporarily prohibited, and that the Bulletin has been altogether stopped. Possibly, General Butler has discovered the utter futility of attempting to impose on the people of New Orleans, or that his editors, like the official newsmongers at Washington, are such clumsy inventors as to let the truth ooze out.

Moreover, General Butler has closed the Louisiana State Bank Branch, on the ground that the officials were aiding the cause of the South. It is possible that no great inconvenience will be experienced from this characteristic act, because trade in New Orleans is completely stopped, not only by the disinclination to transact business with a city under Federal rule, but that all commerce between the inhabitants of Louisiana and New Orleans is peremptorily forbidden by the Confederate authorities.

The accounts with regard to the rain Arkansas are conflicting, and up to the time we write the rumour of her being blown up is not confirmed. We are neither able to confirm or deny the intelli-

THE LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

The following telegram was received as we were going to press:—

NEW YORK, August 16, Morning.

Per Bohemian, via Quebec and Londonderry.

General McClellan's army is supposed to have retired from Harrison's Landing down the Peninsula, one portion by land, via Williamsburg, and another portion on transports down the James River. Both routes of retreat were liable to an attack from the Confederates, but it is reported that the movement has been successfully performed.

It is not definitely known where General McClellan's army will operate.

General Jackson has safely crossed the Rapidan, and is south-west of Gordonsville, with 60,000 men.

The high waters of the Rapidan have delayed the Federal forces; but they are reported to be steadily advancing.

General Pope's official report of the battle at Cedar Mountain states that the loss of the Federals was 1500 killed, wounded, and missing, 300 of whom were taken prisoners. Federal General Prince was captured by the Confederates. Confederate General Winder was killed.

The Southern journals claim the victory at Cedar Mountain, and state that thirty commissioned officers of General Pope's army have arrived at Richmond, where they would be imprisoned and finally punished as felons; but not if the Federal Government should cease the war policy inaugurated by General Pope.

General Pope has issued an order stating that his proclamation directing the army to subsist on the country has been abused by officers and men, and forbidding all to molest or disturb the property of citizens. Acts of pillage and outrage will be punished.

Confederate General Lee has addressed a letter to General Halleck threatening retaliatory measures for General Pope's order.

General Halleck answered that as the letter was couched in a tone insulting to the Federal Government, it would not reply.

General Fremont has again been appointed to command the first corps, under General Pope.

It is reported from Memphis that a battle occurred on the 7th inst. at Tazewell, near Cumberland Gap, in which 3000 Federals surrendered; that the Confederates were again in possession of East Tennessee, and that Generals Beauregard and Bragg were at Chattanooga, with 70,000 men. A semi-official Washington dispatch declares the report to be totally untrue, and says that no fight took place at Tazewell, except on the 9th inst., when the Confederates were repulsed with heavy loss.

The Memphis report is discredited.

It is again reported from the South that the Confederates have captured Baton Rouge, with four Federal regiments, and have sunk two Federal gunboats.

Official orders have been issued for formally commencing the draft of 300,000 men on the 1st of September, and also the additional special draft to fill up all the old regiments not filled by that date.

Recruiting is much improved, but the drafting excitement continues. Foreigners who have declared their intention to become citizens, are not allowed to leave the country.

Numerous emigrants enlist on landing.

gence. There appears to be no doubt that on the 6th inst. the Arkansas appeared before Baton Rouge, attacked the Federal fleet, and compelled it to retire. The Memphis Bulletin, of the 10th inst., in recording the failure of a Federal expedition destined for the White River, remarks that the Federal vessel Louisville narrowly escaped an encounter with the Arkansas, but makes no reference to any disaster that had happened to the Confederate ram.

